which the instructions were condemned in those cases. The court left it to the jury to say whether or not the appellant made a confession, and told them that, if they found that he did make a confession, such fact alone would not authorize them to convict, but that they must also find that the offense was committed, which was tantamount to saying that they could not convict the defendant because he made the confession, but that they must go further, and find that his confession was true before they were authorized to convict. There was really no dispute in the evidence about the fact that the defendant had made a confession, and that it was a confession in open court. The instruction as a whole fairly submitted to the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt whether the defendant made a confession, and whether the crime was committed. In other words, whether the confession was true. While the form of the instruction cannot be commended, prejudicial error is not found in it. If specific objection had been made to it, its awkward form could, and should, have been corrected. The real question in the case was not whether the confession was made, but whether the crime was committed; and the instructions on the only real issue were clear and sound. In one respect the instruction is more favorable to the defendant than he was entitled to. It is based on the theory that his confession in the examining court was an extrajudicial confession, and needed corroboration, pursuant to section 2385, Kirby's Dig.: "A confession of a defendant, unless made in open court, will not warrant a conviction, unless accompanied with other proof that such offense was committed." Confessions made in preliminary examinations before magistrates are confessions in open court, or, as they are usually expressed, "judicial confessions." Greenleaf on Evidence, § 216; 12 Cyc. 459, 473; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. 523; 8 Enc. of Ev. 352; Matthews v. State, 55 Ala. 65, 28 Am. Rep. 698; State v. Needham, 78 N. C. 474; State v. Lamb, 28 Mo. 218; Speer v. State, 4 Tex. App. 474; Commonwealth v. Brown, 150 Mass. 330, 23 N. E. 49. From these authorities it will be seen that a confession, made in a preliminary hearing, when made in the due course of proceedings of the examining court, is a judicial confession within the meaning of the law, which holds such confessions alone to be sufficient to sustain a conviction.

3. The Attorney General confesses error on account of remarks of the prosecuting attorney. He does it upon the ground that the testimony, if it established anything, established rape, and not attempt to commit rape, and that the testimony to sustain the conviction is weak, and that the improper argument of the prosecuting attorney may furnish the key to the verdict returned by the jury. In view of the confession in court being of itself sufficient to sustain the conviction, the force of the argument is broken. This confession was of the graver, and not of the lesser, crime; and it is within the power of the jury to find a defendant guilty of an assault to commit a rape, although the evidence justified a conviction of rape. This was settled in Pratt v. State, 51 Ark. 167.

4. The next confession of error is on account of the argument of the prosecuting attorney in his opening statement. He said that the defendant was a "man of lowest character, and unworthy of belief, a gambler of the meanest type, preaching in the daytime and gambling at night," and using other denunciatory language. The defendant objected to said statement, and the court sustained the objection. The judge was not asked to do anything, except to sustain the objection to the argument, which he did. Had the court been asked to have reprimanded counsel, for stating a matter not proper to be stated in presenting the state's case, and called the attention of the jury to the fact that the character of the defendant was not at that time in issue, and could not be, unless he was called as a witness, and then only for the purpose of impeaching him as a witness, doubtless it would have been done; and had the court failed to properly eradicate the improper remarks, there would then have been something before this court to consider. K. C. S. Ry. Co. v. Murphy, 74 Ark. 256, 85 S. W. 428. After the evidence was closed, the prosecuting attorney, in the presence of the jury, requested the court to permit the state to introduce evidence to show that the defendant was a man of bad character, a gambler of the worst type, and unworthy of belief. The defendant objected to said statements, and to the introduction of the evidence, and the court had the jury to retire from the courtroom, and afterwards heard argument on this point, and sustained the objection of the defendant. As the defendant had then testified, testimony as to his reputation for morality and veracity would have been competent; and the court should have permitted the prosecuting attorney to have introduced testimony on these subjects, but not as to the fact that he was a gambler. The ruling of the court was more favorable to the defendant than he was entitled to. There is nothing for this court to review upon it other than the question whether the effort of the prosecuting attorney to make this proof was such flagrant conduct as would, of itself, prejudice the defendant's cause. It was a mere offer, doubtless in good faith, to prove what he was entitled to prove—and a little more. The defendant did not ask that the effect of it be removed, and only objected to the testimony being admitted, and the court sustained his objection. He got all he asked of the court, and cannot complain that the court did not do more for him than he asked of it.

These are the only grounds upon which error is confessed. Appellant has not favored the court with a brief, but was content to submit the case upon the confession of error. The court has examined the other assignments of error in the motion for new trial, which were, briefly stated, as follows: Exception was taken to the evidence of witnesses to the effect that they accompanied the prosecuting witness to the park, and there found a man's and a woman's tracks leading to a place where the ground was trampled down in such condition that it gave the appearance of a scuffle having taken place. The fact that the prosecutrix made complaint is admissible under certain circumstances; but the details of the complaint are not admissible, unless they constitute a part of the res gestae, or in corroboration of her testimony when it is attacked. Her physical appearance and the condition of her garments, and sometimes the condition of the place where the crime is alleged to have been committed, are admissible in corroboration. See Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624; 10 Enc. Ev. 587, 590, and notes. It is wholly unimportant to go into that subject, because the defendant himself testified to the fact that he and Mrs. Taylor walked around the park for a while, and that they decided they would go and fix a place, mash down some weeds, and give the place the appearance of a scuffle having taken place, and then she would go back to town and have him arrested. In other words, they were manufacturing evidence, tending to prove that the rape had been committed; and the question was not whether their tracks were at the given place, whether the weeds were mashed down, and a garment torn, but it was whether there was a crime committed, or whether a mere stageplay had taken place. The court, at the instance of the prosecuting attorney, ordered the prosecutrix to be arrested for perjury at the conclusion of her testimony, after she had admitted that she had testified in the justice court to facts showing rape. No objection was made to this proceeding, no exception taken to the action of the court thereupon, and therefore there is nothing to review on this assignment of error. Other language of the prosecuting attorney denunciatory of the defendant was assigned as error in the motion for new trial, but exception was not taken to it at the time it was made, nor were any rulings of the court asked upon it. At another time, during the trial the judge vacated the bench, and asked an attorney to occupy his seat; but he did not retire from the courtroom, merely going to a window in the courtroom for fresh air for a time. As stated in the Turbeville Case and the Stokes Case, heretofore referred to, the judge is not required to sit in one place in the courtroom, but so long as he is there, in the presence of the parties and the jury, and in control of the proceedings, the integrity of the trial is not affected by a change in his seat.

Exceptions were taken to the instructions. The instructions merely followed the statutes on the subject of the crime and a few general principles governing it. There is no error in them. The court gave all requested by the defendant but one, and it was manifestly incorrect.

Judgment affirmed.

MCCULLOCH, J. (dissenting). It will be readily seen from a perusal of the statement of facts in the opinion of the Chief Justice that the only direct evidence of crime is the repudiated statements of the accused man and the accusing woman. The circumstances adduced in evidence are, at most, only corroborative of these statements. The woman having in her testimony at the present trial denied the truth of her former statements, and declared that no assault had been made upon her person, her testimony is without any probative force whatever. Her former statements cannot be received as substantive evidence of the commission of a crime. The only purpose of admitting it is to discredit her present testimony by showing her former contradictory statement; and, since her present testimony tends to prove nothing, the former statement is valueless. 2 Wigmore on Ev. § 1136. Nor can her former statement be received in evidence as part of the res gestæ. Her statements to the officers soon after she returned from the scene of the alleged crime is too remote, and is but a narrative of a past event, and not a part of the transaction itself. Baker v. State, 85 Ark. 300, 107 S. W. 983. The alleged incriminating circumstances prove nothing of themselves, for their relation to the commission of the offense depends entirely on the truth of the woman's former statements to the officers. The torn garment, the tracks, and evidences of a struggle on the ground in the public park, without other evidence connecting them with the crime, have no tendency towards proving the crime of rape or assault with intent to rape. This leaves nothing in the case except the repudiated confession of appellant himself. Appellant's offer, while in jail, to pay the woman money to withdraw the accusation adds nothing to the strength of the evidence, as it is but a tacit confession of guilt, and certainly amounts to no more than his direct confession.

The authorities cited in the opinion of the Chief Justice seem to sustain the conclusion, expressed therein, that the confession of an accused person, made to a justice of the peace in an examining trial, is a judicial confession, and may be sufficient to sustain a conviction without other evidence of the commission of the alleged crime. I do not dissent from that conclusion. But, aside from the legal insufficiency of the evidence, it is far from convincing that any crime has been committed. The undisputed evidence of a previous plan between this man and woman to simulate the commission of the crime, their intimate and friendly association with each other, both immediately before and after the alleged crime, her frequent visits to and conferences with him in jail, and her narrative on the witness stand of their weird scheme to simulate the commission of the crime, so that he might expiate it on the gallows as a voluntary sacrifice of his life, convince me that no crime was in fact committed, but that the plan was born either of fanaticism or a vitiated taste for notoriety. I am so thoroughly convinced by the testimony that no crime was committed that I cannot consent for the conviction of the accused to stand.

The court gave, over appellant's objection, the following instruction, which is assigned as error: "(4) If you find from the evidence that the defendant made a confession that he had committed the crime of rape on the person of Margaret Irene Taylor, that alone would not be sufficient to authorize you to convict, but the confession of the defendant, if made, accompanied by proof that the offense was actually committed, will warrant a conviction; and, if you find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant made the confession of the crime, and that the crime was committed, you should convict." The instruction is criticised on the ground that it invades the province of the jury in passing on the weight of the evidence. Duckworth v. State, 83 Ark. 192, 103 S. W. 601. The language of the instruction is ambiguous, and Mr. Justice HART and I are of the opinion that it was calculated to mislead the jury, when it is considered in the light of the very weak evidence in the case, even if the evidence should be held to be legally sufficient to sustain the verdict. The other judges think that the concluding words of the instruction save it from condemnation because the jury are in effect told that they must, in order to convict, find beyond a reasonable doubt, in addition to the confession, that the crime was committed by the defendant. While it is possible to place this construction upon the form of expression employed, it is ambiguous to the average mind, and calculated to induce in the minds of the jury the idea that, if they believe that the defendant made a confession, it was their duty to convict him. It was therefore misleading and prejudicial. It is proper for trial courts to instruct juries, in the language of the statute, that a confession not made in open court will not warrant a conviction unless accompanied with other proof that the offense was committed; but it is improper to give the converse of the proposition, unless it be coupled with the further statement or qualification that the evidence as a whole must satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused.

In that form it is not improper, but without the above qualification it is an instruction on the weight of the evidence.

I am unable to escape the conclusion that the jury must have been misled by this instruction, for I cannot find any evidence which would satisfy a jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, that appellant made an assault upon the woman with intent to rape her. It is, to my mind, preposterous to say that under this evidence the commission of the crime has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore I dissent.

CHICAGO, R. I. & P. RY. CO. v. PLANTERS' GIN & OIL CO.

On Rehearing, Nov. 9, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 103*)—DELAY IN TRANSPORTATION—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

Where there was delay in the transportation of machinery intended for a special use known to the carrier, it was responsible for such damages as were fairly attributable to the delay, having been informed that special damages would result therefrom, though it was bound to accept the shipment when tendered, and under the Hepburn act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8154]) could not make a special contract to compensate it for the additional risk.

2. CARRIERS (§ 95*)—DELAY IN TRANSPORTATION—CARE REQUIRED.

Notice to a carrier of special circumstances which would result in special damages to a shipper from delay in transportation of machinery imposes on the carrier the duty to use diligence commensurate with the requirements of the case, which duty the carrier performs when he uses reasonable diligence to forward the goods promptly.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 396; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 47*)—DELAY—SPECIAL DAMAGES—NOTICE.

Where a carrier had 35 or 40 employees in a freight office, only 3 of whom were authorized to make shipping contracts, notice of special damages likely to result from delay in a shipment given to the person who caused the bill of lading to be executed, and who was put forward to transact the business for the carrier, was notice to it.

4. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—DELAY—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

In an action against a carrier for delay in transporting cotton seed mill machinery, plaintiff could not recover as special damages losses sustained on contracts for seed made, not only subsequent to the notice to the carrier, but after the carriers' default; such contracts not having been made in reliance on the carrier's fulfillment of its obligation.

5. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—DELAY—SPECULATIVE DAMAGES.

In an action against a carrier for delay in transportation of machinery for plaintiff's mill, the loss sustained by plaintiff of the saving in expense of the operation of the mill as a two-press mill, as contemplated, and as a one-press mill, as it was required to do on account of the carrier's delay in delivering the machinery, was speculative, and not recoverable.

6. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—DELAY—SPECIAL DAMAGES—IDLENESS OF PLANT.

In an action against a carrier for delay in delivering machinery for plaintiff's mill, plaintiff could recover the difference between the expense of shutting down the plant during the installation of the machinery at the later period and what it would have been at the earlier period had the machinery arrived within a reasonable time, provided the fixed charges of the mill were less when the machinery was due than when it was installed, and such element of the damage was brought to the carrier's attention at the time of shipment.

7. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—DELAY—DUPLICATION OF ARTICLE—DAMAGES.

Where, owing to delay in the transportation of machinery, the shipper was compelled to duplicate the same, but the carrier did not convert the machinery shipped, it was still the property of the shipper, and its damage was the cost of the duplicated machinery less the value of the delayed machinery utilized to its best advantage.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County; Edward W. Winfield, Judge.

Action by the Planters' Gin & Oil Company against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, and both parties appeal. Reversed on both appeals and remanded.

The Planters' Gin & Oil Company was engaged in the manufacture and sale of cotton seed products at Baldwin, Miss. Its plant was a one-press mill. It was desired to increase its capacity to a two-press mill, and Mr. Justin Matthews was authorized by it to purchase in Little Rock, Ark., a cylinder, a head block, a pressing ram, and heavy castings for a cotton seed oil plant. Matthews did so, and drew a draft in favor of the vendor for $500, the price of the machinery, which was paid by the oil company. He had the bill of lading made out and went to the freight depot of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company to ship the machinery over said road to Baldwin, Miss., where the plant was located. The shipment was an interstate shipment, and would have to go over connecting lines. R. E. Palmer was the local freight agent at Little Rock, and he had 35 or 40 clerks under him in his office. The bill clerk, E. A. Bliss, and the chief clerk, G. A. Swope, and himself, were authorized to sign bills of lading, and were the only employees of the company in said office so authorized. Mr. Matthews was not acquainted with the clerks or their duties. He went to the freight office and handed the bill of lading to one of the clerks, who pointed out another man as the one with whom he should transact his business. He went to this man and explained his business, and he took the bill of lading, went off with it, and presently returned with it duly signed. It was signed: "R. E. Palmer by B." It subsequently developed that it was signed by Mr. Bliss, and Mr. Bliss was not the man with whom Mr. Matthews was transacting the business. Mr. Matthews stated to this gentleman who handled the bill of lading for him that he wanted the railroad company to accept the shipment with the understanding that the oil company was to have a reasonable delivery of the machinery. He stated to him that delay in the shipment would be cause for damages, and said that the oil company had requested him to state that they had time contracts made for oil and meal, and that, in case of a decline in the market, they would be damaged for that cause, and that they would also be damaged by reason of the additional expense of handling the seed by hand. He also stated that they would be damaged by reason of the seed heating, and making an inferior grade of oil and meal and a less quantity of oil produced from it, and that they would not have room to store the seed, and would buy in anticipation of increasing the capacity of the mill, and in the meantime would have to operate a one-press mill. The agent made no reply to this, but, after hearing this statement, he took the bill of lading and went away, and presently came back with it signed. This was upon the 8th of September, 1906, and the machinery was shipped out of Little Rock on the following day. It was received at Baldwin, Miss., on October 29th. The oil company refused to receive it, and left it on the platform of the railroad. It was testified to, and not disputed, that seven to ten days was a reasonable time to allow for the transportation of machinery from Little Rock to Baldwin, Miss.

The oil company brought suit against the railroad company for $4,987.50, and set forth nine elements of damages, to wit:

"(1) The plaintiff was forced to buy another set of articles described in Atlanta, Ga., and pay $500 therefor because it could not complete its mill after waiting upon defendant for a long time.

"(2) The plaintiff, expecting to receive said machinery and complete its mill and manufacture products in a reasonable time, made contracts for the sale of oil, which it was forced to cancel by defendant's wrongful act, and pay $375 to the parties who had bought said oil.

"(3) The plaintiff could not manufacture the seed in its seedhouse, and having, in anticipation of reasonable conduct on defendant's part, contracted for seed more than enough to fill said seedhouse, was compelled to pay hauling storage on the same in the sum of $100.

"(4) The seed in the house of plaintiff was kept there an unreasonable length of time and heated and deteriorated, thus making an inferior quality of oil, and damaging plaintiff in the sum of $100.

"(5) The seed in the house of plaintiff was kept there an unreasonable length of time, and heated and deteriorated, and resulted in the manufacture of an inferior grade of meal, thus damaging plaintiff in the sum of $375.

"(6) The plaintiff was put to increased cost of fuel by reason of having to run its boilers and engines when the mill was not up to full capacity and was thus damaged in the sum of $137.50.

"(7) The plaintiff could only operate one press of its mill for a part of the time, and was thus damaged in the sum of $200.

"(8) The plaintiff was damaged by the shutting down of its mill in the sum of $300; this being the fixed expenses for such period in salaries.

"(9) The seed being heated from being stored an unreasonable length of time produced less oil than they otherwise would, and the plaintiff was thereby damaged in the sum of $750."

The sixth ground was withdrawn by plaintiff during the trial. The jury returned a verdict for $2,375, and the railroad and the oil company each appealed.

On the trial, in addition to the testimony above outlined, the following evidence was given: The president of the oil company testified that they commenced purchasing cotton seed about the latter part of September. By the 19th of October they had purchased from 800 to 1,000 tons, at from $15 to $18 per ton. They had capacity to store from 1,000 to 1,500 tons in their seedhouse. He testified as to the depreciation in the oil and meal producing qualities of seed, and in the quantity of oil produced therefrom by reason of the delay in handling it, the seed becoming heated when they were unable to work it promptly through the mill. Some time in the latter part of September or the 1st of October he made a contract with Armour & Co. for oil, to be delivered the last of October, and could have fulfilled the contract had this machinery arrived in time. Armour & Co. called on them for the oil, and they could not deliver it, and they effected a compromise of the breach of their contract by paying Armour & Co. $375. He also testified that they expended $100 in having to store their seed in a shed some four or five blocks from the oil mill. He stated that a two-press mill can run for almost as little expense as a one-press mill, as it only requires about one more employé to operate a two-press mill, and that there was an accumulation of extra labor which could have been utilized with the two-press mill, and that they lost on that account $200. He further testified that they lost $300 by reason of having to shut down the mill for three weeks while installing new machinery in October, which they had purchased elsewhere before the arrival of this machinery. He said that the machinery had not arrived at the time that he made his contracts for the seed, and had already been delayed longer than it should have been. He further testified that he could not rent parts to take the place of the delayed machinery. On the 18th or 19th of October the oil company purchased elsewhere a duplicate set of machinery at the same price, and it arrived at about the same time that the first machinery did, and they installed the second set of machinery and did not receive the first and did not pay the freight thereon when it finally arrived, as it could not be used by them nor sold for anything except scrap iron. Mr. Palmer, Mr. Bliss, and Mr. Swope each denied that they received the notice of the necessity of prompt shipment as testified to by Mr. Matthews. It was evident that none of these gentlemen were the ones with whom Mr. Matthews had the conversation of which he testified.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. Appellant argues that the defendant as a common carrier was compelled to accept this shipment when tendered to it; that under the Hepburn act of Congress (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3154]) it had no right to make any special contract to compensate it for assuming the additional risk that the notice of the special damages to flow from the failure to promptly deliver would place upon it. The cases of Hooks Smelting Co. v. Planters' Comp. Co., 72 Ark. 275, 79 S. W. 1052, and Globe Refining Co. v. Landa Oil Co., 190 U. S. 540, 23 Sup. Ct. 754, 47 L. Ed. 1171, are relied upon as authorities fixing the principle that, to hold a party to a contract liable for special damages, there must be notice of the special circumstances at or before the making of the contract, so that the party sought to be charged for the breach of the contract may be free to insist on such additional compensation as he may choose to demand, or at liberty to refuse the contract. The argument is not without force, and there is language in these and other opinions applying the doctrine of Hadley v. Baxendale, 91 Exch. 341, to this effect. However applicable that doctrine may be where the contract is between parties at liberty to contract, it is inapplicable when applied to the implied contract of carriers, although the same language is frequently used in cases when discussing liability of carriers as when discussing the liability of manufacturers or machinists who enter into contracts to promptly furnish or repair machinery. In fact, Hadley v. Baxendale was a carrier case itself, but the distinction was not then made. This difference is referred to in Crutcher v. C., O. & G. Ry. Co., 74 Ark. 358, 83 S. W. 770. One is a matter of contract; the other is a legal obligation.

The court recently had before it the question of special damages flowing from the breach of the implied contract of a carrier to furnish cars, and, following the authorities, particularly V. & M. Ry. Co. v. Ragsdale, 46 Miss. 458, the court sustained such action. C., O. & G. Ry. Co. v. Bolfe, 76 Ark. 220, 88 S. W. 870; Crutcher v. C., O. & G. Ry. Co., 74 Ark. 358, 83 S. W. 770; St. L., I. M. & So. Ry. Co. v. Ozler (Ark.) 110 S. W. 593. A much later case likewise applying to it is St. L., I. M. & So. Ry. Co. v. Mudford, 48 Ark. 502, 8 S. W. 814. The Ragsdale Case, heretofore referred to, which has been approved by this court in the Mudford, Crutcher, and Bolfe Cases, is a leading authority upon the subject, and has been much quoted and approved by text-writers. See 4 Elliott on Railroads, 1781; 3 Hutchinson on Carriers, 1369 (old Ed. 772); 3 Joyce on Damages, 1960. On this exact question the Mississippi court said: "(6) If the delay is in the transportation of machinery, to be applied to a special use, and that is known to the carrier, he is responsible for such damages as are fairly attributable to the delay, such as the value of the use of the machinery, to be tested by its rental price, or other approximate means, the expenses of idle hands, the loss of gain on work contracted to be done for another person, if such work could have been done if the machinery had been delivered, and the gain thereby definitely ascertained in proper time. (7) The party injured by the delay must not remain supine and inactive, but should make reasonable exertions to help himself, and thereby reduce his losses, and diminish the responsibility of the party in default to him." Mr. Hutchinson says, in referring to the justice of the rule which gives special damages where the circumstances would make the general rule inequitable: "And if, with a knowledge of these circumstances, the carrier should unreasonably delay the carriage, or if, having expressly contracted to carry them within a given time, or for a given purpose, he should negligently delay them beyond that time, or so as to defeat their purpose, the difference in the value of the goods at the time of their actual arrival and at the time when they should have been delivered may prove a very inadequate recompense to their owner." And again he says: "The fact that the carrier was notified of the special circumstances demanding greater diligence is thus seen to be a crucial one, and that the carrier was so informed must be both alleged and proved." 3 Hutchinson on Carriers, 1367. See, also, 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1724.

While it is true that the carrier cannot refuse to receive goods, and while it may be true that under the recent act of Congress he cannot make any special charge commensurate with his undertaking, yet such considerations cannot change his duty to promptly carry. Notice of the special circumstances puts upon him the duty to use diligence commensurate to the requirements of the case; and he has discharged his whole duty when he uses reasonable diligence to fulfill the implied contract which the law places on him to promptly forward the goods. It would not be consistent with the duties resting on a carrier to say that, where he has broken his implied contract to promptly deliver, he can escape responsibility for failing to exercise due care in promptly forwarding goods, because he could not refuse the goods when offered, nor charge a different rate than for similar goods shipped without notice. The test of his liability is his care in the execution of his duty, and the amount of damage is dependent upon the nature of the shipment and the circumstances under which it is made. Special damages present no question of liability, but a question of amount of damages, where liability is otherwise fixed. The liability is dependent solely upon the negligence of the carrier in the performance of his duty to promptly carry. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1712. The exercise of reasonable diligence in forwarding acquits the carrier of negligence and defeats the action based on a failure to deliver within a reasonable time. And in this way the carrier can always protect itself.

2. It is insisted that the notice was not brought home to a person properly representative of the company. The notice was given to the party who actually made the contract of shipment. The company had 35 or 40 employes in the freight office, only 3 of whom were authorized to make contracts of shipment. A shipper goes to the office, and is referred to a certain person as the proper one with whom to enter into his contract. He gives his notice to that person, and that person causes to be executed the contract—the bill of lading. It may be that that person did not personally sign it. That fact was not known to the shipper. Nor was it necessary to be known to him; for the man whom the company put forward to transact business did transact it for the company, did enter into the contract, and under the contract so executed the carrier received the goods, and shipped them, and notice to such person was notice to the company.

3. Having determined that the plaintiff has made out a case for special damages, it is necessary, then, to consider the damages recovered and sought to be recovered. Notice was given to the railroad company that contracts had been made for the purchase of seed by the oil company; but the evidence fails to establish this fact. On the contrary, the evidence of the president of the oil company shows that he only began contracting for the seed in the latter part of September or the 1st of October, and most, if not all, of the contracts for seed were made in October. The machinery was delivered to the carrier on the 8th of September, and left Little Rock on the 9th. Under the undisputed evidence, seven to ten days was the usual and reasonable time to allow for its delivery to Baldwin, Miss. Where the time of delivery is not fixed by the contract, the law implies the time necessary to complete the transaction. But "the law does not attempt to fix by rule what is a 'reasonable time.' Each case is referred to its own peculiar circumstances; an account being taken of the mode of conveyance, the nature of the goods, the season of the year, the character of the weather, and the ordinary facilities for transportation under the control of the carrier." 4 Elliott on Railroads, 1730. The testimony has fixed beyond dispute that a reasonable time for the delivery of these goods expired not later than the 19th of September. The president of the company says that the machinery had already been delayed an unreasonable length of time before he commenced contracting for seed. No assurance from this railroad company of its speedy arrival was shown. It may be taken under the facts of this case that the machinery was to have been delivered on or before the 19th of September as if that date had been definitely settled and fixed by contract in the beginning. The ground upon which special damages are allowed, where contracts have been made and they are breached, is that the carrier has notice of those contracts and the probable effect of the breach of them by reason of the carrier's default in delivery of the shipment in time for the shipper to fulfill his contract. 3 Hutchinson, 1367; St. L., I. M. & So. Ry. Co. v. Mudford, 48 Ark. 502, 3 S. W. 814. The Massachusetts court, speaking through Mr. Justice Endicott on this subject, said: "If, therefore, the defendant had received the ties for transportation according to its contract, and failed to deliver them at all, it would have been liable for their market value in Boston at the time when they should have been delivered; or, if it had negligently delayed the delivery, it would have been liable for the diminution in their market value during the delay. It would not, in either event, have been liable in damages for loss of profits sustained by the plaintiff under his subsequent contracts with other parties, unless it can be said that, by reason of the plaintiff's announcement that he intended to make such contracts, it was necessarily within the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract of transportation, and as the probable consequence of its breach, that the defendant might be liable for damages resulting to the plaintiff from his inability to fulfill such contracts, the terms of which were not, and could not, then be disclosed. The damages for which a carrier is liable upon failure to perform his contract are those which result from the natural and ordinary consequences contemplated at the time of making the contract of transportation; and a larger liability can be imposed upon him only when it is in the contemplation of the parties that the carrier is to respond, in case of breach, for special and exceptional damages. In such a case the extent and character of the obligation he assumes should be known to the carrier, which in this case was impossible, as the contracts were not then made. The mere knowledge on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff intended to make contracts for the sale of the ties to be transported cannot impose liability upon the defendant for loss of profits on such contracts. * * *. We are therefore of opinion there was error in instructing the jury that the plaintiff could recover damages for loss of profits on his subsequent contracts. As the ties were not sent to Boston, the true measure of damages is the difference between the market price in Boston and the market price in Canada at the time when the defendant should have transported the ties according to its contract, deducting therefrom the price stipulated in the contract for transportation." Harvey v. C. & P. R. Ry. Co., 124 Mass. 421, 26 Am. Rep. 673. In this case the contracts were not only subsequent to the notice to the company, but were subsequent to the default of the railroad company.

The second, third, fourth, fifth, and ninth elements of damage set forth in the complaint grew out of the contracts made long subsequent to the notice to the carrier, and from 10 to 30 days after the carrier had breached the contract by failing to promptly deliver the machinery. A shipper cannot recover damages growing out of contracts made subsequent to the shipment; for it is only such matters as are then in contemplation for which the carrier can be held, and, a fortiori, a shipper cannot recover on account of contracts made after the carrier was already in default in making delivery. It cannot be said that, when he made these contracts, he was relying upon the carrier to fulfill its obligation because it was already in default, and the oil company had no assurances from it that its default would be speedily remedied.

The seventh ground seems to be based upon the loss to the company of the saving in expense between a one-press mill and a two-press mill. This is but another form of recovering expected profits from a two-press mill, in that the fixed charges against the two-press mill would have gotten better results, as some of the hands were idle, while in operating the two-press mill they would not have been idle. This is too remote and speculative to be recoverable.

The eighth item may be recoverable; but it is not sufficiently developed here to definitely determine. If at the time the machinery was due the fixed charges against the mill were less than at the time when the machinery was received, and the cessation of business during the installation of the plant would be more expensive at that time than the earlier time, and if this was necessarily included in the notice, then the difference may well be recoverable.

The first item is recoverable, and the court erred in not giving instruction No. 3 asked by the oil company: "If you find that the plaintiff sustained actual damages by reason of being compelled to purchase a duplicate set of machinery and pay for same, after having paid for the set shipped over defendant's roads, and such damage was caused by the unreasonable delay of defendant in carrying said machinery, if you find there was an unreasonable delay, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover such actual damages as it sustained by reason of being compelled to buy the second set of machinery. You will consider this item of damage apart from the other claims for damage about which you have been instructed."

The oil company has also appealed, and assigns error for the failure of the court to give this instruction and permit it to recover on this item. The oil company waited long beyond the breach of the contract before purchasing other machinery. The railroad company had sufficient notice of the use for which this machinery was intended and of the consequences which would attend the failure to deliver it to the oil company to make it liable to it for the purchase price of the duplicate machinery obtained elsewhere when it had failed to deliver it within a reasonable time. "It is the duty of the shipper to exercise reasonable diligence and care to minimize the injury to his shipment caused by delay." 4 Elliott on Railroads, 1730. And he "must not remain supine and inactive, but should make reasonable exertions to help himself, and thereby reduce his losses and diminish the responsibility of the party in default to him." V. & M. Ry. Co. v. Ragsdale, 46 Miss. 458. If the goods were absolutely worthless, the shipper could recover the full amount of the cost that he was put to in getting their duplication. Wabash Ry. Co. v. Harris, 55 Ill. App. 159. But, if they were of value, it was his duty to utilize them to advantage. The machinery was his, and the railroad did not convert it to its own use by its unreasonable delay. 3 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 1372; 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1710. His measure of damage would be the cost of the duplicated machinery minus the value of the delayed machinery utilized to its best advantage.

The judgment is reversed upon both appeals, and the cause remanded for new trial.

On Rehearing.

Appellee files a motion for rehearing, and takes issue with the correctness of this statement in the opinion: "The president of the company says that the machinery had already been delayed an unreasonable length of time before he commenced contracting for seed. No assurance from this railroad company of its speedy arrival was shown." Counsel calls attention to the testimony of the witness referred to, wherein he said that they had assurances from the railroad company that the machinery would be there, but, when he was asked what company, he replied: "Well, it was the company here, and the Thomas-Fordyce Manufacturing Company, and we had asked them to hurry it up." This was all the evidence upon the subject. Counsel say that, as the witness was testifying in Little Rock, it necessarily referred to the defendant railway company. This testimony was not overlooked in the consideration of the case, as supposed by counsel; but it was considered insufficient to prove any assurance on the part of the defendant railroad company, and insufficient to prove such a definite promise of the speedy delivery of the machinery that a reasonable man could rely upon it. In fact, it was considered so indefinite and uncertain as to amount to nothing, and it was decided to so treat it in the opinion.

The motion is overruled.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 221*)—RISKS ASSUMED BY SERVANT—PROMISE TO REMOVE DANGER—CONTINUING AT WORK.

Where a servant notified the master of defects in a steam log skidder, and the master promised to remedy them, and requested him to continue working with it, his continuing to work with it did not preclude his recovery for an injury sustained within a reasonable time after the promise, if they did not create such an imminent danger that one of ordinary prudence would have refused to risk it.

The apparatus being a complicated one furnished for the joint use of several servants, the question whether the injured servant in continuing at work after he knew of the defect exercised ordinary care was for the jury, though the facts were undisputed, unless the facts were such that reasonable minds could draw but one conclusion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mississippi County; Frank Smith, Judge.

Personal injury action by James Marcum against the Three States Lumber Company. There was a directed verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

This is an action by James Marcum against the Three States Lumber Company to recover damages for breaking his leg on January 17, 1907, while in the employ of the company. The defendant company was at the time operating a steam log skidder, used for dragging or skidding logs from the woods to the railroad. The machine was made by the Clyde Iron Works, and consisted of a steam engine mounted on a flat car with a boom about 32 feet long at each end and extending in both directions, front and rear, at an angle of about 45 degrees, each of which stood directly over the railroad. It was about 32 feet from the engine to the end of each boom, and on the end of the boom was a pulley over which a steel cable worked. One end of the cable was attached to a drum near the engine, and it extended out over the pulley on the end of the boom. Attached to the other end of the cable was a pair of tongs which weighed about 75 pounds. They were constructed on the principle of ice tongs. They were made of octagon steel, six sided like a rifle barrel, and were, except at the points, 1½ inches in diameter. They were sharp pointed for the purpose of being fastened to a log four or five inches from its end. The machine was operated in this way: The tongs attached to the cable would be dragged into the woods, where the logs were, by a horse. The tongs would be fastened on the end of the log by a man called a "hooker." The hooker would then signal the flagman, and he, in turn, would then flag the engineer, who would start the engine. The engine would wind up the cable on the drum like a spool of thread, and this winding of the cable would skid the log to the railroad. The tongs were so constructed that, when in perfect condition, the harder the engine would pull the tighter the tongs would clutch the log. If, while skidding a log from the woods to the railroad, it should strike the root of a tree or other obstruction, the usual and customary way of releasing it was to unhook the cable from the ring in the end of the tongs, place it around a stump or a tree standing a little to one side or the other of a straight line from the log to the engine, and then again hook the cable to the ring in the end of the tongs. Then, by the same process of signaling as before, the engine would be started, the log wrenched to one side, and released from the obstruction.

When the Clyde Iron Works shipped this machinery to the defendant, it sent along one Mr. Hall as an instructor, whose duty it was to teach the employés of the defendant company how to operate the machine. Plaintiff was an engineer by profession, and was placed in charge of the engine by defendant. Mr. Gibson, the general foreman of the defendant company, told him to do whatever Mr. Hall told him to do, to do it just like he told him to do it, and learn all about the business. About the fourth or fifth day after they commenced operating the machinery, Hall came to the plaintiff, and told him that he would take his place on the engine for a while, and directed plaintiff to go into the woods, help the hookers hook logs awhile, and learn how it was done. He gave as a reason for this order that he thought from all he had heard that plaintiff would be made foreman of the crew. On that morning they were running two lines of cables. Mr. Cannon was the hooker for one line and Mr. Reed for the other. The tongs that Cannon was using were fastened to the cable with a clevis or hook, similar to a hook on a log chain. The hook on the cable that Reed was using had been almost straightened out the day before, and the cable was welded on the tongs. The tongs that Reed was using on that morning were sprung—that is, they were nearer straight than they should be—and on account of this defect they would sometimes slip from the end of the log when the cable was being pulled, and jump a considerable distance, 35 or 40 feet. The fact that the tongs were sprung was known to the plaintiff at the time the injury was received. Either the day before or that morning the tongs had pulled out of a log. Then it came across the end of the boom and struck the side of the cab of the engine, and knocked a hole in it as big as a five-gallon keg. The cab was made out of seven-eighths inch pine lumber. At that time plaintiff was running the engine. He called the attention of Mr. Gibson to the accident, and told him some one would get killed or crippled with the tongs unless they were fixed. Mr. Gibson told the plaintiff to go ahead; that he would furnish new tongs or repair those in a day or two. When Mr. Hall directed plaintiff to go out in the woods and assist in the hooking and skidding for awhile, he first went over on Cannon's line, and saw him hook two or three logs. He then went over to Reed's line, and the first log they hooked after he arrived struck an oak tree that had been cut down, and the tongs slipped out. The oak tree was then cut out of the way, and, fastening the hooks in a new place, they started with the log again. They did not go far until the log struck a maple root. About 10 or 12 feet to the right of the cable, and about 35 feet from the end of the log, stood a stump. There was a man who rode a mule that drags the tongs back in the woods. Reed said: "We will have the rider to pull the line around the stump." Plaintiff said that he thought that Reed and himself could pull the line over it; so Reed and the plaintiff took hold of the cable with their hands, lifted it over to the right, and placed it behind the stump. As soon as the cable was placed behind the stump, without waiting for the signal to start, the engine began to pull the cable, and the plaintiff at the same time started to get out of the way. He had gone only a few feet when the tongs slipped from the end of the log, and struck him, breaking his leg.

The plaintiff had worked around a saw-mill a great many years. He had assisted in operating other makes of log-loading machines. The plaintiff was the only witness examined at the trial, and the above is substantially his statement of how the injury occurred and the incidents connected with it. At the conclusion of his testimony, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

J. T. Coston, for appellant. W. J. Lamb and W. J. Orr, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). In support of the judgment of the court directing a verdict for the defendant, now appellee, it is contended that upon the undisputed facts of the case the plaintiff, now appellant, must be deemed to have accepted the risk of such injury as befell him. In a note to the case of Foster v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 127 Iowa, 84, 102 N. W. 422, in 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 153, the servant's assumption of risk as affected by the master's promise to repair is aptly stated as follows: "It is a well-settled general rule that the assumption of risk implied from a servant's knowledge that a tool, instrument, appliance, piece of machinery, or piece of work is defective or dangerous is suspended by the master's promise to repair, made in response to the servant's complaint, so that, if the servant is induced by such promise to continue at work, he may recover for any injury which he sustains by reason of such defect within a reasonable time after the making of the promise, provided he exercises due care, unless the defect renders the appliance so imminently and obviously dangerous that a reasonably prudent person would decline to use it at all until it was repaired." Many decisions from a great number of the states are cited to support the rule. Mr. Thompson, in his work on Negligence (volume 4, par. 4667), expresses the same views; and adds that, under such circumstances, "he will not as a matter of law be put in the position of having accepted the risk, but whether he has done so will be a question for the jury." See also, 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, par. 453.

The latest decision of our court in which the rule has been recognized and applied is the case of St. L., I. M. & Sou. Ry. Co. v. Mangan, 112 S. W. 168, in which the prior decisions of our court on the subject to the same effect as the rule above quoted are cited and approved. In the case of Greene v. Minneapolis & St. Louis Ry. Co., 31 Minn. 248, 17 N. W. 378, 47 Am. Rep. 785, the court said: "If a servant who has knowledge of defects in the instrumentalities furnished for his use gives notice thereof to his employer, who thereupon promises that they shall be remedied, the servant may recover for an injury caused thereby, at least where the master requested him to continue in the service, and the injury occurred within the time at which the defects were promised to be remedied, and where the instrumentality, although defective, was not so imminently and immediately dangerous that a man of ordinary prudence would have refused longer to use it. Under such circumstances, his subsequent use of the defective instrumentality would not necessarily, or as a matter of law make the servant guilty of contributory negligence, but it would be a question for the jury whether in continuing its use after he knew of the defect he was in the exercise of ordinary care." The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Mitchell, and in support of it he cited, among other cases, that of Hough v. Railway Company, 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. Ed. 612. The latter is a leading case on the question, and has been followed in numerous decisions of the state, as well as United States, courts. We also call attention to the following cases as sustaining the decision: Indianapolis & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Watson, 114 Ind. 20, 14 N. E. 721; Erdman v. Illinois Steel Co., 95 Wis. 6, 69 N. W. 908, 60 Am. St. Rep. 66; Rothenberger v. Northwestern Consolidated Milling Co., 57 Minn. 461, 59 N. W. 531; Patterson v. Railway Co., 76 Pa. 889, 18 Am. Rep. 412; McKelvey v. Ches. & Ohio Ry. Co., 35 W. Va. 514, 14 S. E. 261. Counsel for appellee rely upon the case of Railway Co. v. Kelton, 55 Ark. 483, 18 S. W. 983, to sustain the action of the court in directing a verdict for it. In that case the court said: "In an action by a house painter to recover damages for an injury occasioned by a fall from a defective ladder furnished by his employer, he is not entitled to recover if, knowing that the ladder could not be used with any assurance of safety, he continued to use it until the injury occurred, relying upon his employer's promise to furnish a safe ladder." In that case the facts were undisputed, and the court said as a matter of law that the promise on the part of the employer to furnish a better ladder would not justify the employé in looking to his employer for compensation for damages which he sustained by wantonly and recklessly encountering danger which he knew necessarily attended the use of the old ladder. Later adjudications of our court have said it was a question for the jury, where the servant relies upon the promise of the master to repair, where the appliance is so obviously and imminently dangerous that a reasonably prudent person would decline to use it until it was repaired. There is an apparent, but no real, conflict in the two classes of decisions. In the Kelton Case no special knowledge was required to discern the danger of the continued use of the ladder. It was not an appliance which required the exercise of skill and care. The danger of its continued use could be as well comprehended by one man as another. It was used only by the one man. The case is different where the appliance is either so complicated that the servant may rely upon the superior knowledge of the master, or where it is a machine or appliance which requires several persons to operate it, and the danger in its continued use in its defective condition depends upon the mutual care toward each other of the servants operating it. This distinction is recognized in the following cases: Gunning System v. Lapointe, 212 Ill. 274, 72 N. E. 393, and cases cited; Swift v. O'Neill, 187 Ill. 337, 58 N. E. 416; Morden Frog & Crossing Works v. Fries, 228 Ill. 246, 81 N. E. 862, 119 Am. St. Rep. 428; Webster Mfg. Co. v. Nisbett, 205 Ill. 273, 68 N. E. 936; Marsh v. Chickering, 101 N. Y. 396, 5 N. E. 56. The application of the following rule differentiates the two classes of cases: "It is only when the facts are undisputed, and are such that reasonable minds may draw but one conclusion from them, that the question of negligence is ever considered one of law for the court." St. Louis & San Francisco R. Co. v. Summers (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 211. Where the servant is engaged in ordinary labor with tools of simple construction, which are used by himself alone and where the facts are undisputed, reasonable minds must inevitably come to the same conclusion. Hence there is nothing to submit to the jury. On the other hand, in the case of complicated machinery, or in cases where the danger in the continued use of the machine or instrumentality depends upon the want of due care of the fellow servants engaged in operating it, although the facts are undisputed, reasonable minds might draw different conclusions. In such cases the question of negligence is one for the jury. The case under consideration is a good illustration.

The jury might have found that the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the master in furnishing defective tongs, together with the concurring negligence of the fellow servants, either the flagman in prematurely signaling the engineer to start the machinery in motion, or the engineer in starting it without a signal. That a master is liable for the negligence of a vice principal concurring with that of the fellow servant we refer to the following cases: Archer Foster Const. Co. v. Vaughn, 79 Ark. 20, 94 S. W. 717; Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis R. Co. v. Becker, 67 Ark. 1, 53 S. W. 406, 46 L. R. A. 814, 77 Am. St. Rep. 78. The court should also have submitted to the jury under proper instructions the sufficiency of the complaint by the servant and the promise to repair by the master and the servant's reliance on this promise, and the reasonableness of the time to repair.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BROWN v. CRYSTAL ICE CO.

COURTS (§ 246*)—JURISDICTION—COURTS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Under Acts 1907, p. 233, c. 82, § 7, declaring that the jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals shall extend to all cases brought up from the chancery courts with certain exceptions, the Court of Civil Appeals, not the Supreme Court, has jurisdiction of an application for a supersedeas of an interlocutory order directing the issuance of a mandatory injunction in a suit by a stockholder to compel the corporation to permit him to examine its books.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 246.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Hamilton County; T. M. McConnell, Chancellor.

Bill by Bowdry Brown against the Crystal Ice Company. An interlocutory order was granted directing the issuance of a mandatory injunction, and defendant applied to the Supreme Court for a supersedeas of such interlocutory order which was granted, and complainant moves to dismiss the supersedeas. Motion granted.

R. B. Cooke, for appellant. Pritchard & Sizer, for appellee.

NEIL, J. On the 1st of June, 1908, Bowdry Brown filed a bill against the defendant company, in which he alleged, in substance, that he was the owner of certain shares of stock in the defendant corporation, and that he had made application to the officers of the company for permission to examine the books of the company, with a view to finding out the facts about the business of the organization, for the purpose of enlightening himself as to the value of his stock; that a colorable permission had been given him, but that, when he attempted to really make use of it by taking some notes of the matters he observed upon the books of the company, the books were forcibly taken from him, and he was not permitted to examine them further. The bill prayed for a mandatory injunction to be issued against the officers and agents of the company, requiring them to permit him to make such examination. The chancellor by a fiat on the bill directed the mandatory injunction to issue. This order was made ex parte on the 29th day of May before the actual filing of the bill. On the 1st day of June, 1908, the day on which the bill was filed, a petition was presented to the chancellor, reciting the issuance of the injunction under the fiat of the chancellor, its service on J. H. Wilson, secretary and treasurer of the defendant company, and that the said Wilson had disregarded the fiat and refused to allow petitioner to have access to the books, and had informed petitioner that he could not see them. The petition prayed that the said Wilson be committed for contempt, and that attachment might issue, to the end that he be brought before the chancellor for this purpose; that is, to answer for the contempt. The attachment was ordered, and was issued on the said 1st day of June, 1908.

Thereupon the Crystal Ice Company notified the complainant that on the 3d day of June it would apply to one of the judges of this court for a supersedeas of the interlocutory order granted on the 29th of May above referred to, directing by an ex parte order the issuance of the mandatory injunction.

A petition was accordingly filed and was presented to one of the judges of this court, and a supersedeas was ordered.

The ground stated in the petition was, in substance, that the mandatory injunction was in the nature of final relief, and could not be granted at the beginning of the suit by an ex parte order.

The complainant has appeared in this court and moved to dismiss the supersedeas because it was improvidently granted.

The ground of the application to discharge the supersedeas is that this court has no jurisdiction, but that the jurisdiction of the matter is with the Court of Civil Appeals.

The decision of this question involves a construction of section 7, c. 82, p. 233, Acts 1907, which fixes the jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals.

Section 7 of the act referred to reads as follows:

"That the jurisdiction of said Court of Civil Appeals shall be appellate only, and shall extend to all cases brought up from courts of equity or chancery courts, except cases in which the amount involved, exclusive of costs, exceeds $1,000.00, and except cases involving the constitutionality of the statutes of Tennessee, contested elections for office, state revenue and ejectment suits, and to all civil cases tried in the circuit and common law courts of the state in which appeals in the nature of writs of error, or writs of error may be applied for, for the purpose of having the action of said trial court reviewed. In all cases in which appellate jurisdiction is herein conferred upon said Court of Civil Appeals, the appeals, and appeals in the nature of writs of error, from the lower court shall be taken directly to said Court of Civil Appeals, and said court, or any judge thereof, is hereby given the same power to award and issue writs of error, certiorari and supersedeas, which the Supreme Court has heretofore had in such cases, returnable to said Court of Civil Appeals. The practice in such cases in said courts shall be the same as is now prescribed by law for the Supreme Court. In all cases in which appellate jurisdiction is not conferred by the terms of this act upon said Court of Civil Appeals, appeals therefrom shall be directed to the Supreme Court, and in such cases, writs of error, certiorari and supersedeas shall be issued by, and made to the Supreme Court, as is now provided by law; and in such cases the Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction, and shall try and finally determine the same, and shall not, after this act takes effect, assign the same for trial by the said Court of Civil Appeals."

We think that under a true construction of this section the present case is not within the jurisdiction of this court, but in that of the Court of Civil Appeals. It does not involve any special amount of property—simply a right asserted by the complainant. It does not involve the constitutionality of any statute of the state, nor a contested election for office, nor does it involve state revenue, nor is it an ejectment suit. It is observed that under the terms of the section jurisdiction is given to the Court of Civil Appeals of all chancery causes, except those involved in the four classes mentioned, and except those in which the amount involved, exclusive of costs, exceeds $1,000. As an illustration of the soundness of this construction it may be stated that we have held that habeas corpus cases instituted in the chancery court go before the Court of Civil Appeals when brought up for review.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the motion to discharge the supersedeas should be granted.

Let an order be entered accordingly. The petition will also be dismissed.

2. TAXATION (§ 538*)—"INVOLUNTARY PAYMENT"—DURESS.

A payment of taxes in order to be involuntary, so as to entitle the taxpayer to recover them for illegality, must be made on compulsion to prevent an immediate seizure of the taxpayer's goods or the arrest of his person; mere threats of litigation or apprehension of levy of distress warrants being insufficient.

3. TAXATION (§ 538*)—ILLEGAL TAXES—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

Payment of illegal taxes under protest before the taxes had become delinquent and without any demand or threat to levy merely to prevent the imposition of a penalty and interest which would accrue on the succeeding day was voluntary, so that the taxes paid could not be recovered.

4. TAXATION (§ 446*)—COLLECTION—TAX BOOKS—DELINQUENT LIST—JUDGMENT—EXECUTION.

The tax books in the hands of the county trustee, who was the sole tax collector, and the delinquent list thereafter to be furnished the constables, etc., prior to the time the tax became delinquent, did not have the force of a judgment and execution against the taxpayer.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hamilton County; M. M. Allison, Judge.

Suit by the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railroad Company against Hamilton county. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pritchard and Sizer, for appellant. Joe V. Williams, for appellee.

McALISTER, J. The object of this suit is to recover certain taxes said to have been illegally collected by the county from the railroad company for the years 1903 and 1904. The cause was presented to the circuit court on a stipulation of agreed facts; the material recitals being that in the year 1903 the county of Hamilton levied on the property of plaintiff 30 cents on each $100 in value for general county purposes, and in excess thereof made a levy of 15 cents on the $100 for the purpose of paying the expenses of the circuit court of Hamilton county. The 15-cent levy for circuit court purposes amounted to $1,914.08.

On the 29th day of February, 1904, the day before the tax became delinquent by law, the company paid it in order to avoid the imposition of the penalty and interest which would accrue unless said taxes were paid prior to the 1st of March, as provided in the assessment act of 1903, and in order to avoid the cost and expense incident to any attempt that the proper authorities might make under the law to collect said taxes by levy on and sale of its property. Said tax was paid under protest, and that fact was recited in the receipt executed by the county trustee.

In the year 1904 Hamilton county again levied, in excess of and in addition to the 30 cent levy, for general county purposes, 10 cents on the $100 for circuit court purposes, and this levy was paid by the company on February 28, 1905, the day before the same became delinquent by law in the same manner and for the same reason just stated for the preceding year, and a receipt of the same character was executed by the county trustee, namely, "the ten cent levy for circuit court purposes, amounting to $1,276.00, is paid under protest; its legality being denied."

It is also agreed in said stipulation that at the time of the payment of said taxes no demand for payment had been made by said county or its trustee or other agent except the fact of levy and assessment as shown on the tax books in the hands of said trustee, who was up to the time of said payments the sole collector of said taxes.

It is insisted on behalf of the county that upon the statement of agreed facts it appears that these payments were purely voluntary, and that plaintiff is without remedy to recover them. The circuit judge was of opinion that "the tax was voluntarily paid for the purpose, as stated in the declaration, of saving costs, interest, and penalty before it became delinquent, when no demand had been made, no threat of levy, and no delinquent list to give force of judgment or execution or distress warrant and no attempt was being made to collect it or intimation that such attempt would be made—without even a request for payment—but voluntarily appeared and paid it, and simply had the receipt recite that this item was paid under protest. A simple statement that a tax is paid under protest does not constitute the payment an involuntary one or reserve to payor any right of action, except as to state tax as provided by the statute."

The railroad company appealed, and has assigned as error the action of the circuit judge in denying it a recovery.

It is conceded that the tax collected by the county was illegally assessed under the ruling of this court in Newman v. Southern Railway, decided at Knoxville September term, 1905. In that case it was expressly adjudged that the county was without authority to levy a special tax for payment of the expenses of the circuit court; that the maintenance of the circuit court was a general county purpose, and its expenses must be paid out of the tax authorized by law for general county purposes, and that therefore the circuit court tax was illegal.

The determinative question then arising on this record is whether the payment of these taxes by the railroad company was voluntary.

It will be observed that Acts 1903, p. 681, c. 258, provide as follows:

"Sec. 50. That all the taxes remaining unpaid on the first day of March of each year shall immediately be collected by the county trustee by distress and sale of any personal property liable therefor; and the tax books in the hands of said trustee, and the delinquent lists to be furnished as herein provided, to deputy trustees or constables, shall have the force and effect of a judgment and a distress warrant, and an execution from a court of record authorizing him to make such distraint and sale."

It will be observed that the taxes for the year 1903 were paid by the company on the 29th day of February, 1904, the day preceding the 1st day of March of that year, on which day the taxes for 1903 would become delinquent, and it is recited that payment was made "in order to avoid the imposition of the penalty and interest which would accrue unless said taxes were paid prior to the first of March," as provided for in the section just quoted, and in order to avoid the cost and expense incident to any attempt that the proper authorities might make under the law to collect said taxes by levy and sale of the company's property.

It will be noticed that the payment was made in each year before the tax had become delinquent, and at a time when no demand had been made for payment by the tax collector. As already shown, the receipts executed by the county trustee for these taxes recite that they were paid under protest; the legality of the tax being denied.

It is very ably and earnestly argued by learned counsel for the company that, upon the facts presented, the payment of the tax in question was involuntary and upon compulsion. It is argued that the tax books in the hands of the county trustee have the force of a judgment, and that the delinquent list in the hands of deputies or constables operates to the same effect as an execution or distress warrant. It is said the statute imperatively requires that "all taxes remaining unpaid on March first shall be immediately collected by distress and sale," and that the trustee "shall furnish the deputy with a list of delinquent tax payers with a description of the property assessed against each and the amount of taxes due from each." It is said that "all taxes bear interest from the first day of March of the year following that for which they are assessed," and, in addition, there is a penalty provided of "one per cent. for each month the taxes are delinquent to be added on the first day of each month beginning with the first of March." Acts 1903, p. 681, c. 258, § 49.

The position of counsel is that, in the face of these provisions of the statute, the taxpayer is not bound to wait until the penalty and costs have actually accrued against him and distress warrants have been placed in the hands of deputy trustees; but that with this condition imminent and impending the taxpayer may pay the tax to prevent the issuance of the distress warrant, and such a payment is not voluntary, but upon coercion.

With this statement of the case we shall notice some of the authorities.

In Cooley on Taxation, p. 566, it is said:

"That a tax voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back has been held by the authorities with very few exceptions. It is immaterial in such case that the tax has been illegally laid, or even that the law under which it was laid was unconstitutional."

In Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 942, it is said:

"Money paid by a person to prevent an illegal seizure of his property or person by an officer claiming authority to seize the same, or to liberate his person or property from illegal detention by such officer, may be recovered back in an action for money had and received on the ground that the payment was compulsory, or by duress or extortion." Again in the same work (section 943) it is said:

"The coercion or duress which will render a payment involuntary must in general consist of some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed, or believed to be possessed, by the party exacting or receiving the payment, over the person or property of another, and from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by making payment." In Cauvin & Duprez v. Mayor and City Council of Nashville, 3 Baxt. 454, an effort was made to recover an excess of money paid the city on license for billiard tables. The court said:

"The correct principle is given in 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, p. 857:

"The payment must have been made on compulsion to prevent the immediate seizure of his goods or arrest of person, and not voluntary."

In Lea v. City of Memphis, 9 Baxt. 108, it was said:

"Threats of litigation, or apprehension of the levy of distress warrants on property by the weight of authority, would not make a payment of taxes under such threats or apprehensions compulsory."

In Railroad v. Williams, 101 Tenn. 148, 46 S. W. 448, the rule again was stated to be that a tax illegally collected might be recovered if exacted and paid under protest and to save seizure of property.

In Bank v. Memphis, 107 Tenn. 73, 64 S. W. 15, the suit was against the city of Memphis to recover illegal taxes paid. The court said:

"If it was paid willingly, though irregularly, and without application, it may not be recovered back, but, if under protest and duress, it may if it was illegally assessed and collected."

It seems to be well settled by our cases that, to entitle a party to recover taxes illegally collected, they must not only have been paid under protest, but under duress; that is, to prevent the seizure of goods or the detention of the person.

It is said, however, on behalf of the railroad company, that this court has decided that the tax book in the hands of the county trustee is equivalent to a judgment against a taxpayer, and that payment of an illegal tax under protest, under such circumstances, is an involuntary payment, and may be recovered back.

In Bright v. Halloman, 7 Lea, 310, a suit had been instituted to recover an illegal tax collected by the county court of Obion county for the year 1877. The court said:

"It is insisted the plaintiff ought not to have recovered because his payment was voluntary. We do not assent to this contention. The tax book was process equivalent to an execution in the hands of the officer, and payment under protest entitled the party to sue for so much as was deemed illegal."

But the taxes involved in that case were delinquent, and the tax book or a copy of it was in the hands of the constable or deputy collector when making collections.

In Alexander v. Henderson, 105 Tenn. 431, 58 S. W. 648, Bright v. Halloman is referred to and approved.

In Bank v. Memphis, 116 Tenn. 646, 94 S. W. 608, the question was whether certain taxes were paid voluntarily. The court said:

"We think this point is covered by the case of Bright v. Halloman, 7 Lea, 310. In that case it was held that the tax book was process equivalent to an execution in the hands of the officer and payment under protest entitled the party to sue for so much as was deemed illegal, and this was true, although the taxes involved were county taxes, and no special provision was made for payment of this class of taxes under protest under Acts 1873, p. 71, c. 44, carried into Shannon's Code, § 1059." Railroad v. Williams, 101 Tenn. 148, 46 S. W. 448.

It is said on behalf of the county that these cases do not apply in the present instance, since they all related to the collection of delinquent taxes, and that section 50 of chapter 258 of the Acts of 1903, providing that the tax books in the hands of the trustee and the delinquent list furnished to collecting officers shall have the force and effect of a judgment and a distress warrant, applies to taxes remaining due on March the first of each year, as stated in that section.

As already seen, the taxes in question were not delinquent at the time they were paid by the company, and, as to these taxes, the tax books in the hands of the trustee and the delinquent list thereafter to be furnished to constables, etc., did not have the force of a judgment and execution. By the plain language of the statute these provisions only apply to taxes remaining unpaid on the 1st day of March of each year. In all of the cases cited by counsel for the company the taxes when paid were delinquent. At the time the payments were made in the present case it is agreed no demand for payment had been made by the county trustee, and the taxes were paid "in order to avoid the imposition of the penalty and interest which would accrue unless said taxes were paid prior to the 1st of March, as provided for in the assessment act of 1903, * * * and in order to avoid the cost and expense incident to any attempt that the proper authorities might make, under the law, to collect said taxes by levy and sale of its property."

Our decisions on the subject of voluntary payment are in accord with the ruling of the United States Supreme Court. The leading case upon this question is Railroad v. Commissioners, 98 U. S. 541, 25 L. Ed. 196. That was a suit to recover taxes claimed to have been illegally assessed and which were paid under protest. The opinion of the court was delivered by Chief Justice Waite, who said:

"Before these payments were made there had been no demand for the taxes, and no special effort had been put forth by the treasurer for their collection. The company had personal property in the county which might have been seized; but no attempt had been made to seize it, and no other notice than such as the law implies had been given that payment would be enforced in that way.

"At the time the several payments were made the company filed with the treasurer a notice in writing that it protested against the taxes paid, for the reason that they were illegally and wrongfully assessed and levied, and were wholly unauthorized by law, and that suit would be instituted to recover back the money paid.

"We had occasion to consider the same general subject at the last term in Lamborn v. County Commissioners, 97 U. S. 181, 24 L. Ed. 928, which came up on a certificate of division from the circuit court for the district of Kansas. As that was a case from Kansas, we followed the rule adopted by the courts of that state, which is thus stated in Wabaunsee County v. Walker, 8 Kan. 431: 'Where a party pays an illegal demand with a full knowledge of all the facts which render such demand illegal without an immediate and urgent necessity therefor, or unless to release his person or property, such payment must be deemed voluntary, and cannot be recovered back. And the fact that the party at the time of making the payment files a written protest does not make the payment voluntary.'

This, as we understand it, is a correct statement of the rule of the common law.

The following cases announce the same rule: Little v. Bowers, 134 U. S. 554, 10 Sup. Ct. 620, 33 L. Ed. 1016; Bank of Kentucky v. Stone (C. C.) 88 Fed. 390; Hoke v. Atlanta, 107 Ga. 420, 33 S. E. 412. See, also, Weston v. Luce County, 102 Mich. 533, 61 N. W. 15. Affirmed.

HEART v. EAST TENNESSEE BREWING CO.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 103*)—ILLEGALITY.

All contracts which provide for doing a thing which is contrary to law, morality, and public policy are void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 468; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 34*)—LEASE—UNLAWFUL PURPOSE—TERMINATION.

Where a lease provided for the letting of a building for a saloon, it was terminated by a subsequent statute making the sale of intoxicating liquors in the city where the property was located unlawful, and the landlord could not therefore maintain an action for subsequent rent on the lessee's refusal to further occupy the premises or pay rent for the remainder of the term.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Knox County; Joseph W. Sneed, Chancellor.

Action by Frank Heart against the East Tennessee Brewing Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SHIELDS, J. Complainant on August 31, 1902, leased a certain house and lot situated in Knoxville, Tenn., and owned by him, to the defendant for a term of eight years, to be used as a saloon or place for the sale of intoxicating liquors, as expressed in the written lease that day made and executed by both parties. The defendant entered into possession of the property, and paid the rent contracted for to November 1, 1907, but after that declined to further use it, or to pay any rent. Complainant sues to collect rent accruing since November 1, 1907. The contract of lease was exhibited with and made a part of the bill, and therein the terms of the contract and the purposes for which the property was to be used are fully set forth.

The chancellor sustained a demurrer to the bill upon the ground that by chapters 17, 206, 207, pp. 81, 752, 755, Acts Gen. Assm. 1907, the sale of intoxicating liquors was made unlawful and prohibited in the city of Knoxville from and after November 1, 1907, and therefore the purpose for which the lease was made was from that time illegal, and the contract void and unenforceable, and complainant has brought the case to this court for review.

There is no error in the action of the chancellor. When the contract was made, the purpose for which the property was leased—the sale of intoxicating liquors in Knoxville—was lawful, and the lease valid and enforceable. Afterwards, November 1, 1907, that purpose was made unlawful by the acts of the General Assembly above referred to, and thus by operation of law the lease became and is void and unenforceable at the instance of either party.

It is a principle of general application that all contracts are void which provide for doing a thing which is contrary to law, morality, and public policy. Yerger v. Rains, 4 Humph. 259; Wetmore v. Brien, 3 Head, 723; Henderson v. Waggoner, 2 Lea, 134, 31 Am. Rep. 591; Rhodes v. Summerhill, 4 Heisk. 205; Page on Contracts, § 326.

It has been applied to contracts of this character, and held, for that reason, that the rent contracted to be paid could not be collected. Ralston v. Boady, 20 Ga. 449; Sherman v. Wilder, 106 Mass. 537; Mound v. Barker, 71 Vt. 253, 44 Atl. 346, 76 Am. St. Rep. 767; Riley v. Jordan, 122 Mass. 231;

Holmead v. Maddox, 2 Cranch, C. C. 161, Fed. Cas. No. 8,629; 2 Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, § 521.

The rule is the same when the purpose of the contract, although lawful when made, becomes unlawful by statute enacted before the full performance of its terms. In Mr. Parson's work on Contracts (volume 2, p. 674) it is said:

"That the illegality of a contract is in general a perfect defense must be too obvious to need illustration. It may indeed be regarded as an impossibility by act of law; and it is put upon the same footing as an impossibility by act of God, because it would be absurd for the law to punish a man for not doing, or, in other words, to require him to do that which it forbids his doing. Therefore, if one agrees to do a thing which is lawful for him to do, and it becomes unlawful by an act of the Legislature, the act avoids the promise, and so if one agrees not to do that which he may lawfully abstain from doing, but a subsequent act requires him to do, this act also avoids the agreement."

In Hammon on Contracts, § 210, pp. 345, 346, it is said:

"Where the performance of an executory agreement which was lawful in its inception is made unlawful by subsequent enactment, the agreement is thereby dissolved and the parties discharged from its obligations."

Other text-books are to the same effect. Clark on Contracts, 681; Lawson on Contracts, §§ 423, 424.

The rule has also been frequently applied by this and other courts of last resort. In Railroad Company v. Green, 9 Heisk. 592, it was held that a contract for the payment of Confederate notes, lawful when made, but afterwards made unlawful by law, could not be enforced. It is there said:

"The law had therefore made it impossible for the plaintiff to perform that portion of the condition precedent which required them to demand payment in Confederate notes. The nonperformance of a contract will always be excused where it is occasioned by act of law."

The case of Gray v. Sims, Fed. Cas. No. 5,729, is directly in point. This was a suit upon a policy of marine insurance. The vessel insured was to be employed in importing goods from Calcutta or Madras into the United States, and the contract of insurance specified this as one of the purposes of the voyage. After the policy was written, and before the return of the vessel, it became by act of Congress illegal to import goods into the United States from those points. The master undertook to do so, and the ship was seized and confiscated. The loss was within the terms of the policy. A recovery was denied. The court said:

"But if the contract be legal when it is made, and the performance of it is rendered illegal by a subsequent law, the parties are both of them discharged from its obligation. The insured loses his indemnity and the insurer his premium."

Other cases in accord are: Sauner v. Phoenix Insurance Co., 41 Mo. App. 480; Corrigan v. Chicago, 144 Ill. 537, 33 N. E. 746, 21 L. R. A. 212; Jamieson v. Gas & Oil Co., 128 Ind. 555, 28 N. E. 76, 12 L. R. A. 652; Presb. Church v. New York, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 538.

It is not necessary in this case to determine whether or not the contract contained in the lease restricts the use of the property for the sale of intoxicating liquors. It was the purpose of both lessor and lessee, as clearly expressed in the instrument, that it should be used as a saloon, and, this being made unlawful by law, the contract is no longer enforceable.

The decree of the chancellor is affirmed, with costs.

WILLIFORD v. PHELAN.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. Sept. 30, 1908.)

1. WILLS (§ 30*) — PERSONS ENTITLED TO MAKE—MARRIED WOMEN.

At common law a married woman could make a will of property not yet reduced to the husband's possession with the husband's assent to the particular will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

2. WILLS (§ 29*)—MARRIED WOMEN—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO WILL.

Independently of assent of the husband, a married woman may dispose of her separate property by will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 56, 59; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. WILLS (§ 28*) — MARRIED WOMEN — STATUTES.

Acts 1869-70, p. 113, c. 99 (Shannon's Code, §§ 4242-4247), regulating a married woman's power to dispose of property by will, applied exclusively to her power to dispose of real estate, and did not enlarge her power to dispose of her personal property by will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 10*)—MARRIAGE—EFFECT—WIFE'S PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Marriage at common law amounted to an absolute gift to the husband of all personal goods of which the wife was actually or beneficially possessed at any time during coverture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 11*)—WIFE'S PERSONAL PROPERTY—REDUCTION TO POSSESSION.

The common-law rule that a husband may receive and reduce to possession during coverture all choses in action, whether in the form of notes, debts, or legacies belonging to the wife at the time of their marriage or afterwards accruing, prevails in Tennessee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

6. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 10*)—PERSONAL PROPERTY OF WIFE—POSSESSION—PROPERTY OF HUSBAND.

Possession of personal property by a wife is the possession of the husband in law and makes the property his, nothing appearing to show it to be the separate property of the wife.

7. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 110*)—SEPARATE ESTATE—RIGHTS OF WIFE.

A wife may hold a separate estate free from debts, contracts, and control of her husband with power of disposition by will or otherwise.

8. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 116*)—SEPARATE ESTATE—PERSONAL PROPERTY.

A separate estate in personal property may be created in a married woman not only by writing but by parol gift, though, if the gift is from a stranger, the intention to create a separate estate must usually appear from the donor's express language, while, in case of a gift by husband to wife, the intent to include his own rights is inferred from the relation of the parties.

9. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 116*)—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—EARNINGS OF HUSBAND.

Where a husband currently gave his earnings to his wife which she deposited in a bank in her own name, because of the husband's belief that she would outlive him, and because he knew she would take care of it for him, there was no sufficient gift of the money to the wife as of her separate estate to entitle her to dispose of it by will.

10. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 127*)—WIFE'S REAL ESTATE—HUSBAND'S RELATION—EFFECT.

Where a husband by deed released all his right, title, and interest in law and equity in real estate devised to his wife, the husband thereby surrendered all claim to the rents and to damages collected for injuries thereto, so that such items constituted the wife's separate estate.

11. WILLS (§ 428*)—WILL OF WIFE—PROBATE—CONCLUSIVENESS ON HUSBAND.

Where a husband, with knowledge of an existing will of his wife, took out letters of administration and reduced to possession a bank deposit in her name, the husband was not precluded by the subsequent probate of the will to challenge her right, in a proceeding by her administrator with the will annexed against him to recover the sum so appropriated, to dispose of such property on the theory that it belonged to him by right of the marriage, or to defeat his right to administer her estate.

12. WILLS (§ 428*)—WILL OF WIFE—RIGHTS OF HUSBAND.

Where a wife attempted to dispose by will of her personal property which was not distinctly impressed with the character of a separate estate, her husband was entitled to ignore the will and to qualify as his deceased wife's administrator, and reduce to possession any choses in action of which she died possessed.

Certiorari to Court of Civil Appeals.

Action by A. J. Williford, as administrator with the will annexed of Elizabeth Phelan, deceased, against J. J. Phelan. Decree for complainant in the chancery court of Shelby county was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals, and defendant brings certiorari. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Lee Thornton, for complainant. Canada & Phelan and McFarland & Canada, for defendant.

McALISTER, J. Complainant, as administrator with the will annexed of Mrs. Elizabeth Phelan, deceased, filed this bill to recover of J. J. Phelan, surviving husband and the original administrator of the said Elizabeth, the sum of $1,026 alleged to have been unlawfully appropriated by him. Mrs. Elizabeth Phelan died in the city of Memphis on June 19, 1905, leaving surviving her, her husband, J. J. Phelan, and their infant child Angela, born October 19, 1903. Shortly after the death of said Elizabeth, her husband, J. J. Phelan, qualified as her administrator and collected from the Union & Planters' Bank two certificates of deposit in the name of his wife, aggregating the sum of $1,189.37. There were no creditors of the estate, excepting the amount due for funeral and administration expenses, amounting to $162.75, and after the payment of these sums, the administrator receipted for the balance, to wit, $1,026.82, as distributee and husband of the decedent. The present administrator with the will annexed has brought this suit to recover of the said J. J. Phelan this sum of $1,026.82 and as a basis of recovery exhibits a will made and executed by the said Elizabeth in Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, on August 1, 1901, wherein she bequeathed and devised all of her estate equally to her husband, her father, her two brothers, and her sister. The estate of the testatrix consisted of the bank deposit already mentioned, and certain real estate situated in Hamilton, Canada, and in Shelby county, Tenn. The infant daughter, Angela, was not born until about 14 months after the execution of the will, and, of course was not mentioned therein. The theory of the present bill is that the bank deposit appropriated by the husband as administrator did not belong to him, but passed to the legatees mentioned in the will of the said Elizabeth Phelan. The defendant, J. J. Phelan, answered the bill, admitting that he had reduced to possession the bank deposit mentioned, claiming that he was entitled to this fund, first, because it represented his earnings whereof he had constituted his wife the mere custodian; and, second, because as surviving husband it was his right to reduce to possession and retain all choses in action of his deceased wife.

On the hearing the chancellor was of opinion that the defendant Jos. J. Phelan was only entitled to one-fifth of the bank deposit collected by him and that the balance thereof belonged to the other legatees mentioned in the will of Elizabeth Phelan. The chancellor accordingly pronounced the decree against the defendant J. J. Phelan and the National Surety Company, his bondsmen, for the sum of $918.52, and the costs of the cause. On appeal the decree of the chancellor was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals, and the cause is here on a writ of certiorari granted by this court at a former day of the term. The defendant Jos. J. Phelan has assigned as error the decree of the Court of Civil Appeals.

It is contended on behalf of the said J. J. Phelan that the will of his wife in which she undertook to dispose of this personal property was void for the reason that it was not her separate estate, but belonged to the defendant as husband jure mariti. In the case of Perry et al. v. Gill, 2 Humph. 218, the rule of common law in respect of the right of a married woman to make a will was stated as follows:

"(1) She can make a will of property which is hers, not yet reduced into the husband's possession; but this with the assent of the husband, not in general, but to the particular will, and in such case the assent avails nothing unless he survive, it being but his waiver of his right of being her administrator.

"(2) Independently of the assent of her husband, a wife has power of disposition by will of her separate property."

It has been supposed that the power of a married woman to execute a will of her personal property has been enlarged by Acts 1869-70, p. 113, c. 99 (Shannon's Code, §§ 4242-4247), but this is a mistaken idea. An attentive examination of this act will show that it was intended to deal exclusively with the power of the married woman in the disposition of her real estate by will, deed, etc.

In Pritchard on Wills, §§ 83-84, the law on this subject is well stated:

"The uniform rule in this state has been to deny to married women testamentary capacity except in certain cases and to enforce the rules of the common law except so far as they have been modified or abrogated by statute. To the wife's testamentary incapacity there were certain exceptions, principally applicable to personal property, which were recognized in England, and which are still recognized in this state, and the rules of common law with respect to real property have been so much modified by statute in this state that coverture has almost ceased to be a disability to making a will of that class of property. Our statutes have been principally directed to conferring on married women powers of disposition of their real estate, and to the enlargement of those powers from time to time, leaving the rules governing their power over personal property undisturbed."

The next inquiry that arises is in respect of the legal status of this bank deposit—whether it was the separate estate of the wife, or whether it was such personal property as belonged to the husband jure mariti. The general principle of the common law is that marriage amounts to an absolute gift to the husband of all personal goods of which the wife is actually or beneficially possessed at the time, or which comes to her during coverture. Prewitt v. Bunch, 101 Tenn. 735, 50 S. W. 748; Wade v. Cantrell, 1 Head, 345; Allen v. Walt, 9 Heisk. 242; Joiner v. Franklin, 12 Lea, 422; Handwerker v. Diermeyer, 96 Tenn. 619, 36 S. W. 860.

The common-law rule that the husband is entitled to receive and reduce to possession during coverture all choses in action, whether in the form of notes, debts, or legacies, belonging to the wife at the time of their marriage or accruing afterwards, prevails in Tennessee. Prewitt v. Bunch, supra; Rice v. McReynolds, 8 Lea, 86.

Personal property in possession, and the possession of the wife in such cases is the possession of the husband, is in law the property of the husband, nothing else appearing to show a separate property of the wife. Prewitt v. Bunch, supra; Wade v. Cantrell, 1 Head, 345; Hollingsworth v. Miller, 5 Sneed, 472; Cox v. Scott, 9 Baxt. 305.

While these principles are well settled, the right of the wife to hold a separate estate free from the debts, contracts, and control of her husband, with the power of disposition by will or otherwise, is also well settled.

"A separate estate in personal property may be created, not only by writing, but by a parol gift. When the gift is from a stranger, the intention to create the separate estate must usually appear from the express language of the donor; but, where a gift of personal property is made by the husband directly to the wife during coverture, the intention to include his own rights is inferred from the relation of the parties without the use of the express words that would be required where a third person is the donor." Pritchard on Wills, § 86.

It remains to apply the principles of law just stated to the facts disclosed in the record. It is conceded that the defendant, J. J. Phelan, was a railroad engineer and received a salary for his services varying from $160 to $200 per month, and that during his married life he turned over to his wife his salary as it was paid him. It is contended, however, on behalf of the defendant, Phelan, that this fund was accumulated in the hands of his wife as mere custodian for the purpose of defraying household and other incidental expenses, and that the surplus belonged to him. It is the theory of the complainant that this fund was an absolute gift from the husband to the wife, and that it thereby constituted her separate estate by implication and intendment of law without the necessity of appropriate words fixing its character at the time it was paid the wife. The proof relied on to show a gift by the husband is as follows:

The defendant, J. J. Phelan, was asked:

"Q. 21. If any, what custom did you have regarding your checks representing your monthly salary?

"A. Always gave them to my wife as soon as I got them.

"Q. 22. If you had any particular reason in doing this, please state exactly what the reason was?

"A. Because she was good and kind, and I knew she would take care of it.

"Q. 23. Did either you or she understand that you were giving her those checks for her own personal use, or merely constituting her custodian for the fund for your common benefit?

"A. I always placed that confidence in her that she was good and kind, and would take care of my money for me.

"Q. 24. Now, Mr. Phelan, your wife, the said Mrs. Elizabeth Phelan, deceased, recognized your right to the fund which you intrusted to her, did she not? State to what extent she recognized such right.

"A. Well, she always gave me whatever I asked her. When I wanted $10, $20, or $30, I always got it.

"Q. I believe you have testified that she did not say in whose name that deposit was being made?

"A. No, sir; I never asked her. I said: 'You always put it in your own name. I will not outlive you.' That was one time that we were talking about it. I merely passed the remark and I didn't expect to outlive her."

We find in this testimony no proof of an absolute gift of the husband's salary to the wife. It was merely his intention to constitute her the custodian of this fund because he "knew she would take care of it," or, as the witness otherwise expressed it, "would take care of my money for me." There is no other proof on this subject in the record.

It appears from the stipulation of agreed facts that:

"Mrs. Elizabeth Phelan at the time of her death was an owner of real estate near the corner of Main street and Iowa avenue in the city of Memphis. That said real estate, together with the sum of $276.18 paid to her about the 21st day of July, 1903, was left her under the will of John Mynehan, deceased, but that said property was not impressed by said will as a separate estate. It is further agreed that on or about the 14th day of November, 1904, Mrs. Elizabeth Phelan collected from the city of Memphis, as damages to her said real property on Iowa avenue occasioned by the construction of a subway, the sum of $1,200 less the sum of $300 paid as counsel fees, and that on payment of said amount she and her husband, J. J. Phelan, executed a joint receipt therefor. It is further agreed that H. H. Roynan, real estate agent, collected rent on said property for several months, paying it over to Mrs. Phelan until March 1, 1903, when she informed him that she would attend to future collections of rent. It is further agreed that the sum of $1,189.57 mentioned in the inventory filed by said J. J. Phelan, administrator, represented collections from the Union & Planters' Bank, in which said Mrs. Elizabeth Phelan held two certificates of deposit, both payable to her order, one for $928.72, dated November 22, 1904, the other calling for $280.85, dated December 1, 1904. It is further agreed that the bank officials state they have no record showing when this money was placed in the bank and no means of knowing where it came from; that it may have been deposited there on above mentioned dates, or the certificates may have been renewals; that the books previous to these debts were placed in the vaults when the bank moved to its present location; and that to hunt them up would entail more time than the bank officials are willing to take."

It thus appears from the agreed statement that not only the salary of J. J. Phelan went into the hands of his wife, but that she also received the sum of $900 as damages to her property on Iowa avenue; that she also received the sum of $276 under the will of John Mynehan, deceased, and that she also collected and received rents upon her property in the city of Memphis; and that she also received from Canada other sums amounting to several hundred dollars. The record fails to disclose the source from which Mrs. Phelan derived the fund of $1,189 deposited to her credit in the Union & Planters' Bank at the date of her death and which is the subject of the present controversy.

In Wood v. Polk, 12 Helsk. 222, it is said: "It is a doctrine of the law long recognized in this state that in a gift of property to a feme covert, if it be the intention of the donor to interfere with the marital right of the husband, that intention must be expressed in the clearest and most unequivocal terms; and, if a doubt exists as to such intention, it must be resolved in favor of the marital right. This right is a favorite of the law, and the courts will protect it in all doubtful cases with the same readiness with which they will foster the independent estate of the wife when the intention to create that is clear."

It is said that the fund that went into the hands of Mrs. Elizabeth Phelan arising from rents of her real estate, the fund derived from the city in liquidation of damages inflicted upon this property, constituted her separate estate for the reason that on December 12, 1903, the said Joseph J. Phelan executed a deed to his wife in which he released all his estate, right, and interest in the real estate of his wife. As we have already seen, this real estate was devised to her by John Mynehan, deceased, but was not impressed as a separate estate by the terms of the will. The release of the husband recited that: "The said Joseph J. Phelan had remised, released, and forever quit-claim unto my beloved wife, Elizabeth Phelan, aforesaid, her heirs and assigns forever, all the estate, right, title, and interest, which at law or in equity I now have or may hereafter acquire as tenant by the curtesy in and to the following described tracts or parcels of land situated in the city of Memphis [describes them]."

And stated:

"That the above mentioned parcels of land, being the same owned at the time of his death by John Mynehan, deceased, late of Shelby county, Tennessee, and by him devised to the grantee herein."

It will thus be observed that the husband, Joseph J. Phelan, not only released every possible interest he may have had in said real estate, but also any interest he might thereafter acquire as tenant by the curtesy in and to this real estate. It appears from the record that the sum of $900 which went into the hands of the wife arose from the settlement of a claim for damages sustained by this real estate, and that the rents that went into Mrs. Phelan's hands were also derived from this real estate. The husband having by deed released all his right, title, and interest both in law and in equity to the real estate, it follows that he also surrendered all claim to rents and damages arising therefrom. It follows that these items constituted the separate estate of Mrs. Phelan; all interests thereto and therein having been released by the husband prior to her death.

But it is impossible to say after a thorough examination of the evidence that this bank deposit arose from the separate estate of the wife. If it be treated as personal property coming into the hands of the wife during coverture, it became the property of the husband jure mariti; or, if the certificates of deposit which represented this fund be treated as choses in action (as they are), the husband had a right, after the death of his wife, to administer on her estate and reduce them to possession. In either event the bank deposit became the property of the husband. It is said, however, that this court must assume that this fund constituted a part of the separate estate of the married woman, and that in the disposition of it she had a right to bequeath it by last will and testament without the consent of her husband. This argument is based upon the fact that the will was duly probated in the county court of Shelby county, and that this probate was not only conclusive of the formal execution of the will, but likewise of the testamentary capacity of the testatrix until it might be decided otherwise on an issue of devisavit vel non in the circuit court. Counsel cites the case of Williams et al., ex parte, 1 Lea. 530, wherein the testamentary capacity of the testatrix was attacked upon the ground of her infancy. The court said:

"The question as to the infancy of the testatrix might undoubtedly have been made upon the offer of the will for probate in the county court, or upon contest in the circuit court, and the judgment of the court establishing the will would, if unreversed, have been conclusive whether the court in fact adjudged that she was of full age, or that an infant might devise realty. In either case it would have been the judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction and in the nature of a proceeding in rem. So that upon principle the probate must be as conclusive of the testamentary age of the testatrix as it is of testamentary capacity in other respects until set aside in the regular mode."

Mr. Pritchard in his work on Wills, § 44, says:

"The probate of a will in the county court is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, operating on the subject-matter and binding generally. In the absence of a fraud and collusion, the probate is conclusive until annulled, as to the capacity of the testator, the testamentary character of the instrument, and its due execution, and not even a court of chancery can inquire into these matters, even though fraud and undue influence in procuring the will are alleged. The only mode in which the probate can be set aside is upon a contest successfully prosecuted upon an issue of devisavit vel non in the circuit court."

It appears that, before the will in question was probated, the defendant, Phelan, qualified as administrator of his wife, and reduced the choses in action to possession. It is true, as disclosed by this record, that the defendant Phelan was informed and knew of the existence of the will of his wife before he took out letters of administration and appropriated the bank deposit in question.

We are of opinion, however, that the husband is not concluded by the probate of his wife's will to challenge her right in this proceeding to dispose of personal property that belonged to him jure mariti, or to defeat his rights to administer on her estate and reduce to possession her choses in action. This is an entirely different question from that decided in Williams, ex parte, 1 Lea. 530. While the probate of the will in that case was conclusive of the formal execution of the will and the testamentary capacity of the testatrix when questioned in a collateral proceeding, the question here presented is the right of the wife by last will and testament to dispose of the property of the husband and to defeat his right to administer on her estate. Under such circumstances the husband had a right to ignore the will, qualify as the administrator of his deceased wife, and reduce to possession any choses in action of which she might die seised and possessed, unless such property was distinctly impressed with the character of a separate estate. We have found no such separate estate in this property, and it follows that the wife had no right to dispose of it by last will and testament. We are therefore of opinion the decrees of the chancellor and of the Court of Civil Appeals were erroneous and are reversed, and complainant's bill dismissed with costs.

STATE v. RICHARDS et al.

1. COSTS (§ 216*)—TAXATION—RETAXATION—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

The taxation of costs is an incident to the suit, and the question of correcting the taxation is for the court which determines the suit, and, where a taxation is erroneous, the costs may be retaxed by such court at the instance of the party aggrieved.

2. COSTS (§ 315*)—TAXATION—RETAXATION—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Shannon's Code, §§ 678, 4954, 7598, 7594, 7598, relating to the taxation of costs, committing to the criminal court and Attorney General in the first instance the taxation of costs in criminal cases with power of the Comptroller of the State and judge of the county court to correct bills of cost before payment, etc., provide a remedy for the correction and retaxation of costs in the criminal court of a county, and the chancery court should not exercise jurisdiction to correct and retax such costs.

3. COSTS (§ 315*)—TAXATION—RETAXATION—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Costs improperly taxed in the criminal court of a county and paid may be retaxed by that court, and the improper amount caused to be refunded, even at a subsequent term of the court.

4. CLERKS OF COURTS (§ 75*)—TAXATION OF COSTS—ACTIONS—ILLEGALLY COLLECTED—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Acts 1903, p. 705, c. 258, § 80, authorizing revenue agents appointed by the Comptroller to sue "by motion or otherwise," delinquent revenue collectors or officers and sue for fees wrongfully certified and received, etc., does not confer any new jurisdiction on the chancery court, but only confers on the revenue agents the power to sue to recover delinquent revenue, and to recover costs illegally collected.

5. CLERKS OF COURTS (§ 75*)—ACTIONS—JURISDICTION—FRAUD.

Since the criminal court of a county is clothed with exclusive jurisdiction to retax costs in cases tried by it, and to pronounce judgment against the clerk and others for costs illegally taxed and collected, the chancery court will not assume jurisdiction of a suit for costs illegally collected by the clerk of the court on the ground of mistake or fraud.

6. EQUITY (§ 51*)—JURISDICTION—MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS.

Where the question of the illegality of costs taxed in the criminal court of a county may be settled by motion in a few cases in such court, equity will not take jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

7. CLERKS OF COURTS (§ 75*)—RETAXATION OF COSTS—REPAYMENT OF COSTS ILLEGALLY PAID—ACTIONS.

Where the state seeks to recover of the clerk of the criminal court of a county and his sureties costs illegally collected by the clerk, petition should be filed in the criminal court under Acts 1903, p. 705, c. 258, § 80, for an account and retaxation of all costs alleged to have been illegally collected.

8. CLERKS OF COURTS (§ 61*)—ACCOUNTING—RETAXATION OF COSTS—REPAYMENT OF COSTS ILLEGALLY PAID.

The question of the liability of the clerk of the criminal court of a county for fines, costs, and Attorney General fees collected and paid to the county trustee, instead of the State Comptroller, should be submitted to the criminal court, and might be embraced in a petition filed in the criminal court for the retaxation of the costs involved therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Clerks of Courts, Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Shelby County; F. H. Heiskell, Chancellor.

Suit by the State against Jerome E. Richards and others. From a decree granting insufficient relief, both parties appeal. Reversed, and bill dismissed without prejudice.

Attorney General Cates and Carroll & McKellar, for the State. Fitzhugh, Biggs & Fitzhugh and Greer & Greer, for defendants.

MALISTER, J. The object of this bill is to recover of the defendant, as clerk of the criminal court of Shelby county, and his official bondsmen, moneys alleged to have been illegally collected by said clerk from the state of Tennessee. It is charged in the bill that said Richards is indebted to the state of Tennessee in the sum of $34,703.04, whereof $32,066.79 had been collected by him from the Comptroller of the State upon illegal bills of costs, and that $2,636.25 is due from him on account of state taxes, fines, and Attorney General fees which had been collected by him and not covered into the treasury of the state. It was further alleged: That the illegal cost bills covered a period extending from the January term, 1906, to and including the January term, 1906, in all nine terms of the criminal court of Shelby county, and that of the amount collected by defendant Richards on account of illegal cost bills, $25,811, had been received by him where no valid judgment for costs therefor had been rendered against the state or return of nulla bona as required by law, although he, the said Richards, presented certificates to the Comptroller showing that such judgments and nulla bona returns had been made.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

That, in order to validate said cost bills, the defendant, after he had collected the amount thereof as above set out, and at the September term, 1906, of said court, procured the entry in said court of nunc pro tunc orders or judgments, and thereby sought at said term of court to have judgment entered against the state for the amount of said bills of costs, when, in fact, no judgments had theretofore been entered so that said nunc pro tunc judgments were void.

That during the period covered by the nine terms of court referred to the defendant Richards collected and received the sum of $11,112.10 in felony cases in which the state was not liable for costs in any event, and that he collected $1,696.90 double costs in the same cases.

That the aforesaid sums were obtained from the state of Tennessee by the defendant Richards upon forwarding to the Comptroller of the State bills of costs purporting to be properly audited by the judge and Attorney General, under and within the statutory law, whereby it is made the duty of said judge and Attorney General to take the cost bills made out and to certify to the correctness after having examined, inspected, and audited the same, and the complainant avers that the aforesaid sum of $25,811.60 was paid by the Comptroller of the State to said clerk upon the faith of the certificate of said officials and upon itemized cost bills made up as the law requires and upon a full reliance upon the fact that these cost bills were in all respects regular. That the items which appeared thereon were proper, and that there had been valid judgments taken in order to justify the certification of the said cost bills to the Comptroller from which to issue his warrants upon the treasury of the state, and complainant avers that, notwithstanding the aforesaid cost bills purporting to have been examined and audited and certified to, they were not based upon a valid judgment for costs against the state of Tennessee; for no valid judgment was ever taken upon an adjudication of insolvency or return of nulla bona as the basis of any one of the cost bills collected under the false certificates of the Attorney General and criminal judge. It was also alleged that the said Jerome E. Richards, as clerk of the criminal court of Shelby county, certified and received from it illegal fees, both in cases where defendants were convicted and where defendants were acquitted under the felony charges in said court; that the amount of said illegal fees so collected by said Richards aggregates the sum of $11,112.10, whereof $3,834 are improper items of charge against the plaintiff in not guilty felonies, and which said amount does not enter into the aforesaid sum of $25,811.59, but in addition to that amount, with interest thereon, the complainant is entitled to recover of said Jerome E. Richards the further sum of $3,834.60. It is further averred that the said sum of $11,112.10 was collected by the said Richards without rendering any service for which he would have been entitled to make a charge, and the items thereof, in part, consist of fees erroneously charged for "entering on record state motions," "entering on record of state orders," "orders remanding the defendant to jail," "judgments for costs," "entering judgment against the state for costs," "entering orders to turn over stolen property," "entering orders for state witnesses to report back," "entering orders to reset cases for trial," "entering orders continuing cases," no one of which items was the defendant Richards entitled to receive, for the very obvious reason that the record books of said court failed to show that proper entries were made, which is a condition prerequisite to the right of defendant to receive costs for the state of Tennessee, the plaintiff herein, and that the plaintiff is therefore entitled to have and recover of the said Richards, not only the aforesaid sum of $25,811.59, but the additional sum of $3,834.60. The complainant further avers that, in addition to the items charged for in the cost bills embracing what purports to be the aforesaid entries set forth in the preceding part of this paragraph, the defendant has charged illegal fees for copying indictments on the records and issuing subpoenas for witnesses, when, under the law, he was not required to issue the same, and that the defendant Richards has charged and collected other fees which he was not entitled to, all of which will be shown on the hearing hereof as a matter of record, not only of the criminal court of Shelby county, Tenn., but of the Comptroller of the State of Tennessee.

The complainant further avers that, in addition to the aforesaid sums, the defendant Jerome Richards is further indebted to the state in an amount aggregating many hundreds of dollars, the precise amount of which plaintiff is not able to state, because he has certified to and collected costs for himself and others wherein the defendants were acquitted of felony charges in cases other than cases of homicide, rape, robbery, burglary, arson, embezzlement, incest, bigamy, larceny, and assault with intent to commit murder; the state not being liable for costs in such cases.

It is further charged that the defendant is indebted to the complainant in the sum of $1,696.90 and perhaps in an amount exceeding that sum on bills of cost certified by him, which he had previously collected, and covering also costs in cases where several defendants were jointly indicted in said court and no severance had as to the individual defendants, and while, under the law, he was entitled to certify and collect only one cost bill, he wrongfully certified and was paid a cost bill for each one of the individual defendants jointly indicted. The prayer of the bill is that:

"The court adjudge and decree that the nunc pro tunc judgments ordered to be entered by the judge of the criminal court of Shelby county, Tenn., on the ——— day of September, 1906, by which it was sought to then take judgment over against the state for costs which accrued in cases of felony convictions, be declared void and set aside and for nothing held; that the court decree that the defendant Richards has collected of the complainant illegal and improper fees, and fees to which he was not entitled, to the amount of $32,086.70; and that the court also decree that the defendant Richards has collected, or should have collected, state tax, state fines, and Attorney General fees, which amount to $2,636.25, and which sums have not been paid to the complainant, and that judgment be rendered against the defendant and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, surety, for the sum of $15,000, the amount of the bond given by him as required by law."

On June 11, 1907, a demurrer was filed to the original bill, which was sustained by the chancellor as to all the demands made by the complainant, excepting the sum of $2,636.25 sought to be recovered by the state on account of taxes, fines, and Attorney General fees, and, as to this latter item, the demurrer was overruled.

On August 31, 1907, the state was permitted to file an amended bill wherein the allegations of the original bill were reiterated and charges of fraud in the certification of said bills of costs were made with more particularity. The amended bill also exhibited transcripts of the bills of costs and other records illustrating the allegations of the amended bill. The demurrer to the original bill was refiled to the amended bill and was by the chancellor sustained except as to that portion of the bill charging an indebtedness of $2,636.25 for state tax, fines, and Attorney General's fees already mentioned. Defendants thereupon filed an answer to that portion of the bill reserved by the chancellor, showing that the items charged consisted of fines and costs which had been paid or worked out by prisoners who had been sent to the county workhouse as provided by law. It was also averred in said answer that these fines and costs, when collected by the superintendent of the county workhouse, were paid over to the clerk of the criminal court, who, in turn, paid them over to the county trustee upon receivable warrants of the judge of the county court. An exhibit was filed with the answer showing the sum of $2,332.25 as the total amount of fines and costs so collected. The answer denied any indebtedness to the state on account of any of said items, but averred that said amounts, excepting certain items therein enumerated, had been paid over to the trustee of Shelby county, Tenn., upon orders of the chairman of the county court, from time to time from the 1st day of September, 1902, until the 30th day of June, 1906. Defendants also filed as Exhibit

O a certificate and receipt duly signed by the chairman of the county court and the county trustee showing that the said amount of $2,332.25 had been paid over to the county, excepting certain small items aggregating about $250, which were fully explained in the answer. On the hearing the chancellor pronounced a decree on the bill and answer against the defendants for the sum of $2,332.25, interest and penalties. The cause is before this court on the cross-appeals of the state and defendant. The state appealed from the action of the chancellor in sustaining the demurrer to the original and amended bills, and the defendants appealed from the decree of the chancellor wherein they were adjudged liable for the payment of $2,332.25 on account of state fines, costs, etc., collected. We shall first notice the assignments of error filed on behalf of the state to the action of the chancellor in sustaining the demurrer to the original and amended bills. The grounds of the demurrer are thus summarized on the brief of learned counsel for the defendant:

"(1) Because said bill does not show that any effort was made in the suits wherein the improper cost bills were collected to have the same retaxed; and only in the court having original jurisdiction and cognizance of these matters was any right ever given to the complainant to collect or recover any of said illegal fees.

"(2) Because the said bill on its face shows that the amounts now claimed against Richards in the present suit were adjudged to be due him in the criminal court of Shelby county, Tenn., and said adjudication having been made in said court, and no motion having been made to retax said costs as provided by statute and no appeal having been taken therefrom, the same cannot be reopened in another forum, and the said cost bills retaxed therein.

"(3) Because it appears from the face of said bill that all the costs collected by the said Richards, and which are sought to be recovered in this cause, were paid to him upon certificates of the Attorney General and judge of the criminal court wherein said cases were tried, and after said cost bills had been examined and certified as required by law; and it is not averred in said bill that the Comptroller did not pay out said money to the said Richards upon said certificates.

"(4) Because the Comptroller of the State of Tennessee by law is made the judge of the correctness of all cost bills, and his decision upon the same is final, and not subject to be reviewed by the courts.

"(5) And, for further ground of demurrer, defendants state that this court has no jurisdiction to correct or pass upon judgments nunc pro tunc returned by a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, where no allegation of fraud in the procurement of said judgment is made in the bill.

"(6) Because the allegations in said bill are vague, indefinite, and uncertain in their nature, and insufficient to justify their specific recovery against the defendants.

"(7) Because it is not shown in said bill wherein and how judgment in said cases against the state of Tennessee were not valid, nor wherein nor how the Attorney General and the criminal judge certified false statements and had issued false certificates and in what respect the said certificates were false.

"(8) Because it appears from the face of said bill that all such amounts were collected from the state of Tennessee from proceedings in another court and in a manner pointed out by statute, and it does not appear that the state of Tennessee, which is a party to said suit, has ever by motion to retax the costs in said causes or otherwise, in said court, undertaken to correct any improper cost bills which may have been collected by the said Richards or to have the same corrected."

The first question to be determined on the assignments of the demurrer is in respect of the jurisdiction of the chancery court to entertain the present bill. The theory of the demurrer is that the present bill is brought for the retaxation of costs that were improperly and illegally taxed against the state by the attorney general and judge of the criminal court of Shelby county. It is claimed in the bill that these costs were not properly chargeable against the state, and were improperly paid by the Comptroller for the reason, first, that no judgment had been taken against the state for said costs on the return of a nulla bona as to the individual defendants. It is further claimed on behalf of the state that a portion of the costs so allowed and paid by the clerk were not a legal charge against the state under the provisions of what is known as the "Jarvis Law." Another reason assigned by the state is that some of these costs had already been collected by the clerk of the criminal court, and some other reasons are assigned why said costs were illegal and not collectible against the state. Our first inquiry is whether the chancery court has jurisdiction to entertain such a bill upon the allegations thus made and to grant the relief prayed. As early as the case of Whitesides v. Rayle, 8 Humph. 205, such jurisdiction was denied. In that case a bill was filed by Thomas Whitesides and others in the chancery court at Tazewell against Wm. Rayle, praying for the collection of a bill of costs in a suit at law between the defendant and complainants erroneously taxed. The defendant demurred to the bill, and the chancellor sustained the demurrer, and the complainant appealed to this court. The court, in part, said:

"It is possible that a case might exist in which, owing to the wrong or fraud of a party in a suit at law, a court of chancery might be clothed with jurisdiction to investigate, supervise, and correct the taxation of costs. But so summary and so ample is the power of a court of common law over the subject that it is difficult to imagine even the existence of such a case. On the other hand, the rule and law of costs is so different in a court of chancery, and the taxation of them so foreign from the habits, studies, and jurisdiction of that court, that for it to take upon itself their adjustment and supervision would indeed be something novel and strange. Moreover, the taxation of costs in any court is but the incident to a suit in such court. There are the process, subpoenas, orders, rules, etc., and all the materials for the proper adjustment of the matter, and there, and there only, it is peculiarly proper that it should be left. How would or could the chancellor get properly before him all these materials? The thing is impracticable, not to say absurd. On grounds, therefore, the most obvious of public convenience, the mere incidental jurisdiction of correcting and adjusting costs, must be left in the forum which investigates and determines the principal matter, the suit itself. So strongly does this court adhere to this principle that it is a settled rule of practice here in chancery cases not to entertain jurisdiction for the purpose of correcting the most erroneous judgment on the subject of costs merely."

See, also, Ross v. McCarty, 8 Humph. 169.

In State v. Goodbar, 8 Lea, 451, the court said:

"The taxation of costs is an incident to a suit, and the jurisdiction of adjusting and correcting the taxation must be left to the forum which determines the suit. If the taxation be erroneous, the cost may be retaxed at the instance of the party aggrieved."

In Troutt v. Railroad, 97 Tenn. 364, 87 S. W. 90, it appeared that certain costs had been illegally taxed and allowed in the court below and this court on appeal was asked to correct the same, but it was held that this court was without jurisdiction unless "a motion has been made in the court below to correct the taxation, the opinion of that court had thereon, and the motion and judgment entered of record. The taxation of costs in the court below belongs to that court."

See Arnold v. State, 96 Tenn. 84, 33 S. W. 723; Clark v. Stull, 1 Shannon's Cases, 660.

It will be observed that the case of State v. Goodbar was decided after the passage of the act of 1877, which enlarged the jurisdiction of the chancery court, and yet the rule on this subject announced in Whitesides v. Rayle, supra, was followed. This line of cases seems to have settled the rule that costs are incident to a suit, and, if illegally or improperly taxed, a motion for correction must be made in the court that had jurisdiction of the suit. This rule would seem to be reinforced when we consider that the examination and certification of bills of costs in the criminal court is committed in the first instance to the Attorney General and the judge of that court with a statutory power lodged in the Comptroller of the State and judge of the county court to review and correct such bills of cost so certified before payment. This matter having been especially committed to the judge and Attorney General of the criminal court, and there being an ample statutory remedy for the correction and retaxation of costs that have been improperly certified, it would seem clear that no such jurisdiction should be exercised by the chancery court.

It is argued, however, that the costs herein have already been collected, and that the statutory remedy embraced in the actions of the Code just cited refer to the correction of costs by motion for retaxation before they are paid. It is said in reply to that, that the state is bound to avail itself of its statutory remedies within a reasonable time, and it is also argued that, even if costs have been paid, they may be retaxed and corrected and caused to be refunded, even at a subsequent term of the court. This seems to have been held in the case of Williams' Lessee v. Henderson, 1 Overt. 424.

It is insisted, however, by the Attorney General that the jurisdiction of such a suit may be entertained by the chancery court by virtue of section 80, c. 258, p. 705, Acts 1903. That act provides, among other things, for the appointment by the Comptroller of three revenue agents for the state, and defines their duties. The particular language of the statute invoked in this case is as follows, viz.:

"They shall have the right to bring suit by motion or otherwise against any delinquent revenue collector or officer in the name of the state, upon order of the Comptroller, or upon their own motion, for any state, school, or county revenues collected and not reported by said officials, or any moneys, revenues, costs, or fees which have been wrongfully certified, received, disbursed or retained by said official or any moneys or revenues which were due the state or county."

In addition to this special act, it is said on behalf of the state that the bill may be retained under the inherent jurisdiction of the chancery court to correct mistakes of fact or to recover money procured to be paid through fraud of the defendant. The theory of the state is that the bulk of this money was paid by the Comptroller of the state under a misapprehension that a judgment had been pronounced against the state on a return of nulla bona against the defendants, and, further, that there were items embraced in said bills of cost which had been theretofore paid, and other items for which the state was not liable under the provisions of the Jarvis law. So far as the act of 1903 is concerned, it does not purport to confer any new jurisdiction on the chancery court. It simply confers upon the revenue commissioners the power to bring suit to recover delinquent revenue and to recover costs illegally collected, by motion or otherwise. It cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended by the use of the word "otherwise" to confer a jurisdiction on the chancery court which had been uniformly denied by the decisions of this court. Nor is this a case in which the jurisdiction of the chancery court may be invoked on the ground of mistake or fraud, or to prevent multiplicity of suits. The remedy for the correction of these errors, as we have already held, is in the criminal court, where the suits were pending, and that court has ample jurisdiction to correct these bills of costs for mistake or fraud. It is not necessary that this acknowledged ground of equity jurisdiction should be invoked in this case, since the criminal court is clothed with exclusive jurisdiction to retax costs and to pronounce judgment against the clerk and others for costs improperly or illegally taxed and collected. Nor do we think a bill in equity is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits, since the questions presented might be settled by motion in a few cases in the criminal court.

The proper practice would be to file a petition against the clerk and his sureties in the criminal court, under section 80, c. 258, p. 705, Acts 1903, for an account and retaxation of all costs alleged to have been illegally collected.

We next proceed to notice the assignment of error filed on behalf of defendants to the action of the chancellor. The chancellor, as already stated, pronounced a decree against the defendants for the sum of $2,332.25 for certain state fines, costs, and Attorney General's fees. The chancellor held:

"That the defendant Jerome E. Richards collected and paid over to the county trustee, under order of the chairman of the county court, certain sums, aggregating $2,332.25, which had been collected on account of fines, costs, and Attorney General fees which should have been paid over to the Comptroller of the State instead of the trustee; that the payment by the clerk to the trustee was made in good faith, and, while the trustee is liable for the amount to the state, the court is of the opinion that the defendant is primarily liable therefor."

We are of opinion that this matter should also have been submitted to the criminal court and may be embraced in any petition which the complainants may see proper to file in the criminal court for the retaxation of the costs involved therein. In a word, the demurrer to the whole bill is sustained for want of jurisdiction in the chancery court to adjudicate the matters presented by the bill. It follows, therefore, that the decree of the chancellor against the clerk and his sureties for the sum of $2,332.50 for certain state fines, costs, and Attorney General fees is reversed, and the entire bill will be dismissed, but without prejudice to present all the matters embraced in the bill by petition or motion to the criminal court. The other matters of demurrer are not adjudicated.

SCHOOLFIELD v. COGDELL et al.

1. MORTGAGES (§ 418*)—COMPELLING FORECLOSURE—RIGHTS OF CREDITOR.

A judgment creditor upon a return of nulla bona can by bill have a matured mortgage upon the debtor's land foreclosed without the mortgagee's consent, and have the surplus proceeds applied to the judgment.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 418*)—COMPELLING FORECLOSURE—SUPPLEMENTAL BILL—RIGHT TO FILE—DELAY.

On a bill to foreclose liens that surplus proceeds might be subjected to complainant's claim, leave to file an amended and supplemental bill showing the existence of other liens when the original bill was filed, and seeking to make the lienors parties, was properly refused, where leave was asked over two years after the original bill was filed and after a master's report of the incumbrances existing when the original bill was filed, and after a sale under the first mortgage was directed.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 418*)—COMPELLING FORECLOSURE—SUPPLEMENTAL BILL—RIGHT TO FILE.

On a bill to foreclose liens that the surplus proceeds might be subjected to complainant's claim, leave to file an amended and supplemental bill, showing the existence of other liens when the original bill was filed, and seeking to make the lienors parties, was properly refused where the filing would have stirred up fresh litigation which would have delayed and embarrassed prior mortgagees in collecting their debts.

4. MORTGAGES (§ 186*)—FORECLOSURE—PRIORITIES.

Where, on a bill to foreclose liens that the surplus proceeds might be subjected to complainant's claim, it appeared that the owner's grantor was to pay prior mortgages out of the purchase money, and that the purchase-money note had never been paid, in fixing the priorities, it was proper not to deduct from the grantor's claim the amount of such mortgages.

5. MORTGAGES (§ 418*)—RECEIVERSHIP—RENTS—RIGHT TO.

That on a bill to foreclose liens that the surplus proceeds might be subjected to complainant's claim a receiver was appointed and rents impounded at complainant's instance does not give him priority in subjecting them to his debt; he having no lien on the property.

6. MORTGAGES (§ 548*)—FORECLOSURE—RENTS—RIGHT TO.

On a bill to foreclose liens that the surplus proceeds might be applied to complainant's claim, the rents were properly apportioned among the several lien creditors according to their priorities, a subsequent mortgagee not being entitled to them where his trustee did not take possession of the land, and the deed of trust did not permit the trustee to collect the rents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1566; Dec. Dig. § 548.*]

7. MORTGAGES (§ 176*)—PRIOR MORTGAGES—NOTICE TO TRUSTEE—EFFECT.

Notice to a mortgagee trustee of a prior unrecorded mortgage is notice to his principal.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Shelby County; F. H. Heiskell, Chancellor.

Bill by A. A. Schoolfield against Elizabeth Cogdell and others. From the decree, complainant and defendant L. L. Pearson appeal, and defendant F. C. Demuth assigns error. Affirmed.

Carroll & McKellar and Hubert Fisher, for complainant. R. M. Heath and Henry Craft, for defendants.

McALISTER, J. The original bill herein was filed on the 11th of June, 1905, for the purpose of rescinding a contract for the sale of a half interest in the growing timber on what is known as the "Pearson tract" of land on the ground of fraud. The bill alleged that W. E. Cogdell had pointed out timber as being on the land bought of Pearson which was not thereon, and that Schoolfield has paid $1,000. He further alleged that L. L. Pearson had a lien on the land for about $7,000 purchase money which would be due some time in December, 1905, and that a deed of trust had been given to secure the same. It was stated in the bill that various incumbrances which were enumerated were still outstanding against the property. It was claimed therein that Schoolfield was entitled to a rescission of the contract and to a lien on the land for the return of $1,000 which he had paid to Cogdell. Complainant also asked for a decree foreclosing all the liens upon the aforementioned property, and to have the proceeds of sale applied in discharge of the indebtedness owing by the defendants in order of priority. It was stated in the bill that the corpus of the property is not sufficient to pay the entire indebtedness due, and that complainant is entitled to the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and rent out the property pendente lite, and to impound the rents and property. The chancellor on the pleadings and proof pronounced a decree in favor of the complainant, Schoolfield, and against the defendants W. E. Cogdell and Elizabeth Cogdell for the sum of $1,000, but held that no lien existed in favor of the complainant for satisfaction of this judgment on the land purchased by L. L. Pearson of the defendants. The bill, as already stated, averred the insolvency of Cogdell and wife, and sought, among other things, a foreclosure of all the liens upon the property known as the "Pearson Tract." A receiver was appointed, who was directed to rent out the Pearson tract and collect the rent. The land was rented out by the receiver for the year 1906, and rents were collected by him approximating $750 on that year. It is also shown that $400 is in the hands of the receiver arising out of the rents for 1905. It appears that while the Pearson land was in the custody of the court through its receiver, R. M. Heath, trustee in the Pearson mortgage, at the instance of Pearson, sold the land, comprising about 653 acres, and it was purchased by Pearson. Pearson thereafter filed a petition, claiming the rents in the hands of the receiver upon the theory that the rents were collected after his purchase. The chancellor further decreed that the costs of the receivership and other costs were payable out of the rents, and directed that the residue be paid over to said Pearson. As already stated, the chancellor denied the right of the complainant to the lien on the land or any part of it, and also decreed that he was not entitled to any portion of the rents. This decree was pronounced on March 19, 1907, and, from so much of the decree as denied complainant a lien on the land and any portion of the rents impounded by him, complainant appealed to the Supreme Court, and assigned the following errors:

"(1) In not affirming that he was entitled to a lien upon the land upon granting a rescission of the contract.

"(2) That it was error not to have ordered a reference to ascertain the amount of the outstanding debts secured by the several mortgages described, and, after judicially ascertaining the several amounts, to have decreed a sale of the several tracts of land pursuant to the prayer of the bill and in accordance with the practice of the court of chancery to have adjudged the priorities among the lienors; and

"(3) In not affirming that the rents accruing subsequent to the appointment of the receiver were applicable to the debt of the appellant against Cogdell and so decreeing."

This court at the April term, 1907, entered the following decree on the errors assigned, viz.:

"(1) That the sale of the lands described in the original bill of A. A. Schoolfield v. Elizabeth Cogdell and Others, by R. M. Heath as trustee, in a conveyance made to him in said lands for the benefit of L. L. Pearson, is null and void, the said lands being at the time of the sale made without the permission of the court, and the decree of the chancellor approving said sale and refusing said land to be sold in these causes is hereby reversed.

"(2) That these causes be remanded to the chancery court of Shelby county, and that the amounts of the several incumbrances upon said land existing at the time the bill of A. A. Schoolfield was filed be ascertained by a proper reference or otherwise, that the said lands then be sold under a proper decree to be entered in said court for that purpose, and that out of the proceeds of said sale the said several incumbrances upon said lands be paid in the order of their priority, to be decreed by the chancellor, and, if a surplus remain, that the same be applied to the satisfaction of the decree granted in said court in favor of A. A. Schoolfield and against Elizabeth Cogdell and W. E. Cogdell.

"(3) That the decree of the chancellor disposing of the rents of the said lands while in the custody of the court in these causes be reversed, and that he make such proper disposition of the same in payment of the costs of these causes and the liabilities of the defendants, W. E. and Elizabeth Cogdell, as may be meet and proper under the adjudications of this court and the equities and rights of the parties in such cases, except that no part of the rents of 1906 will be applied to the payment of the compensation of the receiver for 1905.

"(4) In all other respects the decrees of the chancellor are affirmed.

"(5) The defendant L. L. Pearson will pay all the costs of this appeal for which execution will issue against him and G. H. Gilham, security on his bond for the prosecution of his appeal."

On June 14, 1907, after the remandment of the cause to the chancery court of Shelby county, a decree of reference was entered by counsel for the complainant, directing the master "to ascertain and report the amounts due upon the several incumbrances upon the said land, all of which are set forth in the pleadings herein, and report the same to the court."

It seems, however, that no steps were taken to execute this order of reference, and on September 2, 1907, L. L. Pearson applied to the chancery court for permission to sell under his deed of trust. Accordingly a decree was entered September 2, 1907, allowing such a sale to be made, and appointing R. M. Heath special commissioner to make it. The decree, however, recites:

"The clerk and master will execute the reference hereinbefore ordered, but the sale allowed and directed will not be delayed or suspended by the said reference, as each may proceed independently of the other, and all rights will be hereinafter adjusted by proper decrees."

It appears that a sale of the land was made by R. M. Heath, special commissioner, October 15, 1907, to L. L. Pearson, for $1,000 and reported to the court October 29, 1907. On January 7, 1908, the clerk and master filed his report under the order of reference made June 14, 1907, showing the following debts and incumbrances, as well as the order of priorities, viz.:

Sarah Rickett.....	$1,568 00
Goodman Bros.....	2,243 00
L. L. Pearson.....	7,105 00
F. C. Demuth.....	1,063 65
Mrs. F. P. Haberling.....	548 80
A. A. Schoolfield.....	1,110 00

The clerk and master also mentioned a trust deed to R. M. Heath and Geo. H. Gilham, trustees, to secure L. L. Pearson the sum of $700, saying it was dated and recorded after the Schoolfield bill was filed, and for that reason was not included in the incumbrances reported. The clerk and master also reported that L. L. Pearson was liable for the Sarah Rickett and Goodman Bros. debt. The case coming on to be heard, the chancellor in memorandum opinion held:

"(1) That Mabel Haines (meaning Mabel Haines Francis) could file her petition, and have it reported on instanter.

"(2) The deed of trust securing F. C. Demuth was held inferior to the deed of trust securing L. L. Pearson.

"(3) The Rickett and Goodman Bros. deeds of trust were held to be superior to L. L. Pearson's deeds of trust.

"(4) The rents in the hands of the receiver, less compensation of the receiver, will be applied on claims according to priority like proceeds of land. Pearson will account in same way for rent of 1907.

"(5) The report of the clerk and master, except as indicated in memorandum opinion, was to be confirmed.

"(6) The sale made by R. M. Heath, special commissioner, will be set aside and a sale ordered free from debts—that is, to satisfy all claims according to priority—R. M. Heath to be again appointed special commissioner to make the sale.

"(7) There is no necessity for the amended and supplemental bill of Schoolfield, and the application to file same is denied."

A decree was accordingly entered March 30, 1908, setting aside the sale by R. M. Heath, commissioner, made October 15, 1907, "as the reference had not been executed at the time such sale was made." The decree reappointed R. M. Heath special commissioner, and directed him to again sell the land for cash. The decree of the chancellor fixed the order of priority of the respective incumbrances as fixed by the clerk and master, which have already been stated. This decree further stated that W. E. Cogdell claimed that the debt secured by the A. B. Pittman deed of trust had been paid, but that Mabel Haines Francis claimed such debt was still due her, and that neither Mabel Haines Francis nor A. B. Pittman, trustee, were parties to the suit, and that said Mabel Haines Francis had withdrawn her application to file a petition. It is further stated in this decree that the Walter A. Woods Mowing & Reaping Company in their bill claimed a right to subject the land to two judgments of $471.44 and $240.89, respectively, but that such company was not a party to the suit herein. The decree further held that none of the beneficiaries or trustees in the Sarah Rickett trust deed, Goodman Bros. trust deed, or A. B. Pittman trust deed were parties to this litigation. It was further held that A. A. Schoolfield's application to file an amended and supplemental bill, "if ever proper, was made too late. The same was not contemplated by the Supreme Court of Tennessee, and the results aimed at have been accomplished by the reference herein." The decree further held that the trust deed securing F. C. Demuth was held to be secondary to the deed of trust securing $7,105 to L. L. Pearson. The decree directed the special commissioner in selling the land to announce at the sale the order of priority of the six specified claims aggregating $13,638.45. It was further decreed that, if L. L. Pearson became a purchaser at such sale, he was not to be required to pay any cash unless his bid was greater than the amount of his claim, $7,105, except such cash necessary to pay proper costs of sale. The $7,105 could be used in discharging purchase money; Pearson assuming payment of the Sarah Rickett debt of $1,568 and the Goodman Bros. debt of $2,243. It was further decreed that, while the Cogdells owed L. L. Pearson $810 and $700 in addition to the $7,105, Pearson could not use such debt as a part of the purchase money of the land if bought by him.

It was further decreed that any purchaser of the land would have to take same subject to the rights of Mabel Haines Francis claiming under the A. B. Pittman trust and to the rights of the W. A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Company, if such parties had any rights. The decree held that such parties were not parties hereto, and that their claims which were contested could not be determined herein. The decree further held that the rents of 1906 in the hands of the receiver and the rents of 1907 collected by L. L. Pearson "will be treated as a fund to pay debts of W. E. Cogdell and Elizabeth Cogdell, and will be applied to payment of such debts provided for in this decree. Such rents, however, will not be used in discharging the Sarah Rickett debt and Goodman Bros. debt, as such debts will have to be assumed by any purchaser of the lands. Such rents will be used in discharging anything that may remain due on L. L. Pearson's $7,105, and after sale made as ordered, and any surplus may be used in paying successively and according to priority F. E. Demuth, Mrs. F. B. Haberling, and A. A. Schoolfield. The proper compensation of the receiver will be first deducted out of the rents in his hands."

L. L. Pearson excepted to all the parts of the decree setting aside the sale made to him made October 15, 1907, and decreeing that the rents of 1906 and 1907 should be used in paying debts as decreed. He claimed that the sale of October 15, 1907, should be confirmed, and the rents of 1906 and 1907 be adjudged to belong to him to be applied on the debts of $810 and $700 and $80 due him from the Cogdells. The said L. L. Pearson then prayed an appeal from such parts of said decree and from that part of the decree charging him with costs to the next term of the Supreme Court, which was granted.

A. A. Schoolfield also appealed from the foregoing decree, as well as from the order denying him the right to file an amended and supplemental bill, and that part of the decree applying to the rents and profits, and adjudging costs against him. F. C. Demuth has also sued out a writ of error. The assignments of error filed on behalf of A. A. Schoolfield are as follows:

"(1) The chancellor erred in declining to permit the amended and supplemental bill to be filed by the plaintiff in order to bring before the court the parties owning the mortgage debts secured by the incumbrances upon the property anterior to the Pearson title.

"(2) The chancellor erred in decreeing a sale of the property under the Pearson mortgage.

"(3) The chancellor erred in not charging the defendant Leland L. Pearson with "First. The rents which he received while a mortgagee in possession under a void sale.

"Second. With the prior incumbrances to the amount of the indebtedness (a) to Sarah Rickett; (b) to Goodman Bros.; (c) the indebtedness due to the Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Company.

"(4) The chancellor erred in not applying the rents in the hands of the receiver to the indebtedness due to the complainant.

"(5) The chancellor erred in taxing the plaintiff with any costs conditional or otherwise."

The first assignment of error is based upon the refusal of the chancellor to permit complainant to file an amended and supplemental bill to bring into the record the incumbrances upon the property that were prior to the title of the defendant Leland L. Pearson, who had conveyed the property to Elizabeth Cogdell under a warranty deed. It is said that the filing of an amended and supplemental bill was absolutely necessary in order to ascertain the surplus in the property and subject it to the payment of complainant's debt. It is said that, although prior lienors might object to the foreclosure of their liens before they were matured, yet it nevertheless was a proper proceeding to bring them before the court—citing Cloud v. Hamilton, 3 Yerg. 81.

The rule is well settled in this state that a judgment creditor upon a return of nulla bona has the right by a bill in chancery to have a mortgage upon the land of the judgment debtor which has matured foreclosed, and, without the consent of the mortgagee, to have the land sold, and the proceeds applied, first, to the payment of the mortgage debt, and the surplus to his judgment. Fulghum v. M. C. Cotton, 6 Lea, 590; Craigsmiles v. Hays, 7 Lea, 724; Schultz v.

Blackford, 9 Lea, 434; Wessel v. Brown, 10 Lea, 705; Bridges v. Cooper, 98 Tenn. 394, 39 S. W. 723; McClurg v. McSpadden, 101 Tenn. 436, 47 S. W. 698.

While the complainant had no lien on the land involved in this controversy, nevertheless, as a judgment creditor he was entitled under the well-settled practice to bring before the court all lienors holding incumbrances prior to the Pearson mortgage, and as to all such matured mortgages to have a foreclosure and sale of the property with a view of reaching any surplus arising therefrom after the satisfaction of the mortgage indebtedness according to priorities. This principle was applied on the former hearing of this case in this court, and it was decreed:

"That these causes be remanded to the chancery court of Shelby county and the amounts of the several incumbrances on said lands existing at the time the bill of A. A. Schoolfield was filed be ascertained by proper reference or otherwise."

The original bill herein was filed June 15, 1905, and stated a number of mortgages outstanding on this property and made the trustees parties defendant and in some instances brought the mortgages before the court. After the remandment of the cause by this court on May 28, 1907, the complainant on the 15th of October, 1907, made application to the chancellor to file an amended and supplemental bill bringing before the court, not only the incumbrancers whose mortgages, deeds of trust, and liens were shown in the original bill, but alleging the existence of other mortgages and liens at the date of the filing of the original bill and seeking to make such lienors parties defendant. In some instances the liens of those incumbrancers were claimed to have been paid and settled, and as to them the amended and supplemental bill would have precipitated fresh litigation. As already seen, this amended bill was not sought to be filed until more than two years had elapsed since the filing of the original bill, nor was it presented in the chancery court until more than four months after the remandment by this court, and not until the chancellor had ordered a reference and a report had been made of the incumbrances on the land in controversy in existence at the date of the filing of the original bill. Indeed, the application to file the amended and supplemental bill was not made until the chancellor had pronounced a decree on the 15th of October, 1907, directing R. M. Heath as special commissioner to sell the land under the first mortgage. We are therefore of the opinion that the chancellor properly refused the application of complainant to file an amended and supplemental bill, because, first, of the great delay in presenting it; secondly, it was calculated to stir up fresh litigation as to contested claims of F. C. Demuth, the Wood Mowing & Reaping Company, and Mabel Haines Francis, and thus delay and embarrass prior mortgagees in the collection of their debts. In Fulghum v. Cotton, supra, it was said:

"While we are of opinion that the mortgagee can have no just ground of complaint at a decree of sale after the maturity of the mortgage and in accordance with its terms, yet whether he shall be delayed and prevented from selling is a wholly different question. It would be manifestly unjust where a mortgagee is secured by a prior mortgage, as to which no dispute exists between him and the mortgagor, that the former shall be delayed in his remedy by litigation between the mortgagor and other creditors as to which he has no interest. We should say that in general the mortgagee ought not to be thus delayed and embarrassed, but should be allowed to proceed at once to sale, either under the power of his mortgage or by decree, leaving the other parties to litigate over the proceeds. * * * We think a mortgagee would have a much stronger ground to complain at being thus delayed and embarrassed than in being forced to a sale," etc.

The third assignment of error is based upon the action of the chancellor in fixing the amount of the Pearson mortgage, and in disposing of the rents that Pearson had received. The chancellor fixed the Pearson incumbrance at the sum of $7,105, with interest from the first day of January. It is insisted on behalf of the appellant complainant that the Sarah Rickett mortgage due January 1, 1906, amounting to the sum of $1,568, and the Goodman Bros. mortgage, amounting to $2,243, together aggregating the sum of $3,811, should be deducted from the Pearson debt, for the reason that Pearson undertook and agreed to pay off these incumbrances. This subtraction would reduce the amount of Pearson's indebtedness to $3,294. It appears from the bill that complainants admit that the sum of $7,105 was due Pearson on his mortgage. If Pearson assumed the payment of the Sarah Rickett and Goodman Bros. indebtedness, it is also shown that the Cogdells were to pay Pearson the sum of $7,105, the purchase money of said land, and out of that purchase money Pearson was to pay the Sarah Rickett and Goodman Bros. indebtedness. The Cogdell note to Pearson for purchase money has never been paid.

The fourth assignment of error is that the chancellor erred in not applying the rents in the hands of the receiver to the indebtedness due the plaintiff. When this cause was heard at the last term, the decree of the chancellor in the disposition of the rents was reversed, and it was ordered that he make such proper disposition of the same in payment of the costs of these causes and the liabilities of the defendants W. E. and Elizabeth Cogdell as may be meet and proper, except that no part of the rents of 1908 will be applied to the payment of the compensation of the receiver for 1905. On the last hearing, after the remandment of the cause, the chancellor decreed:

"That the rents for the year 1906 in the hands of the receiver and the rent of the same lands for 1907 collected by L. L. Pearson will be treated as a fund to pay the debts of W. E. Cogdell and Elizabeth Cogdell, and will be applied to payment of such debts provided for in such decree. Such rents will not be used, however, in discharging the Sarah Rickett $1,568 and Goodman Bros. $2,243 debts, as such debts will have to be assumed by any purchaser of the lands. Such rents will be used in discharging anything that may remain due on L. L. Pearson's $7,105 debt after sale made as ordered, and any surplus be used in paying successively according to priority F. C. Demuth, Mrs. E. P. Haberling, and A. A. Schoolfield."

It is contended that the chancellor erred in not applying the rents in the hands of the receiver to the indebtedness due the complainant, Schoolfield. The basis of this contention is that the receiver was appointed and the rents impounded at the instance of the appellant Schoolfield, and that, therefore, he is entitled to priority in subjecting them to the satisfaction of his debt. We do not concur in this contention. The complainant had no lien on the property involved, and was therefore not entitled to assert a prior lien on the rents of the property. An examination of our cases will show that no bill has been maintained to impound rents and subject them to the satisfaction of the indebtedness of a single contract creditor or judgment creditor with no lien on the specific property.

This principle is illustrated in the case of Moore v. Knight, 6 Lea, 438, which was a case involving the vendor's lien, and where rents were sought to be subjected to the satisfaction of unpaid purchase money. Said the court:

"The true ground on which to rest the rights of the vendor are that he has primarily the security of the land for the payment of his debt. If this is not sufficient, after failure of payment by the vendee, and it is shown, either by allegation in the original bill or during the litigation to enforce the lien by petition or application to the court, verified by affidavit, that probably the primary security is insufficient, then when he has retained the legal title he may have a receiver appointed and appropriate the rents to the payment of his debt as an incidental part of his security."

We therefore hold that appellant Schoolfield is not entitled to priority in satisfaction of his claim out of the rents.

It is insisted on the appeal of Pearson that he is entitled to have these rents applied, not to the debt of $7,105, secured by the Cogdell deed of trust, but that they should be applied to the satisfaction of later deeds of trust executed by the Cogdells to secure the $810, $700, and $80 debts due to Pearson from Cogdell. In Cowan, McClung & Co. v. Gill, 11 Lea. 688, the following general rules were recognized as governing the appropriation of rents:

"(1) That 'a trustee holding the legal title to land under a deed of trust to secure creditors, but not in possession, is not entitled to the rents, nor can the same be attached by the beneficiary for the payment of his debt.'

"(2) That 'rents accruing after execution of the mortgage, and before sale, in absence of contract as to same belong to mortgagor.'

"(3) That in Tennessee the mortgage is always treated as a mere security for the debt, and, when the mortgagee is out of possession, it is the corpus of the property, not its rents and profits, which constitute the fund for the satisfaction of the debt.

"(4) That a mortgagee has no specific lien upon the rents and profits of the mortgage land, unless he has in the mortgage stipulated for a specific pledge of them as part of his security."

"(5) 'The general rule is that the mortgagee as against the mortgagor in possession, or, those deriving title under him subsequent to mortgage, is not entitled to a receiver of rents pendente lite.'"

In Lincoln Savings Bank v. Ewing, 12 Lea, 598, the court said:

"In this state it has been invariably held that the legal title to the property conveyed rents in the mortgagee, and he is entitled to the immediate possession unless the mortgage otherwise provides."

In Reed Fertilizer Company v. Thomas, 97 Tenn. 481, 37 S. W. 221, it was said:

"While the instrument does not expressly state who shall have the rents of the real estate during the two years delay, yet we think a fair construction of the instrument is that these rents should go to the trustee just as the growing crops are directed to go. In the absence of any provision for possession, it passes, with the execution of the instrument, to the grantee." Reeves v. John, 95 Tenn. 434, 32 S. W. 312.

"But we think the fair and proper construction of this instrument is that the subsequently accruing rents during the two years' delay passed, like the crops then growing, to the grantee, the grantor remaining in possession as the tenant of the trustee, and responsible to him for the rental proceeds."

Applying these general principles to the facts of this case, it appears that the trustee of Pearson did not take possession of the land involved at the date of the execution of the deed of trust by Cogdell and wife, and that being so, and nothing appearing in the instrument indicating an intention to permit the trustee to collect the rents, it follows that the rents of the property belonged to the mortgagor or grantor Cogdell and wife. But since those rents have been impounded by the court they are now held as a fund for the satisfaction of the claims of creditors primarily who have liens on the land. The chancellor apportioned these rents among these several lien creditors according to priorities, and held that complainant Schofield should not participate in such rents until the satisfaction of these prior lienors. We think there was no error in this disposition of the rents by the chancellor.

We have considered the other errors assigned by Pearson, and find none of them well taken.

The last matter to be noticed comes up on the writ of error sued out on behalf of F. C. Demuth. It appears that on December 21, 1904, W. E. Cogdell and his wife, Elizabeth Cogdell, executed a deed of trust to G. H. Gilham, trustee, which was filed for registration December 22, 1904, and duly recorded. This deed of trust was executed to secure the payment of a note for the sum of $900 due F. C. Demuth for money borrowed of him by the Cogdells. The Pearson deed of trust executed by W. E. Cogdell and his wife, Elizabeth Cogdell, to R. M. Heath and G. H. Gilham, trustees, to secure a note for $6,000 due L. L. Pearson, was dated December 7, 1904, and was not filed for registration until January 25, 1905. It thus appears that the trust deed in favor of Pearson, though executed at a date prior to the execution of the trust deed made to secure Demuth, was not filed for registration until the Demuth deed of trust had been recorded for more than a year. The chancellor was of opinion, and so decreed, that the Pearson deed of trust, though recorded subsequently to the registration of the Demuth deed of trust, was entitled to priority, for the reason that George H. Gilham, trustee for Demuth, had notice of the execution of the Pearson deed of trust when he became trustee for F. C. Demuth. In the argument submitted in this court on behalf of the priority of the Demuth mortgage it is denied that Gilham had any knowledge of the existence of the trust deed to secure Pearson prior to the execution of the Demuth deed of trust. We think an examination of the deposition of Gilham will show that he had knowledge of the unrecorded mortgage executed by Cogdell and wife to Pearson before the $900 loan was made by Demuth. Moreover, Gilham testified:

"I am sure at the time I gave Mr. Demuth all the information I had regarding the title."

W. E. Cogdell also testified that F. C. Demuth, before he loaned the $900 debt, was informed of Pearson's unrecorded deed of trust.

It is certain on this record that Geo. H. Gilham, trustee for F. C. Demuth, when he accepted the trusteeship had notice of the existence of the prior unrecorded mortgage of L. L. Pearson. It was held in Myers v. Ross, 8 Head, 59:

"If * * * the agent or trustee has notice of the prior incumbrance or conveyance, it is notice to the principal."

In that case notice of a prior incumbrance-had been communicated to John Netherland and Chas. J. McKinney. Netherland and McKinney were made trustees in a deed of trust securing a bank. The court said:

"They [the trustees] no doubt believed at the time, as did Ross himself, that he could in a short time adjust the debt with Myers; but this cannot impair the legal effect of the notice. It is difficult to perceive how the beneficiary in a deed of trust can claim the advantage of its provisions without being effected with a notice to the trustees of a prior incumbrance."

The authority of this case has been challenged by counsel, and we are earnestly asked to overrule it. This case has been several times cited in subsequent cases, and especially in the case of Robinson v. Owens, 103 Tenn. 91, 52 S. W. 870.

There is no error in the decree of the chancellor, and it is in all respects affirmed.

MATTOX v. CITY OF BRISTOL.

COURTS (§ 246*)—JURISDICTION—COURTS OF APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Under Acts 1907, p. 233, c. 82, § 7, declaring that the jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals shall extend to all cases brought up from the chancery courts, except cases in which the amount involved exceeds $1,000, and cases involving the constitutionality of statutes, contested elections for office, state revenues, and ejectment suits, the Court of Civil Appeals, not the Supreme Court, has jurisdiction of an appeal from a decree adjudging the rights of the parties in a suit by a riparian owner to restrain the diversion of water from a stream on the ground that it would materially impair the operation of his mill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 246.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Sullivan County; Hal. H. Haynes, Chancellor.

Bill for injunction by John H. Mattox against the City of Bristol. From the decree, complainant appeals, and defendant moves to strike the cause from the docket on the ground that the Court of Civil Appeals, not the Supreme Court, has jurisdiction. Motion granted.

NEIL, J. This case is before the court on motion to strike from the docket, because the jurisdiction to determine it is in the Court of Civil Appeals, and not in this court.

The bill alleges, in substance, that the complainant is the owner of a mill located on Sinking creek, in Sullivan county, on land belonging to him; that the defendant city is the owner of one of the main sources of Sinking creek, and is a riparian proprietor above complainant's mill, and is engaged in the construction of a system of waterworks for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of the city with water, and is now laying a pipe from one of its old water mains to the chief source of Sinking creek preparatory to the diversion of more than two-thirds of the volume of the waters of the creek, and that this water, after having been so diverted, will not be returned to the stream before it reaches the property of the complainant; and that such diversion will very materially impair the operation of his mill, and greatly lessen its value. The prayer of the bill is for a perpetual injunction to restrain the threatened action of the defendant.

The defendant answered, and admitted that it was engaged in the erection of a system of waterworks for the benefit of its citizens, and that it had purchased certain water rights at the source of Sinking creek from owners there, and was about to divert a portion of the water, but averred that a sufficiency would be left in the stream to operate complainant's mill, and denied that he would be injured by the diversion. The chancellor rendered a decree adjudging the rights of the parties, from which decree the complainant prayed, and obtained, an appeal to this court.

We think the motion should be sustained. By section 7, c. 82, p. 233, Acts 1907, it is provided that the jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals shall extend to all cases brought up from court of chancery, except cases in which the amount involved, exclusive of costs, exceeds $1,000, and cases involving the constitutionality of the statutes of the state, contested elections, state revenues, and ejectment controversies. It is further provided that, in all cases in which jurisdiction is conferred by the act upon the Court of Civil Appeals, appeal shall be taken directly to that court. The present controversy does not fall within either of the excepted classes, and the jurisdiction is therefore in the Court of Civil Appeals.

DUTTON et al. v. MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF KNOXVILLE.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 616*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY—PROTECTION FROM FORESTALLING.

Under Knoxville City Charter (Acts 1907, p. 755, c. 207), giving the city power to regulate the inspection of provisions, to restrain and punish forestalling and regrating of provisions, and to establish and regulate markets, the city had power to prevent the unlawful raising of prices of produce through forestalling by passing an ordinance prohibiting the hawking from wagons of fruit, vegetables, or poultry by others than those raising their own produce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1356; Dec. Dig. § 616.*]

2. WORDS AND PHRASES—"FORESTALLING."

"Forestalling" consists of buying victuals on their way to market before they reach it, with intent to sell again at a higher price.

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"REGRATING."

"Regrating" is the buying of corn or other dead victual in any market and selling it again in the same market.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6035.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 626*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY—UNLAWFUL DISCRIMINATION.

The ordinance was not invalid for unlawful discrimination, since those prohibited from selling belonged to a distinct class from those permitted to sell, the first being those who would violate the law by forestalling and regrating the market, and the others producers of provisions who would sell direct to consumers.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 592*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

The ordinance was not inoperative because the state and county had granted hucksters licenses to those prohibited from hawking in the city, since the licenses would not authorize the licensees to violate a city ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1311-1314; Dec. Dig. § 592.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Knox County; Joseph W. Sneed, Chancellor.

Bill by H. W. Dutton and others against the mayor and aldermen of Knoxville to restrain the execution of an ordinance. A demurrer to the bill was sustained, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Jno. W. Green and F. M. De Armond, for appellants. J. Pike Powers, Jr., for appellees.

NEIL, J. The complainants charge in their bill that they are hucksters, each engaged on his own account in selling from wagons direct to consumers in the city of Knoxville vegetables, butter, eggs, poultry, fruit, and other products of the farm, garden, and orchard; that each has a license from Knox county authorizing him to carry on the trade of a huckster, and has paid to the county the tax fixed by the Legislature for carrying on business of this character; that each is a resident, citizen, and taxpayer of Knox county; that all of the complainants have been engaged in the business referred to for a long period of time, and many of them for years; that this business constitutes their only means of livelihood.

It is further alleged that the complainants buy the articles thus handled by them sometimes direct from the producer, and sometimes on the market; that they do not raise the articles themselves.

It is further alleged that the city of Knoxville affords the principal and practically the only market for the sale of their goods; that, when they took out their licenses from the county court of Knox county, they did so with a view to, and for the purpose of, selling to the people of the city of Knoxville; that a business of this character has been carried on, not only by themselves, but by others for years in the city of Knoxville without arrest.

It is further alleged that the city refused to permit them, or any of them, to carry on the business referred to inside the city limits; that whenever one of complainants begins to sell, or to offer his goods for sale, he is required to cease selling, and, if he persists, he is arrested; that complainants have offered to pay the city authorities, and have tendered to them money to pay for a huckster's license, and not only so, but have agreed to pay any reasonable tax the city might require of them; that the city, however, has refused to accept their money, or to issue licenses to them, and has warned complainants that, if they persist in selling, they will be arrested, and that some of the complainants have been arrested and fined; that the result of this condition of affairs is that the complainants' business has been destroyed, and they have lost their occupation and means of livelihood.

It is further alleged that the defendant, while refusing to permit the complainants to carry on the trade of hucksters inside the city limits, permits any person who grows his fruit or vegetables or raises his poultry or other produce on his own land to carry on the trade of a huckster from wagons in the city of Knoxville without license, and without hindrance.

It is further alleged that chapter 207, p. 755, Acts 1907, incorporating the city of Knoxville, expressly confers the power upon the city to license hucksters, hawkers, peddlers, grocers, merchants, etc.

It is further alleged that allowing persons who raise their own produce to sell the same from the wagons without license, and refusing to allow persons who do not raise the produce which they offer for sale the right to sell from their wagons without license, is an unlawful and unjust discrimination between the complainants and the citizens last referred to.

It is further alleged that such ordinance of the city is void as in violation of the Constitution of this state, and of the United States.

Thereupon the complainants asked for, and obtained an injunction to restrain the execution of the ordinance under which the city is acting.

To this bill the defendant city filed a demurrer, making several points, but we need only notice the following:

That the charter referred to in the bill gave to the city the power "to regulate the inspection of milk, butter and lard, and other provisions and fish and vegetables; to restrain and punish forestalling and regrating of provisions; to establish and regulate markets," and that the right exercised by the city falls within the provisions of the charter just quoted, particularly within the provision against "forestalling and regrating," that the complainants and persons who raise their own produce are not in the same class, but are in a different class, and a discrimination between the two is reasonable and natural.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

We think the chancellor acted correctly in sustaining the demurrer.

The city had the right under its charter to protect its inhabitants against the unlawful raising of the price of the necessities of life, such as would naturally result from the practice of forestalling the market by persons who would buy from the producers of market products for the purpose of resale within the city. "Forestalling" is defined: "Buying vituals on their way to market before they reach it, with intent to sell again at a higher price." 1 Bouv. L. Dict. p. 677. "Regrating" is the buying of corn or other dead victual in any market, and selling it again in the same market, since this enhances the price of the provisions, as every successive seller must have a successive profit. 4 Black, St. Com. In Nightingale's Case, 28 Mass. 168, an ordinance was sustained reading as follows: "That no inhabitant of the city of Boston, or any town in the vicinity thereof, not offering for sale the produce of his own farm, or of some farm in his neighborhood, shall at any season of the year, without permission of the clerk of Faneull Hall Market, be suffered to occupy any stand with cart, sleigh or otherwise; for the purpose of vending commodities in either of the streets mentioned in the first section of this ordinance; and every such person, on being so ordered, shall remove from out of said streets." Responding to the objection that this ordinance was partial because it did not operate upon all of the citizens of the commonwealth equally, but made a distinction between the citizens of Boston and its vicinity and the inhabitants of distant towns in the commonwealth, the court said: "We cannot think that there is any weight in this objection. A regulation of this description could hardly be framed so as to avoid a partial operation arising from local situation and other circumstances. But the partial operation of the ordinance can be no objection to its validity, providing it does not infringe private rights, and it is very clear that it does not. The city government had an undoubted right to prohibit the occupation of a stand in the streets by any one, or by any one not having a license or permission for that purpose from the clerk of the market. In the case of Vanderbilt v. Adams, Treasurer of N. Y. Hospital, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 349, it was decided that an act authorizing the harbor masters to regulate and station vessels in East and North rivers in New York, and imposing a penalty for disobeying their orders, extends to wharves in the hands of private owners, and is not unconstitutional, but is valid as a police regulation. There is certainly nothing contained in the ordinance in question which can be pretended to operate as a violation of private rights; nor does it operate as an improper restraint of trade, but is a wholesome regulation of it, to prevent the market from being unnecessarily thronged and incumbered." 28 Mass. 168, 171. In Louisville v. Roupe the Kentucky Court of Appeals had under consideration a controversy wherein the following facts appeared: An act amending the charter of the city of Louisville authorized the mayor and council, by ordinance, to define the offense of forestalling, regrating, or engrossing, and more effectually to suppress the same by adequate fines and penalties. The tenth section of an ordinance relating to the market prohibited, under a penalty of $20, the sale or offer for sale within any of the market houses, and during market hours, of articles of provision or other kind of marketing which was sold, purchased, or forestalled at any place within the city. The eleventh section of the same ordinance prohibited, under a penalty of $4, any person residing within the city from occupying any part of the market house, during market hours, for the purpose of selling, or offering for sale, any provisions, or any kind of marketing, except vegetables of their own growth, meat of their own slaughtering, or flour, meal or sausage of their make. The court said, in considering the questions thus raised: "The question is whether the city council have power to prohibit and punish the sale in market by a citizen of marketing articles not produced or prepared by himself. The prohibited act implies necessarily that the articles have been, by some means, collected for the purpose of selling them in the market, which, in reference to particular articles, might constitute regrating or engrossing. It furnishes, also, a presumption that the articles have been purchased or contracted for on their way to market which may constitute the offense of forestalling. It may tend, also, to enhance the price in market, which is the great evil apprehended from each of those offenses, and the city council has power to extend the definition of the offense for the very purpose of preventing this evil. We are of opinion, therefore, that the selling at market of articles not produced or prepared by the vendor is so closely connected with the offenses mentioned in the statute, even according to their definition by common and statute law, and constitutes so palpable and convenient a means of committing those offenses, if they do not constitute the offenses themselves, that under the power of defining and suppressing them the mayor and council were authorized to prohibit and denounce penalties against such selling; and that, even if they might have included in the prohibition other persons besides citizens, they were not bound to do so. Wherefore, as the evidence proved without contradiction, that the defendant, a resident of the city of Louisville, did on the day mentioned in the warrant sell in the market, in market hours, large quantities of turkeys, chickens, eggs, etc., and was in the habit of doing so on other market days, and there was no evidence, nor upon these facts any presumption, bringing him within the exception in the ordinance, if as to all the articles he could be brought within the exception, we are of opinion that judgment should have been rendered against him for the penalty, and that the police court erred in dismissing the warrant." 45 Ky. 593.

There can be no doubt of the validity of the ordinance in the present instance, because it falls directly within the terms of the charter of the city.

There is no basis for the complaint of unlawful discrimination because the complainants belong to a distinct class from those persons permitted by the city to sell; the complainants being those who would violate the law by forestalling and regrating the market, and those permitted to sell being the reverse, those who are the producers of provisions and who sell them to consumers at first hand.

The ordinance is not rendered inoperative by the fact that the state and county have granted a huckster's license to each of the complainants. That would not authorize them to violate a city ordinance. Commonwealth v. Fenton, 139 Mass. 195, 29 N. E. 653; Commonwealth v. Ellis, 153 Mass. 556, 33 N. E. 651. Moreover, under their huckster's license, the complainants can sell other things besides the kinds of provisions referred to.

Affirm the decree of the chancellor, with costs.

MEMPHIS ST. RY. CO. v. FLOOD.

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 85*)—PROCESS—SUFFICIENCY.

A warrant issued by a justice of the peace notifying defendant to appear and answer plaintiff "in a plea of damages under $500" does not comply with Code 1858, § 4146 (Shannon's Code, § 5958), requiring a general statement of the nature of the demand sued upon, but it should contain a brief statement sufficient to reasonably notify defendant of what he is called upon to answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 279; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 80*)—PROCESS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Code 1858, § 2815 (Shannon's Code, § 4520), which is among the general provisions of the Code as to the commencement of actions, prescribes a form of summons which does not require the cause of the action to be stated therein, but leaves it discretionary with plaintiff or the officer issuing the same. Code 1858, § 2817 (Shannon's Code, § 4522), provides that a summons from a justice's court shall be substantially the same. Code 1858, § 4146 (Shannon's Code, § 5958), in the chapter especially relating to proceedings before a justice of the peace, prescribes a form of summons which shall contain a general statement of the nature of the demand sued upon. Held, that Code 1858, § 2815 (Shannon's Code, § 4520), is peculiarly applicable to actions begun in a court of record, and so far as it applies to a summons issued by a justice of the peace, and authorizes an omission of a statement of the cause of action, is in conflict with Code 1858, § 4146 (Shannon's Code, § 5958), and that the latter is controlling because found in the chapter especially relating to proceedings before a justice of the peace.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 85*)—PROCESS—WAIVER OF.

Code 1858, § 4119 (Shannon's Code, § 5931), allowing a case to be tried before a justice of the peace by consent of the parties without a warrant, is without avail in an action in which a warrant does not contain a general statement of the nature of the demand sued upon, as required by Code 1858, § 4146 (Shannon's Code, § 5958), where there has been no such consent.

trial in the circuit court, on appeal from the justice's court, without moving to quash the warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shelby County; H. W. Laughlin, Judge.

Action in a justice's court by Carrie Flood against the Memphis Street Railway Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appealed to the circuit court, which court, after verdict for plaintiff, sustained a motion by defendant in arrest of judgment. The Court of Civil Appeals reversed the judgment of the circuit court, and entered judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed.

T. R. Waring, Jr., for appellant. T. F. Kelly, for appellee.

SHIELDS, J. This is an action begun before a justice of the peace of Shelby county by Carrie Flood against the Memphis Street Railway Company. There was a trial before the justice of the peace and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appealed to the circuit court of the county. The trial in that court resulted in a verdict for $250 in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, and its motion was overruled. Thereupon it made a motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the warrant failed to state a cause of action, and was void upon its face. This motion was sustained and judgment entered dismissing the case, from which the plaintiff prosecuted an appeal in the nature of a writ of error to the Court of Civil Appeals. That court reversed the judgment of the circuit court, and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $250 and costs of suit. The case is now before this court to review and reverse the judgment of the latter court. The sole question presented is whether or not the trial judge was correct in sustaining the motion to arrest judgment.

The warrant of the plaintiff is in these words:

"State of Tennessee, Shelby County.

"To any lawful officer to execute and return. You are hereby commanded to summon The Memphis Street Railway Company, if to be found in your County, to appear before me or some other justice of the peace in and for said County, to answer Miss Carrie Flood in a plea of damages under $500.00.

"Given under my hand and seal this 17th day of September, 1906.

"A. J. Williford, J. P."

It appears in the bill of exceptions that when the case was tried before the justice of the peace, under a rule of practice of his court, counsel for the plaintiff and the defendant, respectively, made oral statements of the facts constituting the plaintiff's claim for damages, being a personal injury claimed to have been sustained by her while a passenger upon one of the defendant's cars when the same collided with another car, and the defenses relied upon.

And it further likewise appears that when the case was called for trial in the circuit court, under a rule of that court, similar statements of the cause of action and defenses were made by counsel in all things, as was done upon the trial before the justice of the peace.

The contention of the plaintiff in error is that the warrant fails to state any cause of action upon its face, and is void, and that no valid judgment can be rendered upon it.

That of the defendant in error is that the warrant contains a sufficient statement of her cause of action; but, if it does not, then the defect complained of was cured by the oral statements made in the two courts, and that by these the plaintiff in error was given full notice of the claim sued upon.

The first case decided by this court involving this question called to our attention is that of Parris v. Brown, 5 Yerg. 267. The warrant in that case issued to "summon James Brown to answer the complaint of Solomon C. Parris on a plea of trespass to his damage in a sum under twenty dollars." It did not state the nature of the trespass nor the property trespassed upon. The case was appealed to the circuit court, and there, after verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment because the nature of the trespass and the property trespassed upon were not set out in the warrant, so that the defendant could know what he was charged with. The motion was sustained and the plaintiff appealed to this court. Catron, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"This being the creation of a new jurisdiction, and to be proceeded in summarily, everything necessary to give the defendant a proper knowledge of the charge against him must be stated, so that he may prepare himself for his defense. The cause of action is not properly set forth in this warrant. We think the circuit court decided correctly in arresting the judgment in this case, and are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed."

Afterwards, upon petition to rehear, the Chief Justice further said:

"This tribunal was authorized to imprison the person by force of its process, and yet it is insisted the face of the process need give the defendant whilst in the common jail not the slightest notice why he is there, save that it is at the instance of the plaintiff. And this we are told was supposed necessary by the Legislature, because of the illiterate and ignorant condition of the magistrates of the county. The very extensive jurisdiction conferred is a great contradiction of the assumed grounds of incapacity to state a plain fact. For instance, it is said this action in fact was brought for taking and carrying away the plaintiff's colt. Why was not the defendant told so? Suppose bail had been required. The warrant at first was for $50 damages, and the circuit court caused it to be altered to $20. The constable had put the defendant into jail. He had called on his neighbors to bail him. It is probable, if poor, he could have obtained it. The plaintiff under this warrant could have charged him with any cause of action not barred by time. The cause might for want of obtaining the evidence have been continued a month or more. Suppose he had applied for a writ of habeas corpus to a circuit court judge who had called on the constable for the causes of caption and detention, detention in a common jail, and as the authority this warrant had been produced as containing the cause of complaint and authority to imprison, would any judge have supposed it sufficient? The truth must be that the act of 1829 was passed on the supposition of high intelligence on the part of the magistrates of the country, which, in many instances, in almost every county is true; and, as evidence of the fact, this most unguarded law has been executed with a degree of moderation and even-handed justice, so as to produce rarely a complaint of its rigor. Is it possible to believe that any man in the commission of the peace is so very ignorant as not to be capable of stating on the face of the warrant, not in set form, but in substance, plainly and briefly, that the defendant is summoned to answer the plaintiff on a plea of trespass for taking and carrying away his colt, or for killing his cow or his ox, or for throwing down his fence, or breaking open his house?

"It cannot be that this is requiring too much, when heretofore the courts had jurisdiction, and it was not necessary to set forth in set form in a declaration the whole fact for which the warrant is a substitute; and, if the fact was not well alleged, the judgment was arrested, because no cause of action appeared on the record. In such case the jury formerly found the defendant guilty in form and manner as the plaintiff had alleged against him. So in this case the jury found the defendant guilty of the trespass complained of, and assessed his damage to $15. In giving judgment the court must refer to the case of complaint. Here was none set forth, and no judgment could be given. It is anxiously urged the decision will do great harm, that many causes are depending on general warrants like the present, and that many judgments have been given on such warrants. The defective warrants will be amended if required, and the judgments are all valid, though erroneous."

In Davis v. Parks, 8 Yerg, 260, where the warrant summoned "Parks and Campbell to appear and answer Elisha Davis in a plea of trespass on the case under fifty dollars," the judgment was arrested upon the ground that no cause of action was stated. It is there said:

"This case shows the necessity of requiring a substantial but brief description of the cause of action in cases brought before two justices."

In Kirby v. Lee, 8 Yerg. 438, the warrant in question was held to state a cause of action. The court there said:

"In proceedings before justices against millers, the statute gives an action of debt for the penalty, in which no further description of the offense is necessary in the warrant than to notify the defendant in a plain and sensible manner why he is sued, so that he may bring proof to defend himself. In these causes there is no pleading, the warrant is a mere notice to appear before the justice, and there go to trial viva voce, when the plaintiff must prove his cause of action, giving the justice jurisdiction and authorizing a recovery. But, if the warrant gives no notice of the cause of action, it will be quashed unless amended because the plaintiff might have given in evidence, not that his grist was ground out of turn, but on account of goods sold, work and labor or any other matter, or before the justice one cause of action might be given in evidence, and if insufficient, and judgment went for the defendant, the plaintiff might appeal and in court set up a different demand, and recover the debt and all cost. Did the warrant, therefore, give notice to the defendant Lee of the cause of complaint so that he might come prepared to make his defense? and, second, did it preclude the plaintiff from harassing the defendant with any cause of action he might elect to rely upon at the trial?"

While the warrant was held to state a cause of action in that case, the principle settled in that of Parris v. Brown, supra, was approved and followed.

In Pryor v. Hays, 9 Yerg. 417, the warrant commanded Pryor to "appear before some two justices of the peace for said county and answer the complaint of Mary Ann Hays in a plea of damages under fifty dollars, occasioned by beating and wounding her." It was held good upon the ground that the defendant was given notice of the cause and nature of the plaintiff's claim against him, and the case of Parris v. Brown was again approved.

In the case of Wood v. Hancock, 4 Humph. 465, the question was whether the proof offered was relevant to the cause of action stated in the warrant. This court said:

"In proceedings before justices of the peace the strictness in pleading which is required in courts of record has never been enforced. All that we can expect or demand from these domestic tribunals is such reasonable precision and certainty in their proceedings as may be necessary for the attainment of justice.

"It has often been held by this court that it is not necessary that the warrant should set out the cause of action with that particularity and precision which are required in a declaration in a court of record. Some general statement indicating the ground of action, so that the defendant may not be misled in preparing his defense, is all that is necessary. The warrant does not stand in lieu of a declaration. It is simply a summons to the defendants to appear and answer. The pleadings are ore tenus. And that which in a court of record may be done by proper pleading and proof may, as a general rule, be done before a justice of the peace by the production of the proof alone."

The case of Manning v. Wells, 9 Humph. 746, 51 Am. Dec. 688, also involved a question of variance. It is there said:

"In this warrant the defendant is required to answer on promises. But on the evidence the plaintiff seeks to make him liable for tort. Although we do not hold a justice of the peace to the strictness which is required in proceedings in courts of record, yet we have always held that they must give some general statement of the cause of action. Here the cause of action stated is repugnant to that proved. The evidence was therefore inapplicable to the action."

These cases were all decided before the Code was enacted in 1858, and at a time when there was no statute prescribing the form of a warrant in proceedings before justices of the peace. While it was held that the object and purpose of the warrant was to bring the defendant before the court to answer to suit of the plaintiff, and that the pleadings in the justice's court were ore tenus, yet in every case involving the question it was distinctly and consistently adjudged that the warrant must state the nature and cause of the plaintiff's complaint, so as to give the defendant notice of the general nature of the suit against him, that he might prepare his defense to the same. This is in accordance with sound principle. Indeed, when the question is considered for a moment, every one must be convinced that a summons which does not give the defendant notice of the demand which he is called upon to defend against, and the nature of which he cannot know until the plaintiff has introduced his proof, is practically no notice, and would often work great injustice.

The case of Bodenhamer v. Bodenhamer, 6 Humph. 264, is said to be in conflict with those above cited. The question there was not as to the sufficiency of the statement of the cause of action in the warrant, but that "the form of action was incorrectly stated." The court held, in substance, that, if the warrant gave notice of the nature of the claim sued upon, the form of the action, whether debt, assumpsit, or trespass, stated, was immaterial. In other words, that forms of action as then recognized by common-law pleading did not obtain in proceedings before justices of the peace. This was all that was held in that case, and it is not to any extent in conflict with that of Parris v. Brown, and others following it. The case of Large v. Dennis, 5 Sneed, 596, is limited to the same point.

When the Code was enacted in the chapter relating to proceedings before justices of the peace in civil cases, a form for a civil warrant to be issued by a justice of the peace was prescribed. It is in these words:

"State of Tennessee, ——— County.

"To any lawful officer to execute and return.

"Summon A. B., to appear before me or some other justice of the peace for said county to answer C. D., in a civil action by note (or upon an account or otherwise as the case may be), under ——— dollars. This ——— day of ———, 18——. E. F., J. P."

This form, it is evident from reading it, requires some general statement of the nature and character of the demand sued upon, and, instead of changing the practice outlined by judicial decision and in force previous to the Code, it enacted it into statutory law.

The first case which we have been able to find construing this section of the Code is that of Odell v. Koppee, 5 Heisk. 90, and it is there held in accordance with previous decisions that the warrant must contain some statement of the cause of action sufficient to give the defendant notice of the character of the demand he is called upon to answer. The warrant in that case commanded the officer to summon the defendant to answer the plaintiff, "in an action of damages for a sum under $250," practically the same as in the case at bar, and it was held that a motion in arrest of judgment would have been sustained if seasonably made. The court said:

"Every intendment is to be made in favor of the validity and sufficiency of proceedings before a justice of the peace. Code 1858, § 4176. But, while we cheerfully conform to this mandate of the Legislature in favor of these domestic tribunals, still we must go no further than the law authorizes; nor should we violate the positive requirements of the Code in order to sustain them.

"The form of a warrant by a justice of the peace, as given by the Code of 1858, § 4146, is that it shall be in substance as follows: 'Summon A. B., etc., to answer C. D., in a civil action, by note, or upon open account, or otherwise, as the case may be, under ——— dollars.'

"Here it is plainly prescribed that the warrant is, in substance, to state briefly the cause of action. It has been held by this court, and we think correctly, that there must be some sufficient statement in the warrant to indicate the charge he is to answer. In the language of the court, in the case of Wood v. Hancock, 4 Humph. 467:

'Some general statement indicating the grounds of the action, so that the defendant may not be misled in preparing his defense.' See, also, 9 Humph. 749.

"In this warrant there is no statement at all of any 'cause of action,' but only a claim for damages, but for what cause is not stated. There is no compliance with even the most liberal construction of the law in favor of these proceedings."

The case of Watkins v. Kittrell, 3 Baxt. 42, involved a question of variance between the warrant and the proof, and it is there said:

"If the plaintiff might thus go into proof of this last transaction, he might as well have introduced proof of a dozen different causes of action, and thus without any notice to the defendant take his chances to recover upon any or all of them, at least to the extent of the magistrate's jurisdiction. This, we think, would be in substance to recover, without any warrant at all, as to those causes not in any way referred to in the warrant, and we think it cannot be done."

The necessity of a statement of the cause of action in the warrant and that the proof offered by the plaintiff conform to that statement and be relevant to the issue there presented is recognized in numerous decisions of this court. Sale v. Eichberg, 105 Tenn. 333, 59 S. W. 1020, 52 L. R. A. 894; Harrison v. McMillan, 109 Tenn. 78, 69 S. W. 973.

The last case involving the sufficiency of a warrant, and holding that where no cause of action is stated a motion in arrest of judgment will lie, is the unreported case of Archer v. Railroad Co., in which the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Nell at Jackson in 1904. The warrant required the defendant to appear and answer "in an action to his damage in the sum of fifty dollars." This was held bad, and there decided, if properly made, a motion in arrest of judgment would have been sustained. The court said:

"It is insisted that the failure to state a cause of action in the warrant was cured by the verdict.

"We do not think that this position is well taken. Shannon's Code, § 5958, gives the form of warrant before a justice of the peace, and this form requires the cause of action to be stated in the warrant. See the notes to that section in Shannon's Code. Also Odell v. Koppee, 5 Heisk. 88. The verdict will cure defects in the declaration where the cause of action is imperfectly stated, or where the plea supplies the matter omitted from the declaration (Memphis Gayoso Gas Co. v. Williams, 9 Heisk. 324; Read v. Memphis Gayoso Gas Co., 9 Heisk. 550), but not where no cause of action is stated at all (Cannon v. Phillips, 2 Sneed, 185, 191).

It is urged that the warrant in this case is in the form of the summons prescribed by Code 1858, § 2815 (Shannon's Code, § 4520), which is applicable to proceedings before justices of the peace (Code 1858, § 2817; Shannon's Code, § 4522), and that this form does not require the cause of action to be stated in the summons, but leaves it discretionary with the plaintiff or the officer issuing the warrant. This section is found under the general provisions of the Code in relation to the commencement of actions, and is peculiarly applicable to actions begun in courts of record. So far as it applies to warrants issued by justices of the peace and authorizes the omission of a statement of the cause of action, it is in conflict with the form above quoted, prescribed by section 4146 of the Code of 1858 (Shannon's Code, § 5958), and we think the latter is controlling so far as such conflict exists, because it is to be found in the chapter especially relating to proceedings before justices of the peace, and is specific legislation prescribing and fixing the form of a warrant to be issued in civil cases.

The defendant in error also relies upon Code 1858, § 4119 (Shannon's Code, § 5931), to the effect, that a case may be tried before a justice of the peace by the consent of the parties without a warrant. This can have no application in this case because there was no such consent.

Much stress in the brief of counsel for the defendant in error, and the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals is placed upon statements contained in some of the earlier cases herein quoted from, that the warrant is solely for the purpose of bringing the defendant into court, and that the pleadings before justices of the peace are viva voce. There is nothing in this. These cases were decided before the provisions of the Code prescribing the form of the warrant requiring the cause of action to be therein briefly stated, but in all of them it is distinctly held that the warrant must contain a sufficient statement of the nature of the action. It is therefore evident that, when it is said that the pleadings before the justice of the peace are oral, those subsequent to the warrant are referred to, and such has been the actual practice.

The form of the warrant prescribed by the Code, and the construction placed upon that provision by the subsequent cases construing it, show that it was intended not only as the original process to bring the defendant before the court, but also to, at least to some extent, take the place of a declaration.

We cannot agree with the argument of counsel that the requirement that the cause of action be briefly stated in the warrant is a mere technicality of which courts are now freeing their proceedings in order to reach the justice of controversies. That defendants may have notice of complainants made against them so that they may be able to prepare their defense is of the highest importance to them, and absolutely necessary to prevent surprise and injustice. The provisions of the law requiring such notice are anything but technical or formal in their character. It was held by this court long before the enactment of the Code, as appears from the cases from which we have quoted, that a warrant that did not state the cause of action sufficiently to give the defendant notice of the demand against him was void, and judgment upon the verdict in the circuit court would be arrested in such cases. Such has been the consistent holding of this court. When this rule was first announced, the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace in this state was of very small and insignificant matters. This jurisdiction has been increased and extended greatly since that date, and now includes cases of very great importance. Justices' courts are now of greater dignity and importance, and the public interest and rights of litigants require that their proceedings be conducted in better form and with more regularity and order, and the tendency of legislation and judicial decision is to bring this about rather than the contrary, as insisted by counsel for defendant in error.

The defect in the warrant is not cured by the provisions of Code 1858, §§ 2863-2879 (Shannon's Code, §§ 4583-4600). These provisions in the main relate to the amendment of summonses or other proceedings in civil cases. The legislative intent expressed in them is that no process, pleading, or other proceeding in the action shall be quashed for a formal defect, and in certain cases for those relating to matters of substance, where application to amend is seasonably made. There was no intention to make defective proceedings valid and effective for all purposes. This would amount to the abolition of all laws prescribing forms and rules of proceedings in courts for the purpose of securing orderly and correct administration of justice.

The contention of the defendant in error that the defect in the warrant was cured by the oral statement of the cause of action made upon the trial before the justice of the peace and in the circuit court is also untenable. The proceedings before the justice of the peace could not in any way affect the trial in the circuit court, and need not be further noticed.

The statement of counsel on the trial in the circuit court, however full and explicit of the cause of action, cannot be considered as amending the warrant. Amendments to legal proceedings cannot be made by oral statements. Nor did the defendant waive the defect by going to trial without making a motion to quash the warrant. It is well settled that in an original action brought in the circuit court, if the declaration fail to state a cause of action, the defendant after verdict may move in arrest of judgment, although he may have filed any number of pleas, provided the defect is not supplied by new matter plead by him. If the rule was otherwise, judgment could not be arrested in any case. This is evident from the mere statement of the proposition.

The defendant in error relies upon the case of Utiley v. Railroad Co., 106 Tenn. 246, 61 S. W. 84, to sustain her insistence that the oral statement of the cause of action cured the defects in the warrant. It does not do so. The question involved in that case was not one of pleading, but of evidence. The counsel for the plaintiff at the instance of the trial judge stated the grounds of the suit against the defendant, and the attorney for the latter stated the defense that would be relied upon in such manner as to admit the case made by the plaintiff. In other words, the defense was stated in the form of a plea of confession and avoidance. Acting upon the admission, the plaintiff did not fully prove his case, and, upon the conclusion of his evidence, the defendant demurred thereto. This court held that the defendant was bound by the admission, and that the demurrer should not have been sustained. Thus it will be seen that Utiley v. Railroad Co. presented a question entirely different from that here involved. We are therefore of the opinion that under the long-settled practice of this state, established and consistently adhered to by judicial decision and in the provisions of the Code regulating the practice before justices of the peace, that a justice's warrant must contain a brief statement of the cause of action sufficient to give the defendant reasonable notice of what he is called upon to answer, and that, where the warrant fails to contain such statement, it is void, and upon the trial, on appeal to the circuit court of the state, in absence of an amendment made at the proper time, a motion made in arrest of judgment should be sustained and the suit dismissed.

The warrant of the defendant in error does not comply with this rule. It merely notifies the defendant therein to appear and answer the plaintiff "in a plea of damages under $500.00." This does not give the defendant any information of the nature of the suit brought against it. It could as well be damages for breach of contract, a personal injury, or a trespass committed upon the personal or real property of the plaintiff. Under it evidence could be offered before the justice of the peace to support one cause of action, and in the circuit court on appeal to support another, and in neither court could the trial judge determine whether the proof offered was relevant to the real cause of action. It fails to state a cause of action and the judgment upon the verdict of the jury was properly arrested for that reason.

The plaintiff could have amended her warrant, but made no application to do so. The defendant was not called upon to point out the defect by motion to quash or otherwise. The parties were dealing at arms' length. There was no surprise, and no one was misled. The defendant had as much right to make the motion in arrest of judgment as it would have had in an original action begun in the circuit court in a case where it had pleaded to a defective declaration after verdict against it. There was no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and that of the Court of Civil Appeals reversing it is erroneous, and must be reversed.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Shelby County; F. H. Heiskell, Chancellor.

Bill by the Mercantile Bank of Memphis against B. I. Busby, C. B. Blackburn, and others. Decree for complainant, and defendant Blackburn appeals. Affirmed.

Turley & Turley, for complainant. Caruthers Ewing, C. J. McSpadden, Cary & Rogers, and Lehman, Gates & Lehman, for defendants.

McALISTER, J. The original bill herein was filed on the 23d of May, 1906, against B. I. Busby, C. D. Williford, C. B. Blackburn, and H. L. Williford, on the following note:

"$9,000. Memphis, Tenn. Sep. 2, 1905.

"Six months after date I promise to pay to the order of myself Nine Thousand Dollars at Mercantile Bank, value received.

"B. I. Busby."

The note had the following names indorsed on the back thereof in the following order. viz.:

"B. I. Busby.

"B. I. Busby Co., by B. I. Busby, Pres.

"C. B. Blackburn, Laconia, Ark.

"H. L. Williford.

"Pay American Exchange National Bank, New York, N. Y. or order.

"Mercantile Bank of Memphis, Tenn., W. A. Smith, Cashier, C. H. Raine, Pres."

There was a credit of $1,000 on this note dated April 5, 1905, and this suit was brought to recover the balance due, with interest.

The bill showed that the note was presented for payment at the Mercantile Bank, where it was payable on March 2, 1906, and payment refused, whereupon notice of nonpayment was given to the various parties. The notice to C. B. Blackburn was deposited in the post office at Memphis, Tenn., on March 2, 1906, addressed to E. B. Blackburn, Laconia, Ark. On June 28, 1906, the defendant C. B. Blackburn filed an answer denying his liability as indorser on said note for the reason that notice was not given him of the protest of said note for nonpayment, and also setting up other defenses in his answer, which it is unnecessary to mention. It was averred in his answer that the protest was invalid, and that due notice had not been given him. Defendant Blackburn insisted that he had not resided at Laconia, Ark., for five or six years, but that he had been a resident of Doran, Phillips county, Ark. The answer averred that the notice of protest was addressed to him at Laconia, Ark., and that the first notice he had thereof was "some weeks thereafter when the same was found by respondent at the house where respondent's wife lives in the city of Memphis, and where respondent stays when in said city." The answer further avers that said notice was mailed "to respondent from Laconia on March 2, 1906, by a relative living at Laconia." The answer denied that complainant was the legal holder of the note or was entitled to maintain an action thereon. On the 12th of July, 1906, by permission of the court an amended bill was filed, wherein it was alleged that:

"The B. I. Busby Co. was a Tennessee corporation, in which B. I. Busby, C. D. Williford, C. B. Blackburn, and H. L. Williford were all largely interested. That such parties desired to raise money for it and for their own benefit. With this in view the note in question was made in the form in which it appears. All of the indorsements thereof were made before the note was attempted to be used, and, after being so completely executed, the same was discounted by complainants. The money so borrowed went into the business of B. I. Busby Co., in which the various parties were interested."

The theory of the amended bill is that each and all of the parties to said note are equally bound thereof, and that no protest was necessary and no notice of nonpayment had to be given. On August 27, 1906, C. B. Blackburn filed an answer to the amended bill wherein he admitted that he had been a stockholder in the B. I. Busby Company, but claimed that he was not otherwise interested therein, and insisted he was an accommodation indorser on said note. The answer denied that C. B. Blackburn had ever waived protest and notice, or admitted liability on the note after it fell due.

The Willifords also filed their answers to the bill in which they claimed to be accommodation indorsers on said note. Proof was taken, and on the hearing the chancellor decreed:

"That the $9,000 note is unpaid, except that $1,000 was paid thereon on April 5, 1906, and that another payment of $2,801.16 was made thereon September 5, 1907, which payments are admitted by complainant. This last payment was a collection made of the Columbia Star Milling Co. v. B. I. Busby, before mentioned. Thereupon it is held and decreed as follows:

"(1) That the $9,000 note before mentioned was given for a debt or obligation and for the benefit of the B. I. Busby Co., a corporation in which the said B. I. Busby, C. D. Williford, C. B. Blackburn, and H. L. Williford were stockholders.

"(2) That B. I. Busby, C. D. Williford, C. B. Blackburn, and H. L. Williford were all in law joint makers of said $9,000 note and all liable therefor, and no protest of same was necessary.

"(3) That the negotiable instruments law of Tennessee did not change or affect the liability of the parties to the $9,000 note, but all the parties are liable thereunder as above stated."

It was therefore held and decreed that the Mercantile Bank of Memphis have and recover of B. I. Busby, B. I. Busby & Co., C. B. Blackburn, and H. L. Williford the sum of $6,359.75, said amount being the principal and interest now due on the $9,000 note as aforesaid. The judgment was against all of said parties jointly and against each of them severally. It should have been stated that no decree was pronounced against C. D. Williford for the reason he had been adjudged a bankrupt in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, and discharged from all debts due by him on April 28, 1907, and that thereby he was discharged from all liability on the $9,000 note in suit.

The defendant Blackburn appealed from the decree of the chancellor, and has assigned numerous errors, most of which are based on the action of the chancellor in sustaining the exception of the complainant to certain questions and answers in the deposition of C. B. Blackburn. The main assignment of error, however, is that the chancellor erred in rendering a decree for complainants against the defendant Blackburn and in refusing to dismiss the bill as to him.

The main inquiry presented on the record is whether or not the defendant Blackburn was a joint maker of the note in question, or whether he was an accommodation indorser in the sense of the law merchant. A history of the note in suit will throw much light on this question. The record discloses that the predecessor of the B. I. Busby corporation was the B. I. Busby Company. This company was a firm composed of C. D. Williford and B. I. Busby. As already stated, it was succeeded by the B. I. Busby Company, corporation, chartered in February, 1904. The stockholders and their holdings were as follows:

C. B. Blackburn.....	$5,000 00
B. I. Busby.....	2,500 00
C. D. Williford.....	2,500 00
H. L. Williford.....	9,100 00

It appears that the B. I. Busby Company as a firm owed a $12,000 note to the Mercantile Bank which was indorsed by the Agar Packing Company. The corporation B. I. Busby Company took the stock of goods that Busby and Williford had, drays, mules, accounts, etc., and assumed this indebtedness of the firm. It appears that, when the corporation took over the assets and assumed the debts of the firm, the indebtedness was explained to the stockholders of the corporation. It appears that the note in question was gradually reduced by payments made by the corporation and renewals to $9,000. It appears that at a directors' meeting of the B. I. Busby corporation, November 12, 1904, B. I. Busby, C. B. Blackburn, H. L. Williford, C. D. Williford, and J. S. Hampton were present. The president explained the note of $12,000 indorsed by the Agar packing Company, stating that it was simply the renewal of one he had formerly carried with the same indorsement, and that it was for borrowed money from the Mercantile Bank. He stated that it could not be expected that the Agar Packing Company, would again indorse this paper. It thus appears that C. B. Blackburn, the defendant, was present at the directors' meeting when the nature of this obligation was explained. It appears that another directors' meeting was held January 14, 1905, at which meeting C. B. Blackburn was present. The president stated that he did not want to again ask the Agar Packing Company to indorse this paper. Blackburn in his testimony does not deny that he was present and knew of this announcement. We think from Mr. Blackburn's cross-examination it is evident that he understood that all the notes which had been given in renewal from time to time of the original Agar Packing Company notes, and which were indorsed by the various stockholders of the B. I. Busby Company, corporation, bound all the indorsing stockholders equally. This is our conclusion of the nature of this transaction from an examination of the record. Under the authorities in this state prior to the passage of the negotiable instruments law in 1899, the parties being liable on said note as joint makers were, of course, not entitled to notice of protest and nonpayment. Bank v. Jefferson, 92 Tenn. 537, 22 S. W. 211, 36 Am. St. Rep. 100; Assurance Society v. Edmonds, 95 Tenn. 53, 31 S. W. 168; Logan v. Ogden, 101 Tenn. 392, 47 S. W. 489; Bank v. Lumber Co., 100 Tenn. 479, 47 S. W. 85. In this view of the case, it is an immaterial consideration that the notice of protest was sent to C. B. Blackburn at Laconia, Ark. It is insisted, however, on behalf of the defendant, that this rule has been changed by our negotiable instruments act of 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 152, c. 94), and now a party to an instrument who is not a maker, drawer, or an acceptor is an indorser, and therefore entitled to notice of dishonor. The contention is that when a person's name appears on the back of a note, whether as a regular indorser or as an irregular indorser, he is to be held strictly as an indorser and in no other capacity, unless he clearly indicate by appropriate words written on the note his intention to be bound in some other capacity. The particular sections of the negotiable instruments act relied on are as follows:

"Sec. 63. A person placing his signature upon an instrument otherwise than as a maker, drawer, or acceptor, is deemed to be an indorser, unless he clearly indicates by appropriate words his intention to be bound in some other capacity.

"Sec. 64. Where a person not otherwise a party to an instrument places thereon his signature in blank, before delivery, he is liable as indorser in accordance with the following rules:

"(1) If the instrument is payable to the order of a third person he is liable to the payee and to all subsequent parties.

"(2) If the instrument is payable to the order of the maker or drawer or is payable to bearer, he is liable to all parties subsequent to the maker or drawer.

"(3) If he signs for the accommodation of the payee he is liable to all parties subsequent to the payee."

It is argued that, under the express language of section 63 of the negotiable instruments act, C. B. Blackburn must be deemed to be an indorser of the note in question because there were no written words attached to the indorsement indicating his intention to be bound in some other capacity. It is said this result inevitably follows "unless he clearly indicates by appropriate words," etc.

It is insisted that this construction is reinforced by the language of the succeeding section 64.

Counsel cites Thorp v. White, 188 Mass. 333, 74 N. E. 592, also the case of Downey v. O'Keefe (decided in 1905) 26 R. L. 571, 39 Atl. 929.

On the other hand, it is insisted on behalf of the complainant that the negotiable instruments act merely defined what kind of instrument creates a prima facie liability as indorser, and that the real contract can be shown now just as it could have been shown before the act was passed.

In Bunker on the Negotiable Instruments Law, the author, after referring to section 66 of the negotiable instruments law of Michigan (Public Act 1905, p. 399, No. 265), which is the same as section 64 of the Tennessee act on the same subject, says:

"This section was construed by the Supreme Court of New York in Kohn v. Consolidated Butter & Eggs Co., 30 Misc. Rep. 725, 63 N. Y. Supp. 265. But the case was outside of the statute, in that it was alleged that the maker made and delivered the note to the payee and that thereafter the other defendants indorsed the note."

McAdam, Judge, said:

"The true intention of indorsers as between themselves can always be shown by oral evidence. To go further, and decide that the statute intended to create an incontestible liability against irregular indorsement would be to impute to the legislative wisdom a design repugnant to every notion of judicial procedure, especially in a provision enacted in the interests of law reform."

The case of Corn v. Levy, 97 App. Div. 48, 89 N. Y. Supp. 658, is cited for the proposition that in the state of New York liability created by the negotiable instruments law is simply prima facie.

That was an action upon a promissory note brought against the executors of the first accommodation indorser by the second accommodation indorser who had been compelled to pay a judgment recovered against her upon the note by the payee named therein. The complainant alleged the making and delivery of a note to Kate A. Weichel, which before its delivery to her was first indorsed by the defendant's testator, and then by the plaintiff for the accommodation of the maker. It then alleged presentment, nonpayment, and notice thereof to each of the indorsers; next that thereafter the payee sued the plaintiff as indorser of the note, notice of which action was given to the defendants, and a judgment therein was recovered against the plaintiff for the amount of the note, interest, and costs, which was paid by her. The sum so paid she seeks to recover from the defendants on the indorsement by their testator. Said the court:

"It was formerly the rule in this state that, in the absence of any further agreement, such an indorser would not be liable to the payee of the note. To establish its liability, it had to be shown that he had indorsed the note for the purpose of giving the maker credit with the payee. Phelps v. Vischer, 50 N. Y. 69, 10 Am. Rep. 433. The same would formerly have applied to the plaintiff, whose liability would spring entirely from a special agreement on her part (beyond that which the law implied upon the mere fact of the indorsement) that such indorsement was for the purpose of giving the maker credit with the payee. * * *

Section 114 of the negotiable instruments law of 1897 (Laws 1897, p. 734, c. 612) provides that, where a person not otherwise a party to an instrument places thereon his signature in blank before delivery, he is liable as indorser to the payee, and to all subsequent parties, if the instrument is payable to a third person. Before that provision was enacted, a third party could not be charged as an indorser of a promissory note before delivery, unless the complainant alleged that the indorsement was made in order to give the maker credit with the payee, or that the party indorsed the note as surety for the maker. The omission of such an allegation was held to be a fatal defect in an action to charge such an indorser. The necessity of an averment to that effect appears no longer to exist. However, in view of the plain language of section 114 of the negotiable instrument law, it seems to require nothing more than the simple fact of the indorsement to render the defendant prima facie liable in such a case. McMoran v. Lange, 25 App. Div. 11, 49 N. Y. Supp. 310.

The cases of Thorpe v. White and Downey v. O'Keefe are cited by counsel for appellant as announcing a contrary rule. In Thorpe v. White (June 19, 1905) 188 Mass. 333, 74 N. E. 592, it appeared:

"The defendant Hannah C. Hand irregularly became a party to the promissory note set forth in the bill of complainant, as before delivery she signed her name in blank on the back of an instrument of which the defendant White was the maker and the plaintiff the payee."

Du Bois v. Mason, 127 Mass. 37, 38, s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 335.

The court said:

"According to the law relating to negotiable promissory notes before Statutes 1898 (Laws 1898, p. 502, c. 533) took effect she was liable as a promisor between herself and the plaintiff, although entitled to notice as if she were an indorser when the note was not paid at maturity by the maker [citing cases]. But, after the negotiable instruments act became operative, the distinction was abolished, and the effect of her signature was to make her an indorser as to all parties."

In Downey v. O'Keefe (January 18, 1905) 26 R. I. 571, 59 Atl. 929, the court said:

"Action on a note by Michael R. Downey against Joseph O'Keefe and another. The note was as follows:

"$275.00 Providence, March 18, 1899.

"Six months after date we promise to pay to the order of Michael R. Downey Two Hundred and Seventy-five Dollars at his office, No. 712 Banigan Building, with interest at 5% per month, value received.

"Joseph O'Keefe,

"Dennis J. O'Conner."

"Upon the back was the signature of John McCann. It was shown in evidence that the note was signed by the makers and delivered to one Hart, the agent of the plaintiff, who took it to McCann, and procured his indorsement. The executor of McCann resisted the suit, and prays for a new trial on the ground that his testator was a mere accommodation indorser, and did not sign until after the delivery of the instrument. * * * It has been uniformly held in Rhode Island until the passage of the negotiable instrument act (Pub. Laws 1898-99, p. 222, c. 674), which does not apply to instruments before July 1, 1899, that one who indorses a note payable to another before its issue is liable to the payee as a joint maker [citing authorities]. It makes no difference whether the signature is actually indorsed upon the note before or after it comes into the possession of the payee, if it is part of the agreement that the note shall be so indorsed to be acceptable [citing authorities]."

We do not think these cases necessarily decide that under the negotiable instrument law an instrument under circumstances like these renders the party absolutely liable as indorser, since no special agreement was shown.

We are of opinion that the real contract between the parties can be shown now as fully as it could have been shown before the passage of the negotiable instrument act, and that, as between the immediate parties, it is not necessary that the indorsement should be accompanied by appropriate words in writing, showing an intention to be bound in some other capacity.

As to innocent holders for value, the rule, of course, would be otherwise, and the statute would apply.

So far from an intention manifested by the Legislature to destroy this well-established rule we think section 63 of said act, providing that the person is to be deemed an indorser unless by appropriate words he is bound in some other capacity, is but a legislative recognition of the rule prevailing at the date of the passage of the act.

There is another reason why notice of dishonor of the note in suit was not necessary to be given the defendant C. B. Blackburn. Section 115 of the negotiable instruments act provides that:

"Notice of dishonor is not required to be given to an endorser in either of the following cases:

"1st. Where the drawee is a fictitious person or a person not having capacity to contract, and the endorser was aware of the fact at the time he endorsed the instrument;

"2d. Where the endorser is the person to whom the instrument is presented for payment;

"3d. Where the instrument was made or accepted for his accommodation."

In our opinion the facts disclosed in this record show that this note was in reality executed for the benefit of every person whose name appears on it. As already stated, it is established in proof that this was an obligation of the B. I. Busby corporation, and that these parties were all stockholders and directors, and that the note was executed for the purpose of renewing an outstanding indebtedness of the corporation. It is in proof that the B. I. Busby corporation received all the assets and assumed all the liabilities of the firm of B. I. Busby & Co. Our conclusion on this branch of the case is that C. B. Blackburn was not entitled to notice of dishonor, since he was a joint maker and equally interested in the note with his co-makers and indorsers. We have also considered the questions made on the alleged alteration of the note, its cancellation, etc., but do not find these assignments of error well taken. It results that the decree of the chancellor must be in all respects affirmed.

AMERICAN STEAM LAUNDRY CO. v. HAMBURG BREMEN FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. Oct. 31, 1908.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 328*)—FORFEITURE OF POLICY—CHANGE OF INTEREST.

One owning a laundry business conducted under the name of a company as a trade-name, insured the property, the policy providing that it should be void if there was any change in the interest, title, or possession of the property, and thereafter sold the business to others, who continued it under the same name, the policy not being transferred to them, and the insurer having no notice of the sale. Held, that the sale forfeited the policy; the contract being personal with the owner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 794, 795, 805-809; Dec. Dig. § 328.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 215*) — "FIRE INSURANCE POLICY"—NATURE OF CONTRACT.

A fire insurance policy is a personal contract for the indemnity of insured, and does not follow the property on its sale, in the absence of an agreement for the transfer of the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 485; Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, p. 2818.]

3. INSURANCE (§ 378*)—FORFEITURE OF POLICY—CHANGE IN OWNERSHIP—CONSENT OF COMPANY—EVIDENCE.

Where the insurer's agent knew that some changes had been made in the insured property, but did not know whether they were changes in interest or physical changes in its operation, and was then trying to cancel the policy, he did not assent to any change in ownership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 378*) — BROKERS—NOTICE TO AGENT.

A broker who effects insurance, without being employed by the insurer, but for a commission upon the premium secured for such risks as the insurer chooses to accept, is not an agent of the insurer so that notice to him would bind the insurer, and hence notice of the transfer of insured property to brokers who effected the insurance and divided the commissions with the insurer's agent would not bind the insurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 974; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Knox County; Joseph W. Sneed, Chancellor.

Suit by the American Steam Laundry Company against the Hamburg Bremen Fire Insurance Company. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Cornick, Wright & Frantz, for appellant. W. S. Roberts and Geo. W. Fox, for appellee.

NEIL, J. On the 24th of August, 1906, the defendant insurance company issued a policy of $1,200 for one year, payable to the "American Steam Laundry Company," insuring certain laundry machines and other machines contained in a building described in the policy. The American Steam Laundry Company was not a corporation, but the term designated a laundry business carried on by one Coram Acuff; the name being used by him simply as a trade-name. Subsequently he sold a half interest to one Wiley, and the latter sold his interest to S. P. Armstrong. After this Coram Acuff sold his remaining interest to C. E. Fox, and these two formed a new copartnership, but still used the name the "American Steam Laundry Company." The policy was not transferred, nor was the consent of the insurance company obtained. The property was simply transferred. However, when the transfer of the latter was made, it was mentioned that the property was under insurance, and the purchasers say they regarded this insurance as an asset of the firm.

The policy contained this provision upon the subject of transfer of interest:

"This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement endorsed hereon, or added hereto, shall be void if * * * any change other than by the death of the insurer take place in the interest, title or possession of the subject of insurance," etc.

The insurance was effected through one Toms, who was an employé of Doll, Mynderse & Brownlee. These latter were not the agents of the insurance company that effected the insurance, but were agents of other companies. The risk was tendered to them, but they did not have any company that was willing to take laundry property, so it was carried to J. E. Lutz & Co., who were agents for the defendant insurance company, and that company took the risk; Doll, Mynderse & Brownlee acting only as brokers in the transaction, and J. E. Lutz & Co. dividing the commission with them.

The negotiation of this insurance took place between Mr. Toms, the employé of Doll, Mynderse & Brownlee, on the one hand, and Coram Acuff on the other. J. E. Lutz & Co. did not at any time know that Acuff had sold his interest in the property, or that Fox and Armstrong had acquired his interest. It is true that a few days before the fire Mr. Toms applied to J. E. Lutz & Co. for a renewal of the policy; the policy which is in suit in the present case having nearly reached its expiration. Lutz & Co. issued the renewal policy, but some days thereafter recalled it. They did not at that time know that Armstrong & Fox had any interest in the property. They were informed that there had been some changes, so they say, but they did not know what changes they were, whether physical changes merely or some other kind. The renewal policy is not in question here. It was taken up. It appears that Lutz & Co. understood themselves as directing Mr. Toms to take up the whole insurance, but he did not so understand them, and only took up the renewal policy.

The question arises only on the original policy, and is this: Are Fox & Armstrong entitled to recover under the facts stated?

They insist that they are entitled to recover because not only was the insurance issued in the name of the "American Steam Laundry Company," but the new firm continued to operate the business under the same name. Moreover, it is insisted that the insurance company paid no attention to the personnel of the man or men running the business, but simply insured under the trade-name, and therefore no real change of risk resulted by the change of the personnel of the men operating under the name.

We think this is a mistaken view. The original transaction was with Coram Acuff, and must be treated as a transaction with him, although he used merely a trade-name instead of his own name. The property having passed to other persons without obtaining the consent of the insurance company, and the transfer of the policy, the property was no longer protected. A fire insurance policy is a contract of personal indemnity made with the individual protected, and does not go with the property as an incident thereto to any person who may buy that property. If it goes at all, it goes as a matter of contract for the transfer of the policy. Quarles v. Clayton, 87 Tenn. 308, 10 S. W. 505, 3 L. R. A. 170; Bennett v. Featherstone, 110 Tenn. 27, 71 S. W. 589.

In the first of these cases the court said:

"By all the authorities a contract of fire insurance is a personal contract, and assures the interest alone of the assured in the property in the absence of some agreement or trust to the contrary; these provisions having been upheld by the courts as reasonable conditions limiting and restricting the liability of the insurer. That they are reasonable is obvious when we consider that the contract is one for the personal indemnity of the assured against a loss affecting the interest in the property covered by the policy. The insurer contracts with reference to the character of the assured for integrity and prudence. He might be very willing to agree to make good the loss of one for the destruction of property owned by him, while he would be unwilling to insure the same property if owned by another.

"Again the contract undertakes to make good any loss which that assured may sustain, and from this it follows that, if the assured has parted with his interest before the loss, he cannot ask to be indemnified because he has sustained no loss."

The opinion continues on page 314 of 87 Tenn., page 507 of 10 S. W. (3 L. R. A. 170):

"The contract is not therefore one which attaches to or follows the property, being one for the personal indemnity of the assured, and, when the insurer does not assent to the assignment of the policy to the grantee of the property, neither the assured nor his assignees of the property can recover upon the policy."

To the same effect, see Insurance Co. v. Manning (C. C. A.) 160 Fed. 385; also the following text-book authorities:

1 Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, p. 211 et seq.:

"In view of the principle heretofore discussed that the insured must have an insurable interest at the time the loss occurs, it may readily be inferred that the termination of the insurable interest of the person insured in the subject of the insurance terminates the policy. This is true irrespective of any provision of the policy providing for forfeiture in case of alienation or other change of interest"—citing cases from the federal courts and the courts of Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Louisiana. It is further said upon page 203 of the same volume: "An absolute transfer of the title of the insured in the subject of the insurance divests him of his entire insurable interest and terminates the policy"—citing cases from the federal courts and the courts of Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. In volume 2, of the same author, at page 1732, it is said that a sale of a part interest in property by an insured to a third person will not terminate a contract of insurance in the absence of a condition against alienation. But, continuing on page 1733, the author says: "On the other hand, a condition against any sale, transfer, or change in title or interest is violated by a transfer of a part interest in the insured premises"—citing cases from Michigan and Texas. See, also, to the same effect, 1 May on Insurance, p. 542; 1 Samson's Digest of Laws of Insurance, p. 95; 3 Joyce on Insurance, §§ 3289, 3290. In Clement on Insurance, p. 517, it is said: "The contract of fire insurance is one of indemnity to the person to be insured, and does not extend to another person or interest without language in or on the policy consenting to same, or covering or including in the description the insured, or the property"—citing numerous cases from various jurisdictions in support of the text.

We do not think it material that the trade-name continued the same. The individuals owning the business were different; just as different as if a different name had been used. The principle above referred to therefore has full operation, regardless of the persistence of the same trade-name.

It is claimed that the company had notice of the change of ownership through the brokers who wrote the insurance. Upon the question of notice: J. E. Lutz & Co. were the agents who wrote the insurance. They were the only agents of the insurance company in the Knoxville territory, and the complainant had notice of this agency, by reason of the fact that they signed the policy as agents of the company. Messrs. Doll, Mynderse & Brownlee were in the general insurance and real estate business. As already stated, the application for insurance having been made to them, and they having no companies who would take the risk, they procured the policy to be issued by J. E. Lutz & Co. The only thing in the record tending to show any notice to them appears in the following excerpt taken from J. E. Lutz' deposition: "Q. Did you, or your firm, or your company, so far as you know, ever have any notice of any change of ownership in the property of complainants after the policy was written, and before the fire, and, if so, state fully what notice you had? A. The only intimation we had was when I went to Doll, Mynderse & Brownlee and asked them for the return of the policy, as we wanted to cancel it. He merely said he would have the policy taken up, and, while I did not state to him my reason for asking him for the return of the policy, he said there had been some changes, but I did not inquire whether physical or otherwise." This was within two weeks of the fire.

It will thus be seen that, so far as the agent of the company is concerned, the only notice he had was some months after the change of ownership, and within two weeks of the fire. He undertook to take up and cancel the policy, and was told at the time that there had been some changes, but was not informed as to whether there was a change in the title or ownership, or whether the changes were physical changes in the property. Certainly he did not assent to the changes whatever they were, since he was endeavoring at that time to cancel the policy now in suit.

There is some question as to whether the brokers had notice, but we think that it is perfectly clear from the evidence that Mr. Toms, who was the employé of Doll, Mynderse & Brownlee, did have a general knowledge of the fact that Fox and Armstrong were the owners of the property, and that this knowledge came to him shortly after they purchased. However, this would not affect the insurance company, since Doll, Mynderse & Brownlee were merely brokers. A case in point and conclusive of the question, when taken in connection with the case immediately following in the same volume, is that of Royal Insurance Co. v. McCrea, Maury & Co., 8 Lea, 531, 41 Am. Rep. 656. The holding of the court in the case last referred to is set out in the syllabus, as follows: "If the general agent of a foreign insurance company who delivers and countersigns a policy, and whose duty it is to endorse on the policy existing or subsequent insurance, has knowledge of such insurance, and is ready to make the endorsement, but postpones doing so to suit his own convenience, when the assured offers to produce the policies for the purpose, and in the meantime the property is destroyed by fire, a condition of the policy requiring such insurance to be endorsed on the policy will be considered as waived, notwithstanding another condition contained in it that the use of general terms or anything less than a distinct specific agreement, clearly expressed and endorsed on the policy, shall not be construed as a waiver of any printed or written condition or restriction therein." In the next case, referring to the former, the court said: "The principal defense, both in this court and the court below, was that of over insurance upon substantially the same proof as in the foregoing case, of the policies issued, their dates, and amounts, and proceedings had thereon. The reply to this defense was not the same as in the previous case, for, although the policy was obtained by the assured through Peck & Cahill, these persons were not the agents of the Royal Insurance Company, and only acted as insurance brokers. A broker who effects insurance under no employment by the insurer, but for a commission upon the premium received for such risks as he procures to be offered and the insurer chooses to accept, is not the agent of the insurer in such sense as to bind the insurer by notice to the agent. Devens v. Mechanics' & Tr. Co., 53 N. Y. 168." Royal Insurance Co. v. McCrea, Maury & Co., 8 Lea, 531, 532, 41 Am. Rep. 656.

Again this court adverted to the subject in Martin v. Insurance Co., 106 Tenn. 523, 528, 61 S. W. 1024, 1025, and quoted with approval the following from Hermann v. Insurance Co., 100 N. Y. 411, 3 N. E. 341, 53 Am. Rep. 197, viz.: "But the authority of a broker employed to procure insurance for his principal, such broker not being a general agent to place and manage insurance on his principal's property, terminates with the procurement of the policy. It cannot in reason be held to continue after the insurance has been procured and the policy had been delivered to the principal. An agent to procure a contract has no power to discharge it implied from the original authority merely. If he possesses that power, it arises from some actual or apparent authority superadded to the mere power to enter into the contract." Grace v. Am. Central Insurance Co., 109 U. S. 278, 3 Sup. Insurance Co.*, 120 Mass. 330; Mechem on Agency; § 931.

We are of opinion therefore that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The chancellor held otherwise, and his decree is therefore reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. RAINEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. March 7, 1908.)

1. CREDITORS' SUIT (§ 28*)—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—TIME FOR FILING.

A creditor may file a petition setting up a claim in a creditors' suit and share in the fund at any time before it has been finally distributed, but he cannot come in at a subsequent term, after a decree has been rendered settling all the controverted questions, for the purpose of reopening the case, and having the questions reheard.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Creditors' Suit, Cent. Dig. §§ 115, 116; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 545*)—RECORD—PETITIONS DENIED—FILING IN LOWER COURT—NECESSITY FOR BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

To make a petition the filing of which was disallowed in the lower court a part of the record on appeal, it must be embodied in the transcript by a sufficient bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2416; Dec. Dig. § 545.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*)—RECORD—PETITION DENIED FILING IN LOWER COURT—PRESENTATION IN DECREE.

Petitions the filing of which were disallowed in the chancery court may be sufficiently embodied in a decree to be presented to the Supreme Court, but the decree must fully recite the nature of the petitions with their material averments, together with the relief sought and the action of the chancellor thereon, and the mere recital that they were filed is not sufficient.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*)—RECORD—PETITIONS FILED AFTER DECREE WITHOUT ORDER OF CHANCELLOR.

Petitions filed in a creditors' suit after final decree and at a subsequent term, without an order of the chancellor, did not thereby become part of the record, especially where the chancellor had declined permission to file them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2342; Dec. Dig. § 518.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 776*)—DISMISSAL—OFFER OF JUDGMENT—PAYMENT INTO COURT OF AMOUNT ADMITTED TO BE DUE.

A party may end litigation in the Supreme Court by agreeing in open court to suffer judgment to be pronounced against him for his opponent's claim, with interest and costs, and he need not pay the money into court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 776.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 780*)—PARTIES—ONE OR MORE SUIING ON BEHALF OF OTHERS—DISMISSAL.

That an appeal in a creditors' suit may not be dismissed because the defendants of record are being sued as the representatives of a particular class of creditors, the bill must show that they were made defendants as representatives of a particular class, especially where the decree granting the appeal shows that they prayed the appeal on their individual accounts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 780.*]

7. BONDS (§ 35*)—OMISSION OF OR EXCESS OF STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS—VALIDITY AS COMMON LAW BOND.

Where a guaranty company voluntarily and for a valid consideration became surety on a public officer's bond, which was not conditioned according to the statute, omitting one prescribed condition and embracing other conditions not required, its bond was nevertheless a good common-law bond, and enforceable to the full extent of the penalty imposed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Cent. Dig. § 340; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

8. OFFICERS (§ 37*)—BONDS—CONDITIONS.

A condition in a public officer's bonds that he will faithfully perform all the duties of his office is a guaranty of the personal honesty of the officer, furnishing indemnity against his defalcations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 54-59; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

9. STATES (§ 110*) — PRIORITY OF STATE AS CREDITOR.

The prerogative right of the sovereign to priority of payment of demands due it in its sovereign capacity was a part of the common law transmitted to Tennessee from North Carolina.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 108; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

10. STATES (§ 110*)—PRIORITY OF STATE AS CREDITOR.

The state is entitled to priority over other creditors of a defaulting public officer in the collection of its delinquent revenue on his bond.

11. COUNTIES (§ 130½*)—PRIORITY AS CREDITOR.

Counties are not entitled to priority over the creditors of a defaulting public officer in the collection of claims on his bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 130½.*]

12. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 255½*) — PRIORITY AS CREDITOR.

Cities are not entitled to priority over other creditors of a defaulting public officer in the collection of claims on his bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 255½.*]

13. INTEREST (§ 39*)—FUNDS IN LITIGATION—LIABILITY UNDER BOND.

Where a surety was liable on a public officer's bond to many creditors, whose claims had not been adjudicated, and filed a bill to have its liability established, it was chargeable with interest on the amount due from the date of the decree adjudging liability, and not from the date of filing the bill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Davidson County; John Allison, Chancellor.

Bill, in the nature of a creditor's bill, by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against Walter S. Rainey and certain of his creditors as representatives of all his creditors to ascertain complainant's liability as surety on the named defendant's official bonds. There was a decree sustaining the bill as a general creditor's bill, ordering publication of notice to creditors to file their claims, and referring the matter to the clerk and master to take proof and report the sums due. Exceptions to the report were overruled by the clerk, but on appeal the decree of the chancellor modified the report giving priority to certain creditors. At a term after the decree was rendered, but before distribution of the fund one of the creditors presented a petition setting up a claim, and was denied the right to file it. Various creditors appeal, and bring error. Reversed and remanded for the statement of another account.

Clarence T. Boyd and E. L. McNelly, for appellant. P. D. Maddin, Sam. N. Harwood, McAllister & Smith, Brown & Akers, P. M. Estes, and Thos. B. Johnson, for appellees.

McALISTER, J. The present litigation was evolved from the defalcation of Walter S. Rainey, clerk of the First and Second circuit courts of Davidson county.

It appears from the record that, when Walter S. Rainey entered upon his duties as clerk of the First and Second circuit courts, he executed three official bonds, one for $5,000 known as the "revenue bond," a second for $10,000, known as the "official bond," and a third for $5,000, known as the "special" or "receiver's" bond, conditioned to cover property or funds which might at any time come to the hands of such clerk as special commissioner and receiver by appointment of the court.

The United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company became surety on each of these official bonds. About January 5, 1901, and before the expiration of his term, the said Rainey was removed from office, and it was ascertained that the liabilities of the office were from $15,000 to $25,000 in excess of the assets, which indebtedness fell upon his surety the guaranty company.

The present bill was filed April 5, 1901, by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against Walter S. Rainey and 27 creditors for the purpose of ascertaining the company's liability as surety on said official bonds.

The suit is in the nature of a creditors bill, and was brought against various creditors of Rainey who might be interested in any fund or funds which may have been paid into the hands of said Rainey as clerk, and for which he was liable on his official bond.

It appears that a few creditors were named as defendants for the purpose of representing all other creditors similarly situated: all the creditors amounting probably to 659 and being too numerous to bring before the court.

It is shown that Rainey was indebted to these various creditors in sums ranging from 10 cents up to $6,000, and it is said that, in order to avoid bringing this large number of persons before the court, 27 individuals were selected, and made parties defendant to represent all the other classes.

Complainant states that it is ready and willing to pay whatever sum may be necessary under said bonds as soon as the proper amount of each bond can be determined, and asked for a complete account of the office and the exact amount due from complainant by reason of said suretyship.

The prayer of the bill is: That complainant be allowed to file this bill as a general creditors' bill in behalf of itself and all other creditors of the said Walter S. Rainey, clerk of the said two circuit courts.

That a general reference to the clerk and master be ordered to take proof and report the cash balance due from each and every case in the circuit courts when said Rainey was removed from office, the source from which the fund arose, and the bond under which he and his surety were to be liable therefor.

That all other liabilities of the office be ascertained and the bond under which he and his sureties would be liable therefor.

That all parties be restrained by injunction from prosecuting suits to recover any amount due from complainant as surety, except in this case, and that all parties having suits pending against said office be required to file their claims and prosecute the same herein.

That all necessary references be had to ascertain the total liabilities of defendant Rainey's office, the total assets, the names of the parties entitled to participation in the assets, the amount of their claims, the proper pro rata to be paid on claims, and all other necessary matters.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

On June 4, 1904, a decree was pronounced by the chancellor sustaining the bill as a general creditor's bill, and ordering publication for creditors to file their respective claims against said Rainey, clerk, on or before the expiration of 60 days from the date of this decree.

Publication was accordingly made in pursuance of the direction of said decree. Answers were filed by the state, county, and city by Len K. Hart and W. B. Clark, county trustees, averring that said Rainey was indebted to said authorities for a large amount of state, county, and municipal taxes which he had failed to pay over.

It appears that several other persons filed answers setting up claims against said Rainey, but most of the defendants named in the bill failed to answer, and orders pro confesso were taken at the rules against 15 out of the 27 creditors named as defendants named. Other creditors from time to time filed petitions presenting claims which they asked to be allowed.

In obedience to the order of reference the clerk and master took proof, and on April 6, 1905, filed his report, in which he set out the official bonds of said Rainey, and also schedules showing all obligations of the office.

The total liabilities of the circuit court aggregated $25,000, summarized as follows:

(1) State tax on litigation.....	$ 118 19
(2) County tax on litigation.....	118 38
(3) State taxes for redemption of property	2,845 24
(4) County and school taxes for redemption of property (Davidson county)	3,262 10
(5) City tax (due Nashville)....	8,702 01
(6) Due sundry persons.....	948 59
(7) Due sundry persons, tax paid twice	23 24
(8) Due David Crutchfield, fees...	284 05
(9) Due Len K. Hart, trustee, fees	1,238 68
(10) Due W. B. Clark, trustee, fees	104 28
(11) Due sundry officers, costs.....	335 53
(12) Due sundry witnesses, costs...	323 78
(13) Due sundry judgments, etc....	6,636 16

Total $25,000 23

The clerk and master also reported a claim in favor of Nolen and Slemons for the sum of $35, which was a deposit paid into the circuit court in the case of Lewis Peel v. Nashville Railway & Light Company.

The master also reported a deposit in the case of Mayor and City Council of Nashville v. Louisville Property Company for the sum of $6,100.

The master also reported the conditions of the several official bonds as follows:

Bond No. 1 for $5,000, known as the "revenue bond," was conditioned as follows:

"Now, therefore, should the above bound Walter S. Rainey truly and faithfully perform all the duties of the office of circuit court clerk for the term of his office according to the requirements of law, and shall faithfully collect and pay over within the time and in the manner prescribed by law, to the Treasurer of the state of Tennessee, or to the proper officer designated by the laws of Tennessee to receive the same, all state taxes by him collected, or that ought to be collected, and also all fines and forfeitures which may or ought to be collected by him, during the said term of office, then this obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

Bond No. 2, for $10,000 as clerk of the circuit court, was conditioned as follows:

"To be void on condition, the said Walter S. Rainey this day inducted into the office of circuit court clerk of Davidson county, safely kept and preserved the records of said court, and faithfully discharged the duties of his office."

Bond No. 3, for $5,000, known as the "receiver's bond," was conditioned as follows:

"To be void on condition that Walter S. Rainey, this day inducted into the office of circuit court clerk of Davidson county, Tennessee, does account for all the property or funds which may at any time come into his hands as special commissioner and receiver by appointment of the court or judge thereof."

Exceptions were filed on behalf of the mayor and city council of Nashville to the report of the master, for the reason that the state was given priority over the city in the satisfaction of its claim for taxes on said official bonds, and claiming that the city was entitled to share equally with the state and county in the penalties of said bonds for the collection of its taxes, and other claims.

Other exceptions were filed on behalf of the city which it is not material to notice.

Exceptions were also filed on behalf of the county of Davidson, which raised substantially the same questions as to priority made by the mayor and city council of Nashville.

Exceptions were also filed by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, and by P. M. Estis and Len K. Hart.

These exceptions were all overruled by the clerk, but on appeal the chancellor modified the clerk's report as follows:

"As to the revenue bond, the court held that items 1, 2, and 3 of the report, including state and county taxes on litigation, and state taxes for the redemption of property, aggregating $3,081.82, should be paid out of bond No. 1, which should then be canceled, and that the entire penalty of bond No. 2, the original official bond for $10,000, was insufficient to meet all claims reported under it, and adjudged that the surety company was liable for the entire penalty of bond No. 2, and that same should be applied, first, to the payment of county and school taxes due Davidson county, Tenn., $2,845; next, to the payment of city taxes due the mayor and city council of Nashville, $8,762.01, less certain claims therein explained."

The result of the decree is that the first three items of the report, aggregating $3,081.82, are to be paid in full, and charged against the $5,000 revenue bond, which is then to be canceled, and that items 4 and 5 for county and school tax for redemption of property and city taxes due Nashville, amounting to $12,024.11, are to be paid out of the $10,000 bond, and that the remaining items, 6 to 13, shall be paid ratably out of the balance, but, as items 4 and 5 far more than exceed the sum of the $10,000 bond, it leaves nothing to be paid on the remaining items.

The material change made by the chancellor in the clerk's report was that he adjudged priority to the county and city for the amount of their taxes, aggregating a little over $12,000, and he released the surety company from the balance on the revenue bond, amounting to $1,919, after charging it with the sum of $3,081.

This decree was rendered January 25, 1906.

It appears that on May 21, 1906, the Louisville Property Company presented a petition in said cause, which was before the fund had been distributed under the decree of the chancellor, but at a term subsequent to the rendition of the final decree.

The petitioner presented a claim for $6,100, which had been paid by the city of Nashville into the hands of Walter S. Rainey, clerk.

The fund, as shown in the petition, arose out of condemnation proceedings by the city against the Louisville Property Company.

It was averred that the property condemned by the city was assessed at $6,100 by the jury of view, and, this amount not being satisfactory to the Louisville Property Company, it demanded a trial by jury for the assessment of the damages. The city thereupon paid the amount assessed by the jury of view into the circuit court; but, before the case was finally tried, the defalcation of Rainey occurred.

The claim in which the Louisville Property Company was interested had been reported by the clerk at $6,100, but it was classified by the clerk under class 13—"due sundry judgments," etc.—and it was not reported as a claim in favor of the Louisville Property Company.

The chancellor, however, declined to permit the petition of the Louisville Property Company to be filed in said cause, indorsing his action thereon as follows:

"Application to file this petition and to intervene was not made in due season, and now comes too late. The court refuses the application on these and other grounds. May 21, 1906."

The following assignments of error were filed on behalf of the Louisville Property Company, namely:

(1) It was error for the chancellor to refuse to allow the Louisville Property Company to file its petition, and set up its claim as a creditor of Walter S. Rainey in this case.

(2) The chancellor was in error in refusing to allow the Louisville Property Company to file its amended petition setting up its claim as a creditor of Walter S. Rainey.

A preliminary question, however, arises on the appeal of the Louisville Property Company, and that is whether said company is properly in the Supreme Court. We think it quite clear that this company had a right, before the final distribution of the funds by the chancellor in the court below, to become a party to said cause, and present its claim.

It is true the petition of said company was not filed until the term following that, in which the final decree was pronounced adjudicating the claim of creditors, and the liability of the guaranty company upon the official bonds executed by it as surety of Walter S. Rainey. However, when this petition was filed, the cause was still in the chancery court, no appeal having been prayed or prosecuted by any creditor, and, as already stated, no part of the fund had been distributed.

The chancellor in our opinion was in error in holding that the petition had not been filed in time. Hurley and Paul, Administrators, v. Jas. M. Murrell's Heirs and Creditors, 2 Tenn. Ch. 620; Latta v. Summerow, 4 Lea, 486; Hearn v. Roberts, 9 Lea, 303; Prewett v. Goodlett, 98 Tenn. 97, 38 S. W. 434; Olcott v. Headrick, 141 U. S. 548, 12 Sup. Ct. 81, 35 L. Ed. 851; Akers v. West, 1 Baxt. 21; 2 Daniels' Chancery Practice, § 1205; Matter of Howard, 9 Wall. 175, 19 L. Ed. 634; Johnson v. Waters, 111 U. S. 674, 4 Sup. Ct. 619, 27 L. Ed. 547.

We think it quite clear under these authorities that in a suit for the administration of an insolvent estate, or for the purpose of subjecting funds under a general creditors' bill, any owner of a claim is entitled to present it, and share in the fund at any time before it has been finally distributed.

But the question remains whether the petition of the Louisville Property Company is properly before this court.

It is conceded that no formal bill of exceptions authenticated by the chancellor is found in the record preserving the petition of the Louisville Property Company. It does appear that counsel for that company prepared and tendered to the court a bill of exceptions embodying the original and amended petition, and requested the signature of the chancellor, but he declined to sign it on the ground, as set forth in the decree, "that all of the proceedings heretofore had in this cause on said petition, and the action of the court thereon, and the exceptions of the Louisville Property Company to the action of the court, all fully appear in the record and on the minutes of the court."

It is said that the original petition was regularly marked "Filed," as also the petition to rehear, and as well the amended petition of the company. It appears that these several petitions were marked "Filed" when they were presented, without an order of the chancellor; and it is now argued that they thereby became parts of the record as if they had been directed to be filed by the chancellor.

It is said that the court simply refused the prayer of the petition, but did not order the petitions to be stricken from the files.

Attention is also called to the fact that the first petition bears the chancellor's signature in refusing its prayer. It is said that the decree of June 5th, which was duly signed by the chancellor, allows the petition to rehear, and, in connection therewith, a substituted petition asking leave of the court to be made a party thereto was filed.

This substituted petition was also marked "Filed." The chancellor declined to allow the amended petition to be filed upon the ground that the application was filed at a term of the court subsequent to the one at which the decree was rendered; thus recognizing, says counsel, that the petition was a part of the records of the court.

It is further said that, when the court granted the appeal in this case, it especially recognized and referred to the petition of the Louisville Property Company to the same extent as would have been done by a bill of exceptions.

The decree referred to recites:

"When the court is pleased to grant the Louisville Property Company an appeal from the decrees heretofore rendered, which refused the Louisville Property Company the right to come in and be made a party to this cause on its petition filed herewith on June 5th, 1906, otherwise as shown by this record."

Now, the argument of counsel is that the marking of the petitions "Filed," and the recital of these petitions in the several decrees of the court, recognize them, and make them a part of the record in the case.

We are unable to agree with counsel in this contention. Under the recognized practice, in order to make a petition, the filing of which has been disallowed in the lower court, a part of the record on appeal, it must be embodied in the transcript by bill of exceptions duly signed and authenticated by the chancellor.

It is true the matters in the petition may be sufficiently embodied in a decree to be presented to this court, but in such cases the decree must fully recite the nature and character of the petition with its material averments, together with the relief sought, and the action of the chancellor thereon. Nance v. Chesney, 101 Tenn. 466, 47 S. W. 690.

The fact that the original and amended petitions were filed in the cause without an order of the chancellor did not make them a part of the record, especially in view of the action of the chancellor in declining to permit them to be filed. Nor did the mere recital in the decrees of the filing of an original and amended petition by the Louisville Property Company, without more, make said petitions a part of the record herein.

An examination of the petition of the Louisville Property Company will show that the object of petitioner was to re-open at a subsequent term of the court a decree that had been pronounced at a former term, wherein the liability of the guaranty company on the respective bonds executed by it as well as the order of priority of the creditor had been adjudicated, and to relitigate all of those questions. We do not understand the rule allowing a creditor to file his petition and participate in the assets of an insolvent administration at any time before a final distribution of the assets authorizes such a creditor to come in at a subsequent term, after a decree has been pronounced settling all of the controverted questions, for the purpose of reopening the case, and having all of said questions reheard and reviewed.

In Allen & Hill v. Shanks, 90 Tenn. 359, 16 S. W. 715, it was said:

"Even an interlocutory decree adjudges rights and settles principles. It is not subject to revision at a subsequent term. * * * But the general rule may be stated to be that if it settles a principle, or adjudges a right, or determines an issue, that in such case it is not open for revision at a subsequent term."

In Forbes v. Memphis R. R. Co., Fed. Cas. No. 4,926, 2 Woods, 334, it is said:

"It is true that the complainants filed the bill in this case on behalf of themselves and of all others being stockholders, creditors, or bondholders of the corporation defendant who might desire, or be entitled, to intervene. But it was never contemplated, nor is it the proper practice, that the persons embraced in that category should intervene to set aside the proceedings, or to interpose obstacles to the progress of the suit. The complainants, by suing as representatives, open the door to all other parties named to come in, and take the benefit of the proceedings and decree, not to oppose and nullify them. In a suit so instituted parties may come in and prove their claims or status, and participate in all the dividends and benefits to be derived from the suit. Rival creditors by proceedings before a master may control the priority of their respective liens, and creditors or stockholders may contest the validity of the claims of other creditors and stockholders, but all in subordination to the general object and purpose of the suit to obtain an administration of the company's assets and property. To be allowed to intervene as general defendants and contestants is another and different thing."

It appearing, moreover, that the petition of the Louisville Property Company was not preserved by a bill of exceptions, nor by decree of the court, it cannot be considered by this court on appeal.

The next question to be considered arises on the appeal of Nolen and Slemmons. As already stated, Nolen and Slemmons were creditors of Walter S. Rainey, and were made defendants to the bill of the guaranty company, and presented in the court below a claim for $35, which represented a deposit paid into the hands of the circuit court clerk in the case of Lewis Peel v. Nashville Railway & Light Company. That claim was allowed by the clerk and master in the schedule of liabilities reported by him, and this allowance was confirmed by the chancellor; but, on account of the priorities adjudged by the chancellor, this claim would only receive a pro rata of 7 cents on the dollar, and for this reason Nolen and Slemmons prayed and perfected an appeal to this court, and have assigned errors. The assignments of error made on behalf of Nolen and Slemmons are directed mainly to the preference given by the chancellor in favor of the state, county of Davidson, and the city of Nashville on the several bonds executed by the guaranty company.

Error was also assigned on the action of the chancellor in adjudging that the surplus of the $5,000 revenue bond could not be subjected to the payment of the claims of the creditors, and in not adjudging interest against the guaranty company on the $5,000 revenue bond, and the $10,000 clerk's bond from the date of the filing of the bill.

Error was also assigned on the action of the chancellor in not adjudging that the two sets of bonds were liable for all the obligations of Rainey as clerk of both the circuit court and the Second circuit court.

It further appears that, before the cause was reached for hearing on the docket of this court, counsel for the guaranty company paid into the registry of this court a check for $35, with interest from January 25, 1906, the date of the decree, and also offered to pay such costs as this court should deem proper, and thereupon moved to dismiss the appeal of Nolen and Slemmons.

This motion is resisted by Nolen and Slemmons on the ground, first, that the amount tendered to the clerk was inadequate. It is said the correct amount of their debt was originally $35, with interest from the filing of the bill April 1, 1901, amounting to $14.35, making a total of their indebtedness $49.35, which was in excess of the amount tendered. In other words, the insistence is that the amount tendered to the clerk was not sufficient; but this court is of opinion that a tender was not necessary to be made, since counsel for the guaranty company in open court and on the brief agrees to pay or to suffer a decree in favor of Nolen and Slemmons for the full amount of their debt, with interest, and also to pay any costs incurred by that firm in the prosecution of its appeal.

A debtor may in this court suffer judgment to be pronounced against him for the amount claimed by his adversary, and ordinarily this ends the litigation without the payment of the money into court. It is not necessary to stop litigation that a litigant shall pay the amount of his adversary's claim, but it is sufficient if he suffers judgment for the claim which his adversary is prosecuting, including the costs incurred in the suit. So that no tender at all was necessary in this case, since the guaranty company, through its counsel, has agreed that Nolen and Slemmons may have a decree against it for the full amount of his claim, with interest and costs.

The second ground on which Nolen and Slemmons resist the motion of the Guaranty Company to dismiss their appeal is that said firm was selected by the complainants below as defendants to represent a certain class of creditors, and that the appeal by Nolen and Slemmons was not simply on their own account, but also on behalf of all other creditors represented by them. The entry of appeal was limited to Nolen's and Slemmons' claim. It is admitted by learned counsel that ordinarily the payment of the claim of a litigant will end the litigation; but it is said that Nolen and Slemmons were designated by the complainants to represent a class, and they are waging a contest in this court on behalf of those creditors as well as themselves, and especially to see that the penalty of the $10,000 bond is prorated to all the creditors, instead of being appropriated exclusively to the payment of the claims of the county and city.

It is further said that no interest was awarded to the creditors represented by Nolen and Slemmons, and they are insisting that the guaranty company should be charged with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the amount of the two bonds, to wit, $15,000, which would make $900 per annum for 6½ years, which would create a fund of about $6,000 additional to be prorated among these creditors.

It is said that if the motion of the guaranty company to dismiss the appeal of Nolen and Slemmons is allowed, the claims of other creditors represented by them will be defeated, except the payment of 7 cents on the dollar allowed by the chancellor in the court below.

An able argument has been submitted by counsel for Nolen and Slemmons in opposition to the motion of the guaranty company to dismiss the appeal of the former.

It is insisted that this case is analogous in principle to those cases in which there are numerous parties constituting a class, and the rights of all are sought to be determined by making a few defendants to represent all.

1 Daniels' Chancery Practice (5th Ed.) 759 (*794), is cited, wherein it is said:

"After a decree has been made of such kind that other persons besides the parties on record are interested in the prosecution of it, neither the plaintiff nor defendant on consent of the other can obtain an order for the dismissal of the bill. Thus where the plaintiff sues on behalf of the same class, although he comes upon his own mere motion and retains the absolute dominion of the suit until decree, and may dismiss the bill at his pleasure, yet after a decree he cannot by his conduct deprive other persons of the same class of the benefit of the decree, if they think fit to prosecute it. The reason of the distinction is that, before decree, no other person of the class is bound to rely upon the diligence of him who has instituted his suit, but may file a bill of his own, while, after the decree, no second suit is permitted."

See, also, 1 Daniels' Chancery Practice (5th Ed.) 228-228, 233.

In Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 492, Chief Justice Shaw said:

"Plaintiffs having once instituted the proceedings as a statute remedy for themselves and others, they go on afterwards for the benefit of the parties concerned, and the original plaintiffs have no right to discontinue any more than a petitioning creditor could discontinue the proceedings under a commission of bankruptcy."

In 6 Pomeroy, Eq. Jurisprudence, § 892, the author says:

"In such cases (where one creditor sues on behalf of himself and others who desire to come in) the question may arise as to the power of the creditor who files the bill to control the proceedings. If other creditors have come in, or if an interlocutory judgment has been rendered establishing the rights of the parties, the original complainant cannot of his own motion dismiss the bill. Where other creditors have not come in, however, it has been held that he may dismiss the bill."

In Schumate, Ex'r, v. Crockett, 43 W. Va. 91, 27 S. E. 240, it appeared a suit had been brought by one lien creditor on behalf of himself and other creditors similarly situated. There was a reference, a report, and a decree. After this the complainant's debt was paid, and defendant sought thereby to stop the suit. The court said: "The debt of the plaintiff was paid, but the suit was expressly for all lienors, and others had appeared and become parties, and that payment could not defeat the decree, the decree belonging to all, not one of the creditors, and any creditor yet unpaid had a right to enforce it. He could go on in the name of the original plaintiffs, or, if anybody so asked, the plaintiff's name could be stricken out and another creditor's name substituted, and the result was that the payment of the plaintiff's debt did not stop the suit."

In Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 662, the court said:

"After an order of reference, the plaintiff in such bill ceases to have absolute control of it, and it cannot be dismissed by him without the consent of the other creditors. To hold otherwise would allow the defendant debtor to collude with the nominal plaintiff in controlling the litigation, and in this manner oftentimes greatly hinder, delay, and defraud other lien creditors of their debt. It was held the defendant had no right to have the suit dismissed." Lewis v. Laidley (Supreme Court of Appeals W. Va., 1894) 89 W. Va. 422, 19 S. E. 378; Slusher v. Stimpkins (1897) 101 Ky. 594, 40 S. W. 570, 43 S. W. 692.

"The persons on whose behalf the actual parties to a representative suit act are regarded as quasi parties, and for many purposes they have the rights of actual parties. Thus, if the nominal complainant neglects to proceed, or the suit becomes abated, any member of the class for whom the complainant was acting may have leave to prosecute." 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 634.

In 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 637, it is said:

"Where a complainant sues on behalf of himself and all other persons of the same class, although he acts on his own mere action, and retains the absolute dominion of the suit until the decree, and may dismiss the bill at his pleasure, upon obtaining leave of court to do so, yet after a decree has been made of such a kind that other persons besides the parties on the record are interested in the prosecution of it neither the complainant nor the defendant, on the consent of the other, can obtain an order for the dismissal of the bill, if any of the persons for whose common benefit it was recovered see fit to prosecute it."

We are of opinion that the authorities cited by counsel for Nolen and Slemons are not controlling in the present instance.

We do not find after a careful examination of this bill that Nolen and Slemons are made parties defendant as the representative of any particular class of creditors. Such an allegation is an indispensable condition in the application of the principles of law enunciated in the authorities cited. Brown v. Brown, 86 Tenn. 310, 6 S. W. 869, 7 S. W. 640; Lanchester v. Thompson, 5 Madd. Ch. Rep. 15.

Again, an examination of the decree granting an appeal to Nolen and Slemons will show that an appeal was not prayed by them as the representatives of any class of creditors, but on their individual account.

We are therefore of opinion that, when counsel for the guaranty company offered to suffer judgment against said company in favor of Nolen and Siemons for the full amount of their account, with interest and costs, this ended the litigation so far as that firm was concerned.

The next matter to be considered is the writ of error sued out by Len K. Hart and W. B. Clark to the decree of the chancellor. The record discloses that these petitioners were both made parties defendant by name to the original bill, and each filed an answer setting up his respective claim; that of Hart amounting to $1,238.68, and the claim of Clark $104.28. These claims were allowed by the clerk and master, but petitioners excepted to his report giving priority in the distribution of the funds to the state of Tennessee.

As already seen, these exceptions were overruled by the chancellor, who, in addition, gave priority to the taxes due the county of Davidson, and the city of Nashville.

The errors assigned in this court on behalf of Len K. Hart and W. B. Clark are as follows:

"First. The chancellor was in error in giving preference against the $10,000 bond to the amount collected by Rainey for redemption of property for county taxes due Davidson county, $3,262.10.

"Second. The chancellor was in error in giving preference against the $10,000 bond, to the amount due the mayor and city council of Nashville $8,762.01.

"Third. The chancellor was in error in not decreeing that the creditors in classes 4 to 14 inclusive, stood upon an equal footing, and should participate ratably in the penalty of the $10,000 bond.

"Fourth. The chancellor was in error in not adjudging that the surplus of the $5,000 bond, commonly known as the 'revenue bond,' which, in this case, was also conditioned that Rainey should faithfully discharge all of the duties of his office, should, after paying items 1 and 2, be prorated to items 3 to 13 inclusive.

"Fifth. The chancellor was in error in giving priority to the taxes collected due the state of Tennessee, and in not holding that the state stood upon a par with the remainder of the creditor classes 2 to 13 inclusive.

"Sixth. In not adjudging interest against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company from the date of the filing of its bill.

"Seventh. The chancellor was in error in not adjudging that the two sets of bonds were liable for all the obligations of the office, and in not holding that the office bond of $10,000 as clerk of the Second circuit court was liable also for any obligations as clerk of the First circuit court."

It should be observed that Len K. Hart and W. B. Clark in their petition for writ of error asked this court to allow the writ of error on behalf of all other creditors of Walter S. Rainey who stand in the same relation to the case that these parties stand. But, for the reasons already stated, this court will only consider such claims as are before it by appeal or writ of error sued out by individual claimants, and not upon the case-made by any other appellant as the supposed representative of a class.

The first question arising on the assignments made by Hart and Clark on their writ of error is in respect of the priorities adjudged by the chancellor in favor of the state, the county, and city on the revenue and official bonds executed by the guaranty company. These bonds were executed in pursuance of the requirements of Acts 1794, cc. 1, 14, found in Shannon's Code, § 402:

"Every clerk of a court before entering upon the duties of his office shall enter into bond with sufficient surety, to the satisfaction of his court, in the sum of $10,000, payable to the state, and conditioned for the safe keeping of the records, and for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office."

Section 403:

"Also a bond in the sum of $5,000 conditioned to account for and pay over all moneys arising from taxes on suits, fines, and forfeitures; otherwise the clerk shall be liable to pay a sum equal to treble the taxes, fines, and forfeitures which have come, or ought to come to his hands."

The official bond for $10,000 is conditioned as follows:

"To be void on condition the said Walter S. Rainey this day inducted into the office of circuit court clerk of Davidson county, safely keep and preserve the records of said court, and faithfully discharge the duties of his office."

An examination of the revenue bond will show that it was not executed in exact conformity with the requirements of the statute. That bond was in the penalty of $5,000, conditioned as follows:

"Now, therefore, should the above bound Walter S. Rainey truly and faithfully perform all the duties of the office of circuit court clerk for the term of his office according to the requirements of law, and shall faithfully collect and pay over within the time, and in the manner prescribed by law, to the Treasurer of the state of Tennessee, or to the proper officer designated by the laws of Tennessee to receive the same, all state taxes by him collected, or that should be collected, and also all fines and forfeitures which may, or ought to be collected by him during the said term of office, * * * then this obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

When the conditions of this bond are compared with the conditions prescribed by section 403, Shannon's Code, it will be noticed that the bond does not specifically cover "taxes on suits" as required by the statute.

Again, it will be observed that the bond actually executed is conditioned to pay over all state taxes collected, or that ought to be collected by said clerk, when no such condition is prescribed by the statute for this particular bond.

It will be further seen that the condition of the bond given requires the said Walter S. Rainey to "truly and faithfully perform all the duties of the office of circuit court clerk," etc. But this language is not in the statute. Section 1094, Shannon's Code, provides as follows:

"Whenever any officer required by law to give an official bond, acts under a bond which is not in the penalty, payable or conditioned as prescribed by law, or is otherwise defective, such bond is not void, but stands in the place of the official bond, subject on its condition being broken to all the remedies which the person aggrieved might have maintained on the official bond of such officer, executed, approved, and filed according to law."

It will be observed that under the provisions of the section last cited the defectively executed bond stands in the place of the official bond, and any conditions prescribed by the statute for the official bond which are omitted from the bond actually given will be supplied and read into it. It is to be remarked, however, that the revenue bond actually given in this case not only omitted one of the conditions prescribed by the statute for the official bond, but it superadded other conditions which were not required.

It appears, however, that this bond was voluntarily executed by the guaranty company, and, although not in conformity with the statute, it is a good common-law bond, and the surety is liable according to his undertaking.

Mr. Brandt, in his work on Suretyship and Guaranty (volume 1, § 22) says:

"The general rule is that a bond, whether required by statute or not, is good at common law if entered into voluntarily for a valid consideration, and if it is not repugnant to the law or policy of the law, and the surety on such bond is bound thereby. The voluntary bond of a State Treasurer which is not demandable by law of a county treasurer where there is no law requiring a bond to be given of a deputy collector of customs, where there is no law prescribing a bond to be given of a plaintiff in an attachment suit when no bond is required by law, are all valid, and bind the sureties who sign them." Thompson v. Buckhannon, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 416; Hoboken v. Harrison, 30 N. J. Law, 73; Cotton's Guardian v. Wolf, 14 Bush (Ky.) 238; Tinsley v. Kirby, 17 S. C. 1; State v. Sooy, 38 N. J. Law, 324; Supervisors of St. Joseph v. Coffenbury, 1 Mich. 355; Dignan v. Shields, 51 Tex. 322.

"Where a bond is required by law to be given, the voluntary bond of an executor or administrator to the ordinary, which varies from the form prescribed by the statute, of a cashier containing nothing contrary to law, but varying from the statutory form, of a plaintiff in replevin, in which the condition does not conform to the statute, are all valid and binding on the sureties. * * *

A statute required that a bank cashier should give a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties. The cashier gave a bond which provided for past as well as future delinquencies. Held the bond was not void because it contained more than provided by statute. Being a voluntary bond, and for a lawful purpose, it was good at common law." Ordinary v. Cooley, 30 N. J. Law, 179; Grocers' Bank v. Kingman, 16 Gray (Mass.) 473; Franklin Bank v. Cooper, 36 Me. 179.

The same author, at section 24, says:

"The principle that a surety in a voluntary bond made upon good consideration, and which does not contravene the policy of the law, or the prohibition of the statute is liable at common law on such bond, has been applied to a great variety of circumstances. Such a bond is valid even though another bond be required by a statute. Thus, where a statute required a bank cashier to give a bond with two or more sureties, and he gave a bond with only one surety, such surety was held liable. The statute did not say no other bond but the one required should be taken, and was only directory."

Bank of Brighton v. Smith, 5 Allen (Mass.) 413.

The same author (volume 2, § 520) says:

"If a person occupying official position voluntarily gives a bond providing against loss by reason of his acts as to matters concerning which there is no statutory provision, such bond, although not a statutory bond, is, if it is founded on a sufficient consideration, and is not prohibited by statute nor contrary to public policy, valid and binding on the principal, and his surety as a voluntary common-law obligation." United States v. Mason, 2 Bond, 183, Fed. Cas. No. 15,737; Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Polk, 1 Del. Ch. 167; Bank of The Northern Liberties v. Cresson, 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 306; Potter v. State, 23 Ind. 550; McWilliams v. Norfleet, 60 Miss. 987.

Our own authorities are in accord with the text of Mr. Brandt. In Hibbitts v. Canada and Others, 10 Yerg. 465, it was held:

"An administration bond made payable to the chairman of the county court and his successors in office, instead of the Governor of the state, as required by law, cannot be sued upon by the successor in office, but is a good voluntary bond, and suit may be brought upon it in the name of the original payee or his personal representative, if he be dead." In Goodrum v. Carroll, 2 Humph. 490, 37 Am. Dec. 564, it appeared:

"The bond upon which the suit was brought was executed by the defendants to Wm. Carroll, Governor of Tennessee, and his successors in office in the penal sum of $10,000, conditioned that T. C. Porter, who had that day been appointed sheriff of Giles county, should faithfully execute and perform the duties of that office."

The court said:

"This was not an office bond, according to the statute, because the penalty is $10,000 instead of $12,000, as required by the statute, and because it was not approved and recorded, as the statute directs. It has been decided by this court (10 Yerg. 465), and is admitted, that a bond executed by a public officer and securities, though not good as a statutory bond, may nevertheless be binding as a voluntary obligation upon which an action at common law may be maintained."

Polk v. Plumber, 2 Humph. 500, 37 Am. Dec. 506, is cited by counsel for the guaranty company as authority, to the effect that a bond containing conditions superadded to those prescribed by the statute can only be enforced as a statutory bond, but, as said in Jones v. Wiley, 4 Humph. 148:

"It has been determined that, although the bond may be good as a voluntary bond, it containing no provisions which are improper, illegal, or against public policy, but quite the contrary, still, not having been taken by the proper authority and pursuant to law, it is not good and effectual as an official or statutory bond. * * * There is nothing inconsistent with this view of the matter in the case of Polk v. Plumber, 2 Humph. That case maintains that certain stipulations did not make the bond void as a statutory bond, but are to be treated as surplusage. The bond in that case was held to be statute."

In Boughton v. State, 7 Humph. 193, it appeared:

"That Sam Boughton, sheriff, had made default in paying over to the Treasurer of the state the state revenue of Stewart county collected for the year 1845. In March, 1844, he was elected sheriff of said county, and at the ensuing April term of the county court of said county he gave bond as collector of the state revenue for the years 1844 and 1845, with the plaintiffs in error as his sureties. In October, 1845, he gave another bond with other sureties, conditioned for the faithful collection and payment of the state revenue for the year 1845. The judgment of the circuit court was given upon the bond of April, 1844, for the default in paying over the revenue collected for the year 1845. And the question is whether, as embracing the last year, the bond in question was a good statutory bond, subjecting the obligors to the summary remedy of a judgment by motion."

The court held, after reviewing the statutes, that the bond in question, although a good voluntary common-law bond, was not a good statutory bond so far as regards the second year, or that of 1845. Governor v. Allen, 8 Humph. 177; Davis v. Bratton, 10 Humph. 179.

We understand this principle in respect of the obligation of a voluntary bond to have been recognized and reaffirmed in McLean v. State, 8 Heisk. 270-275. In that case the court said:

"Another question is this: The bonds taken in 1868, the first year of the first term, in terms bind the collector and his sureties for the discharge of all duties, and the payment of all moneys collected, or that ought to be collected during the entire term of office, and the bonds of 1870 are in the same terms; and the question is, Are the sureties on the bonds of 1868 liable for the default occurring in 1869 with the sureties upon the bonds executed in the year 1869, or must the judgment for the default of the year 1869 be confined to the bonds of 1869? And the same question arises as to the bonds of 1870 in regard to the default occurring in 1871. This we regard as a question of some difficulty. That the bonds in terms bind the obligors to the extent claimed for the plaintiff is not denied, but the argument for the defense is that the law required bonds to be given annually, and only regarded the first bond to cover the taxes for the first year; and, if the bond of the first year in its terms should annex conditions not required by law, and bind the obligors for the taxes of the second year, that the sureties will only be bound to the extent the law required the bond to go, and not for those conditions not required by law, under the principle of the cases of Polk v. Plumber, 2 Humph. 500, 37 Am. Dec. 506, and Banks v. McDowell, 1 Cold. 84. Even upon the principle of Boughton v. State, 7 Humph. 193, these bonds as to the second year's default are good at common law, and we hold that the distinction between statutory and common law bonds is in this respect now immaterial."

Maddox v. Shacklett (Tenn. Ch.) 36 S. W. 731. In Allison v. State, 8 Heisk. 312, it was held:

"A tax collector's bond, reciting an election for two years, and with condition, 'to pay over all taxes by him collected, or which ought to be by him collected, according to law,' binds his sureties for his whole term of office, not simply for the year in which it is given."

In the course of the opinion in that case Judge Freeman said:

"Now, this bond is not the bond conditioned according to the terms of the statute, is not limited to such taxes as by him are collected, or ought to be collected against the last day of December of that year. If it had been thus, it would have been a statutory bond, and the recital of the term of office would not in any wise add to the period which the bond by its terms then would have covered. We must take this as a good common-law bond, and not the bond required by the statute, or conditioned as required."

In Coons v. People, 76 Ill. 383, it was said:

"Where an officer gives a bond under which he is allowed to receive moneys, make sale of land for taxes, and receive commissions, he and his sureties will be estopped from denying the validity of such bond when sued for a breach of its condition. It will be obligatory as a common-law undertaking, unless prohibited by statute, or opposed to public policy."

In United States v. Hodson, 10 Wall. 409, (19 L. Ed. 937) it was said:

"But where it [bond] is voluntarily entered into, and the principal enjoys the benefits which it is intended to secure, and a breach occurs, it is then too late to raise the question of its validity. The parties are estopped from availing themselves of such a defense. In such cases there is neither injustice nor hardship in holding that the contract as made is the measure of the rights of the government and of the liability of the obligors."

In Bank of Brighton v. Smith, 5 Allen (Mass.) 415, Bigelow, C. J., said:

"The rule of law is well settled that a bond given for the faithful performance of official duties, or in pursuance of some requirement of law, may be valid and binding on the parties, although not made with the formalities, or executed in the mode provided by the statute under which it purports to have been given. This rule rests on the principle that, although the instrument may not conform to the special provisions of a statute or regulation in compliance with which the parties executed it, nevertheless it is a contract voluntarily entered into upon a sufficient consideration for a purpose not contrary to law, and therefore it is obligatory on the parties to it in like manner as any other contract or agreement is held valid at common law."

It may be observed that the condition contained both in the revenue and official bond of Walter S. Rainey, to the effect that he will truly and faithfully perform all the duties of the office of circuit court clerk, etc., is a guaranty of the personal honesty of such officer, and was intended to furnish indemnity against any defalcations on his part in accounting for revenue paid into his hands. Fiala v. Ainsworth, 63 Neb. 4, 88 N. W. 135, 93 Am. St. Rep. 420; American Bank v. Adams, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 303; Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet. 46, 7 L. Ed. 47.

We are aware that there is another line of cases which hold that bonds executed in the course of judicial proceedings in excess of the conditions prescribed by statute are only enforceable to the extent of the statutory requirements.

In Banks v. McDowell, 1 Cold. 85, it was held:

"An administrator in cases of appeal is not required to give security for a debt or judgment against him. The bond should be conditioned to pay costs and damages alone. If the bonds be in terms to pay the amount found due against the estate, such illegal provision or condition will be rejected and the bond held good for the costs and damages." Sharp v. Pickens, 4 Cold. 270; Hutchinson v. Fulghum, 4 Heisk. 557; Patterson v. Gordon, 3 Tenn. Ch. 22; Denton v. Woods, 11 Lea, 506.

It may be said generally in all cases that conditions of appeal bonds beyond the requirements of the statute are void, and the bond is enforceable as required by law. Mason v. Smith, 11 Lea, 71; Denton v. Woods, 11 Lea, 506; Ranning v. Reeves, 2 Tenn. Ch. 267.

Where the same rule was applied to attachment bonds: Mason v. Metcalf, 4 Baxt. 440; Mason v. Anderson & Co., 12 Heisk. 38.

It may be said in respect of the last class of cases that the bonds were wholly without consideration, since the parties were entitled to an appeal upon executing a bond for costs and damages as required by the statute. Hence there was no consideration for the superadded conditions, and for that reason such bonds were nonenforceable. In the present case, however, there was a consideration for the bonds executed by Rainey and the Fidelity Company as his surety. The revenue for which Rainey defaulted went into his hands upon the faith of bonds executed by him in excess of the requirements of the statute, and the surety company was paid a premium for the indemnity guaranteed by it. The bond executed by Rainey was voluntarily executed, upon sufficient consideration, and is clearly enforceable as a common-law bond to the full amount of the penalty prescribed.

We are therefore of opinion that the guaranty company was liable for the full penalty of this bond, and that the chancellor was in error in ordering it canceled after crediting it with the sum of $3,081.82, amount of state and county taxes on litigation, and state taxes for the redemption of property.

We next proceed to inquire if the state is entitled to priority in the collection of its delinquent revenue on the bond of the guaranty company. This question, so far as we are advised by any written opinion of this court, is one of first impression in this state. It is certain there is nothing in the Constitution of the state or in any statute which has been called to our attention declaring such priority. There is one instance in which priority in favor of the state is declared, and that is in the distribution of the estates of insolvent decedents.

Section 4060, Shannon's Code, provides:

"In order to ascertain the fund to be distributed among the creditors, the clerk shall deduct from the whole estate:

"(1) All fees and commissions due in the administration thereof, including the allowance to the administrator or executor.

"(2) Claims for funeral expenses.

"(3) Debts and arrearages due to the state."

This statute was construed in Field's Ex'r v. Wheatley, 1 Sneed, 351, to mean debts and arrearages due the government or state, in its sovereign capacity, as revenue, fines, forfeitures, penalties, and the like.

The passage of this statute allowing priority to the state in this instance does not necessarily exclude the existence of the priority as derived from the common law.

It is undeniable that by the common law of England the sovereign, by virtue of his prerogative rights, was entitled to priority of payment of debts due him over debts due his subjects. 8 Bacon's Abridgment, tit. "Prerogative," p. 81; 1 Kent's Commentaries (14th Ed.) *257; Blackstone's Commentaries, book 1, p. 240, foot page 210; Id. book 2, star pages 409, 511, foot page 833 (4th Ed.); Giles v. Grover, 9 Bing. 128.

"In nearly all of the states there are statutes giving preference to taxes, rates, and other duties due the state over the debts of the citizens; but in one instance the statute directs that debts due the state shall be paid last. Whether a state, in the absence of positive enactment, is entitled to the priority claimed by the crown under the common law, appears to be not well settled, the prevailing opinion, however, is in favor of such priority." Am. and Eng. Enc. of Law, 479.

In Maryland the state is held entitled to priority of payment of a debt due it out of the assets of the estate of a deceased person as a prerogative right from the common law. Orem v. Wrightson (1878) 51 Md. 34, 34 Am. Rep. 286; State v. Bank of Maryland (1834) 6 Gill & J. 223, 26 Am. Dec. 561.

In New Jersey it is held that there is no prerogative right derived from the common law to the state for priority in the payment of debts over other creditors. Middlesex County Board v. State Bank, 30 N. J. Eq. 311.

The right is also denied in South Carolina. Klinck v. Keckley (1835) 2 Hill, Eq. 250; Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 114.

This question arose in the case of Glynn County v. Brunswick Terminal Company et al. Supreme Court of Georgia, and is reported in 101 Ga. 244, 28 S. E. 604. Simmons, Chief Justice, said:

"It appears from the record that the treasurer of the county of Glynn deposited a certain amount of money of the county of Glynn in the Brunswick State Bank, and that the Brunswick Terminal Company and others were depositors. The bank failed. A creditors' petition was filed for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the bank and distributing the assets. The county of Glynn was made a party, and in its intervention claimed a preference over all other depositors in the distribution of the assets.

"On the trial of the case the court ruled that the county had no preference over the other depositors, but must share pro rata with them. To this ruling the county excepted. According to the rulings of the court the state, in a contest of this kind, would be entitled to a preference. These decisions are based upon our adopting act of 1874, wherein the common law of England was made the common law of the state. By that law the King of England, by his prerogative right, had a preference over all his subjects in regard to debts due the crown. This court in the case of Robinson v. Bank, 18 Ga. 65, held that the state, on account of its sovereignty, had the same prerogative right in regard to the collection of debts due it as the King of England had with respect to debts due the crown, and ruled in that case that, although the state had a lien junior to that of one of its citizens, the State's lien had preference. This ruling has been followed in other cases, notably that of Seay v. Bank, 66 Ga. 609.

"While it may be true that the state, on account of its prerogative right, has this preference, we cannot hold that the same right applies to the counties of the state. If there is such a thing as prerogative right of preference on the part of the state, it cannot be divided among the 137 counties of which it is composed. 8 Bac. Abr. under head of 'Prerogative.' We think it safe to hold that the county has no such prerogative right as the state. Not having this right, in order to obtain a preference over the other depositors, it must show some statutory right. We have no statute which gives a county which is a depositor in a bank a lien or preference over other depositors of the same class. It is true there is a statute giving a county a lien for its taxes in preference to others, but a lien for taxes and a lien upon the assets of an insolvent debtor for money deposited stand upon altogether different footings. The lien of the county for taxes as against the property taxed by it (the lien being given by statute) is one thing, and the claimed right of the county to priority over the other creditors in regard to an indebtedness for money received from the county, whether or not that money has been collected from taxes, is another and altogether different thing. In the one case the statute gives the lien for taxes upon the property of the citizen. In the other there is no statute giving any lien. In the absence of any legal right of preference in such cases, the county must stand upon an equal footing with other depositors."

In 1 Kent's Commentaries (14th Ed.) *248, note "b," it is said:

"In Maryland, by statute passed in 1778, the commencement of a suit by the state against a public debtor created a lien on all the lands of the debtor, and a preference over all other creditors, who had not prior to the commencement of the suit secured a lien by judgment, mortgage or otherwise. Davidson v. Clayland, 1 Har. & J. 546. The preference in payment of debts was a breach of government prerogative at common law, and it was introduced as such into Maryland. It is the law still when the property of the debtor remains in hand, and there is no lien standing in the way. State of Maryland v. Bank of Maryland, 6 Gill & J. 205, 26 Am. Dec. 561. In Connecticut the state has a priority of claim against the estate of an insolvent debtor, and state sureties paying the debt have the same privilege. Rev. St. Conn. 1826, 212. The state's preference rests in this country, upon statutes: and the common law gives none over other creditors. State v. Harris, 2 Bailey (S. C.) 598; Kilnck v. Keckley, 2 Hill, Eq. (S. C.) 256. The common-law prerogative of the King to be paid in preference to all other creditors, is therefore not universally adopted in this country. It prevails in the government of the United States and in Maryland, North Carolina, Indiana, Connecticut, etc., but not in South Carolina. In Georgia state taxes have preference over all incumbrances whatsoever. State v. Pemberton, Dud. 15. In Indiana the state has preference over all other creditors, and real and personal estate is bound on behalf of the state from the teste of the first process. Rev. St. 1838, 283."

In Hoke v. Henderson, 14 N. C. 23, the right of the sovereign to priority of satisfaction out of the goods of the debtor is recognized, unless the debtor's goods be actually sold under the subject's process before the sovereign's is delivered.

We are of opinion that the prerogative right of the sovereign to receive payment of fines, forfeitures, taxes, and revenue, and such demands as were due it in its sovereign capacity was a part of the common law transmitted to this state from North Carolina, and that the decree of the chancellor was correct in adjudging priority to the state in the collection of its delinquent revenue on this bond.

We are of opinion, however, that this priority does not extend to the counties and municipalities of the state. In State v. Bank of Tenn. 5 Baxt. 1, Marion county asserted a claim to priority for a balance due it on account of a deposit in the bank of Tennessee, but this priority was denied, and it was held that the county stood on an equal footing with other creditors of the bank. Leeper v. State, 103 Tenn. 528, 53 S. W. 962, 48 L. R. A. 167.

The decree of the chancellor in allowing priority to the county of Davidson and the city of Nashville in the distribution of this fund was therefore erroneous.

It is next assigned as error that the chancellor failed to allow interest on the amount due from the guaranty company from the date of the filing of its bill.

We are of opinion there was no error in the action of the chancellor. The guaranty company is only chargeable with interest from the date of the decree adjudging liability. State v. Cole, 13 Lea, 366; State ex rel. Walsh v. Blakemore, 7 Heisk. 657.

It results that the decree of the chancellor must be reversed in the respects mentioned, and the cause remanded for the statement of another account in accordance with the principles herein announced.

ALFRED PHOSPHATE CO. v. DUCK RIVER PHOSPHATE CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. July 25, 1907.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 13*)—EXTENT OF POWER—PUBLIC USE—EXTENT OF USE.

Const. art. 1, § 21, prohibiting the taking of property for public use without just compensation, inhibits the taking of property for private use, and requires that it be taken for the use of the public, whose rights must be secured by law, and not merely be dependent on the consent of the owner; and it is not sufficient that the exercise of the right will be for the general benefit or advantage of the public.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 18*)—EXTENT OF POWER—PUBLIC USE—PRIVATE RAILROAD.

A phosphate mining and manufacturing corporation, organized under Acts 1875, p. 247, c. 142, § 11 (Shannon's Code, § 2333), authorizing it, pursuant to the general law providing for the condemnation of private property for works of internal improvement, to condemn a right of way necessary for conducting its business over the lands of any private person or corporation, which right of way is thereby declared a public road, petitioned for the condemnation of the right of way of a private railroad track owned by another phosphate company, so as to transport its products to a railroad junction, the only traffic which would pass over the road, if condemned, being complainant's private shipments. Held, that the condemnation was not for a public use, even though other phosphate companies might ship over the road, and the provision declaring property condemned by such corporations a public road could not change the character of its use; and hence the statute was invalid, as authorizing the condemnation of property for private purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 51-54; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

8. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 10*)—DELEGATION OF POWER—PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

The right to condemn property for a public use can be conferred on a private corporation, but if the condemnation is not for a public use, the right cannot be conferred either upon a private or public corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-48; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 58*)—EXERCISE OF POWER—EXTENT OF APPROPRIATION.

The right of way only of an existing private railroad cannot be condemned without condemning the entire road.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hickman County; Sam Holding, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Alfred Phosphate Company against the Duck River Phosphate Company and another. From a judgment dismissing the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence T. Boyd, for appellant. Robin J. Cooper, for appellees.

McALISTER, J. The object of this petition is to condemn certain property belonging to the defendant company in the exercise of the right of eminent domain claimed under the laws of Tennessee. Complainant is a mining and manufacturing corporation, organized under chapter 142, p. 232, Acts 1875, with the powers therein conferred. Among other powers granted, it is provided therein:

"The said corporation shall have the right, in pursuance of the general law authorizing the condemnation of private property for works of internal improvement as set forth in sections 1844 to 1867 inclusive, to condemn a right of way necessary for the transaction of the corporate business, not exceeding thirty feet in width, over the lands of any private person, or corporation, and such right of way is hereby declared to be a public road." Shannon's Code, § 2333.

It is shown in the petition that the Alfred Phosphate Company owns phosphate lands and properties consisting of 300 acres in Hickman county, Tenn.

It is averred in the petition that these lands are very valuable, and from conservative estimates made are supposed to contain 500,000 tons of phosphate rock.

It is shown in the petition that the defendant Duck River Phosphate Company is also engaged in mining phosphate rock in Hickman county; that it was incorporated under the same provisions of the general incorporating act of 1875, with the same powers and privileges already enumerated.

It appears from the petition that the defendant company owns large phosphate mines, and is operating a private railroad from its said mines to the railroad of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company, a distance of about 4½ miles.

It is alleged in the petition that the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company owns and operates as a part of its railroad system, a branch or spur track leading out from Centreville, Hickman County, Tenn., to Swan creek, a distance of about 8 miles.

It is then alleged that the defendant Duck River Phosphate Company, a mining and manufacturing corporation, organized and existing under the laws of Tennessee, owns certain phosphate mines and properties adjacent to or near the properties of the Alfred Phosphate Company, and in connection with its mines has built, constructed, and now owns a private railroad of 30 feet in width, more or less, leading from its mines to the terminus or junction of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway at Swan creek, the said road being about 4½ miles in length.

It is averred that this private railroad of the Duck River Phosphate Company, beginning at Swan creek in said county, and extending west for a distance of about 2 miles, is built along the banks of Duck river, and under a bluff of said river for this entire distance, extending in height some 30 or 40 feet, so that it is impossible to parallel said track or construct a roadway along the banks of said river.

It is further shown that the defendant Tennessee Blue Rock Phosphate Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Tennessee, has leased the mining properties of the Duck River Phosphate Company, including its $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles of railroad, running from its mines on Swan creek, the terminus of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway, and which is now operating under the same lease, which expires May 28, 1913.

It is then shown that the phosphate lands and properties of petitioner, the Alfred Phosphate Company, are located about 1 mile distant from a point on the line or private railroad of the Duck River Phosphate Company, at or near where said private railroad leaves the banks of Duck river.

It is further alleged that on account of the configuration of the county in this section of Hickman county, and on account of the location of the phosphate properties belonging to the petitioner, it is impossible to construct a roadway or road necessary for carrying and delivering to the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company at Swan creek, or any other point on said railway, the phosphate rock of petitioner, and that the only outlet for its mining products is over that portion of defendant's private railroad, along the banks of Duck river to the terminus of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company's line at Swan creek.

It is shown that the petitioner cannot parallel the private railroad track of defendant Duck River Phosphate Company on account of the very high bluff already described, and because there is no space left for the construction of another roadbed or railroad in addition to that already occupied by the railroad of defendant company.

It is averred in the petition that the petitioner has made repeated efforts, and an offer of $10,000, to purchase from defendant company the joint use or privilege and right to carry its phosphate rock over that portion of its private railroad along the banks of Duck river, which proposition was declined by defendants, who even refused to negotiate with petitioner on this subject.

It is averred that the cash proposition thus made to defendant companies was more than the actual cost of construction of this portion of defendant's private railroad over which it desired to have joint use and control for the carriage of its tonnage or phosphate rock.

Petitioner thereupon filed this petition under its charter and the laws of Tennessee for the condemnation of that portion of the private railroad owned and operated by defendant companies along the banks of Duck river for a distance of about 2 miles or 10,000 feet.

Another fact averred in the petition is that the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company laid the rails and spikes on this $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles of roadbed belonging to defendant Duck River Phosphate Company, and in addition has leased to defendants one of its railroad engines for the purpose of hauling cars to and from the mines of the Duck River Phosphate Company to the terminus of said railway company at Swan creek.

It is further averred that under its contract with said phosphate company, the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company still owns and controls said railroad and the rails and spikes for the laying of the same.

It is then averred that petitioner does not desire to condemn the road, rails, and spikes or iron on said portion of said track, since these items are not the property of either of the defendants, but belong to the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company.

It is alleged in the petition that the object for which it purposes to condemn such right of way was for works of internal improvement necessary for the transaction of its corporate business, and to declare said property a public road in order that other citizens and members of the community and the public might be entitled to its use and enjoyment.

A demurrer was interposed on behalf of the defendant companies to the petition, assigning the following causes:

"(1) The petition seeks to condemn private property for private use in contravention of the Constitution of Tennessee.

"(2) The petitioner is a mining, quarrying, boring, and manufacturing corporation, chartered and organized under chapter 142, Acts of 1875. The objects and purposes of the corporation are purely of a private nature, and the company is organized and conducted for the personal benefit of the stockholders therein, and the act of the Legislature under which it is organized is unconstitutional and void, in so far as it endows this company with the right of condemning the private property of others for the use of said company.

"(3) The petitioner is a private corporation, organized for the individual gain of its members, and charged with no public duties or purposes, and cannot, under the Constitution of Tennessee, have or exercise the right of eminent domain.

"(4) The petition shows that the property described therein is now owned and used for the very purpose and in the manner for which it is sought to be condemned; and, if that use is a public one, petitioner cannot condemn the same without an express grant of authority from the Legislature.

"(5) The petition cannot be maintained, for the reason that it seeks to condemn the land upon which defendants' railroad is located without condemning the railroad itself, which is a part of the land, and the one cannot be condemned without the other."

The circuit judge sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, from which judgment the Alfred Phosphate Company appealed and has assigned errors. The only assignment is that the trial judge was in error in adjudging that petitioner had no right of condemnation under its charter and the laws of Tennessee, and in dismissing the petition with costs.

It is conceded by counsel that, if the present effort is to condemn the property of defendants merely for the private purposes of the petitioner, such condemnation would be unauthorized and in violation of the provisions of the state Constitution regulating the exercise of the power of eminent domain. It is also admitted that, if chapter 142, p. 232, Acts 1875, granting to mining and manufacturing companies the power to condemn a right of way over the lands of any private person or corporation, contemplates a condemnation for the company's private use, the act would be unconstitutional, since the Legislature has no power to authorize the taking of one man's property for the private use of another.

The insistence of counsel is that the object of the condemnation sought is for the public benefit of every citizen or landowner in this particular section of Hickman county, Tenn., and for the public purpose of developing the phosphate industry and resources in this section of said county, and for the purpose of providing a vehicle of transportation for the products of the farm and phosphate mines to the terminus of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company's line at Swan creek.

The Constitution of the state of Tennessee provides:

"Article 1, § 21. That no man's particular services shall be demanded or property taken, or applied to public use, without the consent of his representatives, or without just compensation being made therefor."

This provision of the Constitution has been frequently interpreted by this court to prohibit the taking of private property for a private use.

In Memphis Freight Co. v. Memphis, 4 Cold. 420, petitioners were granted a charter, by an act of the Legislature, for the purpose of loading and unloading freight goods, cotton, etc., from boats on the Mississippi river at Memphis, and for the purpose of storing the same. The company was granted the right to build sheds on certain streets in Memphis, and the right to construct railroad tracks from the sheds referred to, to the Mississippi river, and for this latter purpose a petition was filed to condemn a right of way for the tracks. This court said:

"These railways are not designed for public travel, but as a means to enable the company to carry out the objects and purposes of their charter, in the prosecution of their business. The public is not interested in the erection of these railways, except in the facilities that may be afforded in the loading and unloading of boats. It is purely a private enterprise, giving superior advantages to a corporation over those who have not the use of machinery."

It was further said:

"There is nothing in the charter showing it to be for a public use. There is no restriction on their charges for services; no duties are defined; no penalties for a violation of their duties; no regulations of toll. They are left free to act as private persons, in any manner that will best promote their interests."

The right of way sought to be condemned was a private, and not a public use, and that so much of the act as authorized the appropriation of private property under the right of eminent domain was in violation of the Constitution and void. See Harding v. Goodlett, 3 Yerg. 52, 24 Am. Dec. 546, Clack v. White, 2 Swan, 540, Rice v. Alley, 1 Sneed, 51, Carson v. Moore, 2 Shannon's Cas. 500, wherein statutes granting the power of eminent domain for private purposes were declared unconstitutional.

The question of what constitutes a public use was considered by this court in Ryan v. Terminal Co., 102 Tenn. 111, 50 S. W. 744, 45 L. R. A. 303, wherein it was said:

"So it may be said at the present time that anything which will satisfy a reasonable public demand for public facilities for travel, or for the transmission of intelligence or commodities, and of which the general public, under reasonable regulations, will have a definite and fixed use, independent of the will of the party in whom title is vested, would be a public use."

The Tennessee cases on this subject uniformly hold that there can be no exercise of the right of eminent domain under the Constitution unless property taken is to be appropriated to the use of the public, whose rights therein shall be secured by a governmental regulation. There are many cases in other states which hold that this power of eminent domain may be exercised when there is a public necessity, and the public in general will be benefited. It seems that the weight of authority is with the holdings of this court, to the effect that the right exercised must be for a public use, and not simply resulting in a public benefit, utility, or advantage. This distinction is illustrated by the case of Varner v. Martin, 21 W. Va. 534:

"(1) The general public must have a definite and fixed use of the property to be condemned; a use independent of the will of a private person or private corporation in whom the title of the property, when condemned, will be vested; a public use which cannot be defeated by such private owner, but which public use continues to be guarded and controlled by the general public through laws passed by the Legislature.

"(2) This public use must be clearly a needful one for the public, one which cannot be given up without obvious general loss and inconvenience.

"(3) It must be impossible, or very difficult, at least, to secure the same public uses and purposes in any other way than by authorizing the condemnation of private property."

The court in that case denied the condemnation of the land, because in its judgment it was for a private use. McQuillen v. Hatton, 42 Ohio St. 202; Jenal v. Green Island Drainage Co., 12 Neb. 165, 10 N. W. 547; Sholl v. German Coal Co., 118 Ill. 427, 10 N. E. 199, 59 Am. Rep. 379; Cozard v. Kanawha Hardwood Co., 139 N. C. 283, 51 S. E. 932, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 969, 111 Am. St. Rep. 779; Healy Lumber Co. v. Morris, 33 Wash. 490, 74 Pac. 681, 63 L. R. A. 820, 90 Am. St. Rep. 964.

In Coster v. Tidewater Co., 18 N. J. Eq. 54, it appeared:

The tidewater company was incorporated for the purpose of draining the tidewater marshes adjoining Newark Bay and its tributary stream.

It was claimed this was a public purpose; that the revenue for the state would be largely increased from the taxes on said marshes when improved for cultivation; that it would require constant care and attention to keep the drained ditches in repair, giving employment to large numbers of men, and thereby adding to the prosperity of the state; that the marshes in their present condition interfere with the construction of highways, and other like reasons.

The court was of opinion that there was no use or benefit to the public in common; that the persons to be benefited by the proposed improvement were the particular individuals or estates whose lands were to be drained, and it was accordingly held that the use for which the condemnation was sought was private.

The petition for condemnation was dismissed. Waddell's Appeal, 84 Pa. 90; Board of Health v. Van Hoesen, 87 Mich. 533, 49 N. W. 894, 14 L. R. A. 114; Amador Queen Mining Co. v. De Witt, 73 Cal. 482, 15 Pac. 74; Channel Co. v. R. R., 51 Cal. 269.

It must be conceded that the petitioning company is not impressed with a public character, but that it is carrying on a private business for the emolument of its owners and stockholders, that the public has no interest whatever in the operation of this business, and that the only purpose for which a right of way is demanded is to get the products of this private enterprise to market.

In Cozard v. Kanawha Hardwood Co., 139 N. C. 283, 51 S. E. 932, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 969, 111 Am. St. Rep. 779, it was held that the right of eminent domain cannot be conferred to secure a right of way for a private railroad to transport timber to market. It was further held that the mere development of a locality by the establishment and maintenance of a private enterprise therein is not a public use for which the right of eminent domain may be exercised. In that case it appeared that defendants were conducting a general lumber business under the firm name of the Kanawha Hardwood Company. Defendants were proceeding to construct a railway over the lands of plaintiff for the purpose of hauling timber and timber products from the lands of defendant firm. The defendants were owners of standing timber, from which no public road was accessible, and to which no water was convenient. The road proposed lead from a railroad station to the said standing timber, which could not be marketed without the construction of a railroad. Defendant firm did not offer to construct said railroad and become liable as common carriers for public transportation, but proposed to use the railroad for their sole and exclusive use in removing their timber and products from their own lands to the railroad station, and thence to the markets. The court held the act of assembly, authorizing the owners of timber lands to condemn a right of way for tramways and railways over the lands of other owners, for the exclusive use of the owners of the timber, unconstitutional and void.

The right of way sought to be condemned in the present case is necessarily for the exclusive use of the Alfred Phosphate Company. This company is not a common carrier, and is in no sense a public service corporation. The line of railroad would extend from the mines of petitioner to the junction of the N. C. & St. L. Railway, and the only tonnage that would pass over this road would be the private traffic of the petitioner.

It is argued, however, that such a railroad would provide an outlet for the products of other phosphate companies situated in that vicinity. But the fact that such a railroad might benefit a limited class would not clothe it about with the character of a public use. This is illustrated by several cases already cited, wherein acts of the Legislature authorized the organization of corporations for the purpose of draining marshes, and conferred upon them the power of eminent domain to condemn rights of way for ditches over the lands of others. It was held that the benefits were limited to the owners of the land, a limited class, and that it was not a public use or purpose. Coster v. Tidewater Co., 18 N. J. Eq. 54.

We understand that under the authorities in Tennessee the public generally must have a right to the use independent of the permission of the owner, and further that the use of the public must be secured by law. There are no provisions made in the charter for the operation of such a railroad, nor any rates prescribed, nor does it possess any of the attributes of a public service corporation. The company is to be the sole arbiter of its affairs, and is not subject to governmental regulation or control.

But it is said that the charter authorizing the exercise of eminent domain provides that the right of way, when condemned, shall be a public road, and thus the Legislature has impressed a public character upon this property. It is obvious that if this business is purely a private enterprise, a mere legislative declaration that the right of way shall be a public road would not change its character. The question is not whether the corporation sought to be endowed with the right of eminent domain is public or private, but whether the property sought to be condemned is to be used for a public purpose. If it is to be so used, the right of condemnation can be bestowed upon any private corporation; but, if not to be so used, it cannot be conferred either upon a private or public corporation.

Section 11, c. 142, p. 247, Acts 1875, under which the petitioner is seeking to exercise the right of eminent domain in the present case, was before this court at Knoxville. September term, 1906, in the case of Niota Milling Co. v. S. P. Blair, coming from McMinn county. This section was declared unconstitutional, because it undertook to authorize mining and manufacturing corporations to condemn property for private purposes.

It was adjudged therein that, the condemnation being for a private purpose, the legislative declaration that it should be a public road would not render the act valid.

Another insuperable difficulty in the way of petitioner is that it does not seek to condemn the private railroad, which it concedes to be the property of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway, but it only seeks to appropriate the right of way. This petition admits that the right of way in question is not of sufficient width to build another railroad parallel with the railroad already there, and yet it does not seek to condemn the existing railroad, but only the right of way. This ground of demurrer is also well taken.

Affirmed.

JACKSON v. HOLBROOK.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 13, 1908.)

COURTS (§ 231*)—APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Where plaintiff in 1907 built a division fence, and sued the adjoining landowner to recover his share of the price, the judgment was a personal liability only under Ky. St. 1903, § 1784, Act March 20, 1908, providing for a lien on the land of one refusing after notice to build his part of the division fence not applying, so that the action did not involve a lien on real estate, and, the judgment being for $40.50 only, the Court of Appeals has no jurisdiction on appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Grant County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by J. C. Holbrook against Van Jackson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Wm. Carnes, for appellant. J. J. Blackburn, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Early in the year 1907 the appellee, J. C. Holbrook, notified the appellant, Van Jackson, to build his part of a division fence. Appellant refused to do so, and thereupon appellee built the fence and sued appellant to recover $40.50, being appellant's proportion of the cost thereof. The action was brought in the quarterly court, and judgment rendered in favor of appellant. Thereupon an appeal was taken to the circuit court, and judgment rendered against appellant. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

By an act approved March 20, 1908, and constituting chapter 80 of the Acts of 1908, a lien upon the land of one who refuses, after due notice, to build his part of a division fence, is given for the cost thereof to the party erecting the fence. Prior to the enactment of this act, however, no such lien was allowed; section 1784 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903 imposing only a personal liability. That being the case, neither the title to, nor an interest in, nor a lien upon, real estate is involved in this action; and, as the sum sued for is only $40.50, it necessarily follows that this court is without jurisdiction.

For the reason given, the appeal is dismissed.

Mandamus by Moses N. Webster against the State Board of Health of Kentucky to compel the board to issue to plaintiff a certificate authorizing him to practice medicine. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. McKay, Moses N. Webster, and D. C. Points, for appellant. Kohn, Baird, Sloss & Kohn, for appellee.

BARKER, J. This action was instituted in the Jefferson circuit court for the purpose of obtaining a writ of mandamus against the State Board of Health requiring it to issue to the plaintiff, Moses N. Webster, a certificate authorizing him to practice medicine in this state. The allegation in the petition upon which the right to the certificate is based is that "he [plaintiff] is a resident citizen of this state of Kentucky, and a physician and versed in the healing art; that for several years prior to February 23, 1884, he was reputably and honorably engaged in the practice of medicine in the state of Kentucky, practicing his profession in the county of Grant and adjoining counties." The petition then alleges that on the 11th day of April, 1907, the plaintiff made application, in writing, to the State Board of Health for a certificate to practice medicine in this state, and that since that time two regular meetings of the board have passed, but it has taken no action on his application; that he has received information that the board does not intend to consider his application, wherefore he prays for the issuance of a writ to compel it to issue him a certificate which will enable him to practice his profession in the commonwealth of Kentucky. A general demurrer was interposed to plaintiff's petition, and sustained, and, having failed to amend, his petition was dismissed, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The plaintiff at the time he filed his petition was evidently under the impression that section 2613, Ky. St. 1903, was still in force, and overlooked the fact that the act of 1893 (Laws 1891-92-93, p. 748, c. 179), relative to empiricism, which forms a part of chapter 85, Ky. St. 1903, has been repealed by an act on the same subject, which was approved March 18, 1904, and is found in Acts 1904, p. 100, c. 34. We mention this fact, not that it alters appellant's position with reference to his right to a certificate to practice medicine, but simply for the purpose of measuring the allegations of his petition by the requirements of the law as it existed at the time his petition was filed. By the act of 1893 (section 2613, Ky. St. 1903) the State Board of Health was authorized to issue a certificate to practice medicine if it had "satisfactory evidence from the person claiming the same that such person was reputably and honorably engaged in the practice of medicine in this state prior to February twenty-third, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four." This act was amended in 1894, and the applicant was required to furnish satisfactory evidence that he had been honorably and reputably engaged in the practice of medicine in this state prior to February 23, 1884, and had passed a satisfactory examination before the board. By Acts 1904, p. 100, c. 34, above mentioned, no person is permitted to practice medicine in this state unless he shall first stand a satisfactory examination by the board in the branches of medicine as taught in reputable medical colleges; and the board is authorized, upon application, to admit to examination any person of good moral character who may possess either of the following qualifications: "(1) A diploma from a reputable medical college legally chartered under the laws of this state. (2) A diploma from a reputable and legally chartered medical college of some other state in this Union. (3) Satisfactory evidence from the person claiming the same that such person was reputably and honorably engaged in the practice of medicine in this state prior to February 23, 1884. Applicants may present their credentials by mail or proxy, and shall receive due notice of the place and date of examination."

It will be observed that the plaintiff's petition does not bring him within the purview of the law which he invokes. He does not claim to have made application for an examination as to his qualifications to practice medicine; but applies for a certificate without examination. It will be seen, as said before, that no one is entitled to practice medicine without having passed an examination satisfactory to the State Board of Health as to his qualifications. The mere fact that appellant practiced his profession prior to 1864 does not entitle him to a certificate. If the allegation was sufficiently pleaded, which we shall show it is not, the fact that he had practiced medicine prior to the named period of time would only entitle him to an examination, and not to a certificate, unless his examination showed that he was qualified in the opinion of the board to practice his profession. The petition, however, alleges simply that the plaintiff had for several years prior to 1864 practiced medicine in this state, but it does not allege that he has continuously practiced medicine since that time. Over 40 years have passed since 1864, and it is not alleged that during any of that time appellant has practiced his profession. If we take the mere letter of the statute, the allegation would seemingly be sufficient; but the Legislature did not mean that any person who was practicing the profession of medicine prior to 1864, as in the act of 1893, or prior to 1884, as in the present statute, should be entitled to a certificate if he had not been continuously practicing since that time. The object of the statute is to elevate the practice of medicine, and to raise a high standard of proficiency which the applicant must fully measure up to in order to secure a certificate authorizing him to practice his profession. One who had simply practiced medicine prior to 1864, or prior to 1884, but had not practiced it since, would be in no wise qualified to practice medicine in 1907. Construing the act, then, according to its spirit rather than its letter, in order to authorize the appellant to stand an examination and receive a certificate under the present law, he must either receive a diploma from a reputable medical college legally chartered under the laws of this state or of some other state in this Union, or, in the absence of a diploma, furnish satisfactory evidence that he was reputably and honorably engaged in the practice of medicine in this state continuously from February 23, 1884, until his application is made.

The statute under consideration is a wise and beneficent exercise of the police power of the commonwealth, enacted for the purpose of protecting the people of the state from imposition by empirics and quacks. It does not seek to prevent any honorable man or woman from practicing the profession of medicine. It only requires that they shall show, by a satisfactory examination before the State Board of Health, that they are qualified. There is no suggestion in the petition that the board is acting arbitrarily, or that it unlawfully seeks to prevent the appellant from obtaining a certificate; and we are not entitled, in the absence of such an allegation, to indulge in any presumption against its fairness. It is the high duty of the board to protect the health and safety of the public by requiring every applicant for a certificate to practice medicine to first show his qualifications. It is not necessary to demonstrate the constitutionality of the act. Such legislation has been uniformly upheld as an exercise of the police power of the state by our own court and other courts throughout the land. *Kentucky Board of Pharmacy v. SHARP v. SHARP.

DIVORCE (§ 37*)—GROUNDS—ABANDONMENT.

Where, in divorce, the wife did not appear, and the husband showed that she had abandoned him, and that they had lived apart for about two years, and that previous to the abandonment he had treated her kindly, provided her with a comfortable support, and had given her no reason to leave, the husband was entitled to a divorce.

Divorce by James Sharp against Queen Sharp. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

J. W. Schooler, for appellant.

CARROLL, J. This is an action for divorce, brought by appellant, James Sharp, who was plaintiff below, against appellee, Queen Sharp. Summons was duly executed upon the defendant in the county where the action was instituted; but she did not answer, or otherwise enter her appearance. The lower court dismissed the petition upon the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize a judgment granting a divorce.

Two witnesses testified in behalf of plaintiff. They said, in substance, that the defendant abandoned her husband in January, 1906, and that they had lived separate and apart continuously from that time until January, 1908; that previous to the abandonment the plaintiff treated his wife kindly, provided her with a comfortable support, and did not give her any reason to leave him. We think the evidence was sufficient under the statute to entitle the plaintiff to a divorce. Burton v. Burton, 112 S. W. 1102, 33 Ky. Law Rep. —.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment granting appellant a divorce from the bonds of matrimony with the appellee.

COLES v. COLES.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 13, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 317*)—HEARSAY.

Evidence in divorce for excessive sexual intercourse amounting to cruelty that the housekeeper of the parties had stated to witnesses that the husband would insist upon the wife submitting herself to him, and said that, if they did not take her from him, he would kill her, was competent only for the purpose of contradicting a denial by the housekeeper that she had made such a statement, and was not competent to show such alleged fact.

2. DIVORCE (§ 130*)—ACTIONS FOR—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence in divorce for excessive sexual intercourse amounting to cruelty held not to warrant a divorce on that ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 46*)—DEFENSES.

A wife who abandoned her husband without just cause is not entitled to a divorce either absolute or from bed and board.

4. DIVORCE (§ 249*)—DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—ACCOUNTING FOR RENTS.

A wife who abandoned her husband without just cause is not entitled to an accounting for rents of their home.

Divorce by Daisy M. Coles against Willard Coles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. G. Park, for appellant. R. G. Robbins, Robbins & Thomas, and W. J. Webb, for appellee.

CLAY, C. In this action the plaintiff, Daisy M. Coles, asks for a divorce from the defendant, Willard Coles. She also seeks alimony for herself and maintenance for her two infant children, who are of tender age. She further asks for a settlement of the property rights between herself and husband involved in a house and lot jointly owned by them, claiming not only one-half of the proceeds of the property, but the reasonable rental value of her one-half interest therein since the date of separation. This property was paid for one-half by the defendant and one-half by plaintiff's father. As a ground for divorce, plaintiff alleges that the defendant, Willard Coles, as her husband, has habitually behaved towards her as his wife for more than six months in such a cruel and inhuman manner as to indicate a settled aversion to her and to destroy permanently her peace and happiness. She also alleges that the defendant has so cruelly injured her as to indicate an outrageous disposition and temper in him, and has thereby destroyed her health and endangered her life and caused her great bodily injury, and has rendered her in danger of great bodily injury, and probable danger of her life, in remaining with him. Judgment was entered denying plaintiff the relief sought, and she appeals.

Appellant's contentions are: (1) The judgment should be reversed for the failure of the court to adjudge plaintiff the rents for the use and occupancy by her husband of her undivided one-half interest in the house and lot which they jointly own. (2) The judgment should be reversed because appellant made out her second ground for divorce as alleged in the petition. (3) Even if appellant is not entitled to an absolute divorce, she should be entitled to a divorce a mensa et thoro, with reasonable alimony and maintenance for herself and children.

It is insisted by appellant that her grounds for divorce were made out by proof of abuse in sexual intercourse by the husband which destroyed her health and endangered her life. Appellant relies upon the proposition of law set forth in 14 Cyc., at page 610, where it is said: "Sexual intercourse persisted in by the husband against the will of the wife to the injury of her health is cruelty affording her ground for divorce, if he knows or has reason to know the injury and suffering which his demands will inflict upon her"—citing Mayhew v. Mayhew, 61 Conn. 233, 23 Atl. 966, 29 Am. St. Rep. 195; Youngs v. Youngs, 33 Ill. App. 223; Id., 130 Ill. 230, 22 N. E. 806, 6 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 313. Counsel for appellant insists that, although it is extremely difficult to prove facts constituting the ground of divorce urged, the proof in this case abundantly supports the conclusion that appellee, with knowledge of his wife's condition, persisted in having sexual intercourse with her under such circumstances as endangered her health and life, and it amounted to cruelty on his part. According to the testimony of two physicians and of appellant's mother and father, appellant suffered frequently from severe nervous headaches and from pains in the abdomen in and near the region of the pelvis. The physicians state, however, that in their opinion such conditions were of rheumatic origin. There is nothing in their testimony to indicate that the conditions were produced by excessive sexual intercourse. The only thing in the record from which excessive sexual intercourse may be inferred is found in the testimony of appellant's parents, who claim that one Mrs. Davis, who was housekeeper at the home of the parties to this action, stated that appellee would frequently come home and insist upon appellant submitting herself to him, and that, if they did not take appellant away from appellee, he would kill her. The witnesses Mr. and Mrs. Melvin were permitted to testify to this fact after Mrs. Davis, upon cross-examination, had denied that she made such statement. Of course, such testimony as this was competent only for the purpose of contradicting Mrs. Davis. It was not substantive testimony against appellee. If such were the law, every person would be at the mercy of any other person who might see fit to make statements concerning him. As Mrs. Davis' statement testified to by the Melvins was competent only for the purpose of contradicting Mrs. Davis, and was not competent for the purpose of showing that appellee persisted in requiring that his wife yield to his demand, it follows that there is absolutely no proof of the ground insisted upon by appellant. We cannot conclude merely from the fact that a woman suffers from a nervous headache and pains in her abdomen and womb that such condition is produced by excessive sexual intercourse. It appears that appellant had borne two children, and had had an attack of scarlet fever. So far as the record shows, it is just as probable that her physical condition was due to these facts as that it was due to the fact that she was a victim of excessive sexual intercourse. Aside from this consideration, the evidence of nearly all the witnesses in this case, except the parents of appellant (and they did not testify to any facts within their own knowledge to the prejudice of appellee), is to the effect that appellee provided bountifully for his wife, and that his treatment of her was uniformly kind and considerate. This testimony tends to repudiate the idea that he was cruel in the particular charged by appellant.

The testimony shows that appellant left the home of appellee. She has failed to show that it was due to any fault on his part. Having abandoned her husband without just cause, so far as the record discloses, she is not entitled to a divorce, either absolute or from bed and board. Nor is she entitled to any rents from the home which she voluntarily abandoned.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed, and appellee will pay the costs.

FUNK'S GUARDIAN et al. v. FUNK.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 13, 1908.)

1. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 133*) — CARE OF WARD'S ESTATE — SUPERVISION BY COURT — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Ky. St. 1903, § 2034, provides in what cases disbursements shall be allowed a guardian for the maintenance and education of the ward beyond the income of his estate. Section 2039 gives the courts of chancery power to control the ward's custody, tuition, and management of his estate. Sections 2032 and 2033 give to the guardian possession and management of the ward's estate, with power to provide therefrom for his education and maintenance. Held that, while the guardian is charged with the wards' maintenance so far as the estate is sufficient, the final supervision is vested in the court of chancery, and arrangements by the guardian or parent must meet the approval either of the probate court or of the court of chancery, and a mother cannot recover from the principal of the wards' estate in an action at law against the guardian for their support where the guardian lets judgment go by default, but it must be shown what estate the wards have, its kind and productiveness, and the age and sex of the wards, so that the court may decide whether application of the principal of the estate is well founded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

2. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 3*)—SUPPORT OF INFANT CHILD—LIABILITY OF PARENT.

While the parent is presumably bound to support his infant children without charge upon their estate, yet, if the parent is poor and their estate more able to justly bear the expense, the parent may recover therefrom for their support.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bullitt County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Margaret Funk against Viola Funk's guardian and others. Judgment for plaintiff by default, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Ben Chapeze and Chapeze, Walde & Zimmerman, for appellants. J. F. Combs, for appellee.

O'REAR, C. J. This suit was brought as a common-law action by appellee, the mother of her infant children, against their statutory guardian to recover $75 a year for their board and clothing and her services in caring for them. It is alleged that appellee is a widow of very limited means, with barely enough to sustain herself; that the infants are of tender years, incapable of laboring for their support, and too young to be bound as apprentices; that they have estates, though the income therefrom is insufficient to educate and support them. She prayed for a judgment against the guardian for the sum alleged to be reasonable pay for their clothing, nurture, and education for several years previous, to be satisfied out of the estate in the hands of the guardian. A general demurrer to the petition was overruled. The guardian declining to plead, a judgment for the sum sued for was rendered by default. The guardian appeals.

The statute under which the action is said to have been brought is section 2034, Ky. St. 1903, as follows: "No disbursements shall be allowed the guardian for the maintenance and education of the ward beyond the income of the estate, except in the following cases, unless authorized by the deed or will under which the estate is derived. (1) When the ward is of such tender years or infirm health that he can not be bound out as an apprentice, or no suitable person will take him as such. (2) When it is best for the ward that the principal of his personal estate shall be applied for his board and tuition, and the court, upon settlement of the accounts, shall deem such application to have been judicious and properly made. But neither the ward nor his real estate shall be liable for any such disbursement." Section 2039, Ky. St. 1903, provides: "The several courts of chancery shall have power to hear and determine all matters between guardian and ward, require settlements of guardianship accounts, remove a guardian for neglect or breach of trust, control the custody and tuition of the ward and the management and preservation of his estate, and direct the sale of any of his real estate, if necessary to the proper maintenance and education of the ward, or for the payment of his debts." Sections 2032, 2033, Ky. St. 1903, read: "A guardian shall have the custody of his ward, and the possession, care, and management of the ward's estate, real and personal, and out of the estate shall provide for the necessary and proper maintenance and education of the ward." "The father of the minor if living, or if dead, the mother, if suited to the trust shall be allowed by the court to have the custody, control and education of the ward." It is thus shown that the supreme care of the law is the ward's welfare—first, his necessary maintenance; then, his proper education; then, the preservation and proper application of his estate. While it is recognized that the parent or guardian might properly look after the minor's education, and that the guardian is charged, so far as the estate is sufficient, with his maintenance, the final power of supervision and control in all these matters is left with the court of chancery. The sections quoted should be read together. The interests of the infant ward will not be left entirely to his parent or guardian or to their joint action. At last it must meet the approval either of the probate court where the guardian's accounts are to be settled, or of the court of chancery, which may have jurisdiction of the matter. If the guardian and parent could not out of court agree as between themselves as to the application of the ward's estate contrary to the final and supervisory judgment of the proper court before which the accounts may come for settlement, they could not bind it by proceedings in an action at law, where one alleges a state of facts to exist upon which an implied or express assumpsit is based against the ward's estate, and the other by confession admits his ward's estate to be liable, whereby it may be sequestered by execution. Nor should the guardian, in case of an honest doubt as to his duty and the ability of the ward's estate to properly maintain and educate the minor, be subjected to the hazard of having his accounts disallowed upon the final settlement. The guardian may sell his ward's personal estate without the intervention of a court (section 2031, Ky. St. 1903), and apply the proceeds as well as the rents from his lands to his maintenance and education, when he cannot be bound as an apprentice. One with whom he places the ward to board, and who furnishes clothing or other proper items of support, may maintain an action at law against the guardian to recover for the things so furnished. But, before a judgment will be rendered in such action, it should be made to appear what estate the ward has, as upon that fact will largely depend the reasonableness of the charge—a fact which cannot be substituted by the admission of the guardian and the judgment of a court of law upon it. The petition should have set out what estate the ward has, its kind and productiveness, the age and sex of the ward, so that the court might have seen whether the allegation was well founded that the application of the principal of the estate was required, in addition to its income to properly maintain and educate them.

This is not a suit to sell the ward's real estate for any of the purposes named. Such a proceeding is regulated by Civ. Code Prac. § 489. While the parent is presumably bound to support his infant children without charge upon their estate, yet if the parent is poor, and the estate of the children more able to justly bear the expense of their maintenance and education, the parent may recover for supporting them. Chapline v. Moore, 7 T. B. Mon. 150; Hughart v. Spratt, 78 Ky. 313; Hedges v. Hedges, 73 S. W. 1112, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2220; Harper v. Payne, 73 S. W. 1123, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2301.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

HIGHLAND REALTY CO. v. GROVES (Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. DEEDS (§ 149*)—RESTRICTIONS—VALIDITY.

While conditions imposing a restraint on the free use or alienation of realty are looked on with disfavor, they are upheld when not repugnant to a plain provision of the law and not unreasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 479; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 170*)—RESTRICTIONS—VALIDITY.

Deeds conveying adjacent lots purchased by the same grantee at different times and by independent transactions are not evidence of one transaction, and neither deed can be enlarged or restricted by what may have been said between the parties anteceding its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 170.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 100*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRANE- OUS CIRCUMSTANCES.

It is improper to inquire into the surroundings or extraneous circumstances to aid in the construction of an unambiguous deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 171*)—RESTRICTIONS—CONSTRU- TION.

Restrictions in conveyances of land by an owner platting a tract into lots and streets, stipulating that the property shall only be used for residence purposes, and no residences costing less than $3,000 shall be erected, do not permit the erection of a stable alone on a lot, though a stable used in connection with a residence on a lot may fall within the term residence purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

5. COVENANTS (§ 69*)—RESTRICTIONS—EN- FORCEMENT.

Where an owner platted land into lots and streets, and sold the lots subject to building restrictions enumerated in the deeds, the covenants ran with the land, and were mutual, inuring to the benefit of all the purchasers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

6. DEEDS (§ 171*)—RESTRICTIONS—VALIDITY.

Restrictions in conveyances of lots by an owner platting a tract into lots and streets, stipulating that the property shall only be used for residence purposes, and no residence costing less than a specified sum shall be erected, are not unreasonable, and the courts cannot reject them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

7. DEEDS (§ 171*)—RESTRICTIONS—CONSTRU- TION.

An owner platting a tract into lots and streets conveyed a lot by deed containing building restrictions. Subsequently he conveyed to the same purchaser an adjacent lot by deed, stipulating that the lot should be used for residence purposes, and that no residence costing less than $3,000 should be erected thereon. Held, that the purchaser could not erect a stable on the adjacent lot, though used in connection with the first lot, on which his residence was located.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Highland Realty Company against Charles I. Groves. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Johnson & Heatt, for appellant. R. C. & J. J. Davis, for appellee.

O'REAR, C. J. The appellant laid out a subdivision on the outskirts of the city of Louisville, beyond the city limits, but practically being a part of the urban territory. It laid out streets, alleys, and courts, and cut up into lots the property so platted.

Many of the lots have been sold to purchasers for residence purposes. The scheme was widely advertised that none but well-appointed residences would be allowed in the subdivision, and that no other class of buildings would be suffered. In the deeds to each lot sold a condition was imposed that the purchaser should not use the lot for any but residence purposes, and expressly forbidding its sale or use for certain other purposes. It was also provided that none but a residence to cost not less than the amount specified in each deed should ever be erected upon the lot. In this way it was believed the desirability of the lots would be enhanced, as all would thereby be insured immunity from the encroachment of an undesirable class of tenements and occupations which are thought to depreciate the selling value of purely residence properties. Appellee purchased one of these lots with a similar restriction contained in the deed as to its use. Subsequently he purchased of the same vendor, the appellant, an adjoining lot, being on the corner of Kenilworth Place and Hampden Court. In the deed to the latter lot was this condition: "Party of the second part, as part of the consideration of this conveyance, hereby binds himself, his heirs and his assigns, not to use the property herein conveyed except for residence purposes, and that any residence erected thereon shall not cost less than three thousand dollars, and shall not be built nearer to Hampden Court than the residence now on said lot No. 18, Block No. 8, and the second party binds himself, his heirs and assigns not to sell or rent said property to persons of African descent, nor to permit same to be used for the sale of malt, spirituous, or vinous liquors for a period of fifty years." At the time appellee purchased the last named lot from appellant it was unimproved. Appellee then resided, and yet resides, on the adjoining lot, which he had previously bought from appellant. There is not a fence or other marked line between the two lots. Appellee began the erection of a stable on the lot last purchased, building it near the pavement line on Kenilworth Place. The dimensions of this lot are 40 feet by 180 feet. Appellant, still owning a number of lots in the same block as well as in adjacent blocks, brought this action in equity against appellee, suing on its own behalf and on the behalf of its vendees who had bought lots adjoining or in the immediate vicinity all upon similar conditions to that imposed in appellee's deed, and many of whom who had built residences on their lots at or above the minimum cost allowed by the deeds, seeking to enjoin the erection of the stable. Upon final hearing the chancellor refused the injunction.

While such conditions as impose a restraint upon the free use or alienation of real estate are looked upon with disfavor by the courts, and are rather strictly construed, inasmuch as they detract from the freest use of the fee simple, and are annoying to owners and intending purchasers, being somewhat at variance, too, with the system in vogue in this country which regards real estate as an article of commerce, still they are upheld when not repugnant to some plain provision of the law, and are not unreasonable in themselves. Hutchinson v. Uhrlich, 145 Ill. 836, 34 N. E. 556, 21 L. R. A. 391; Blakemore v. Stanley, 159 Mass. 6, 33 N. E. 689; Roberts v. Porter, 100 Ky. 130, 37 S. W. 485; Washburn on Easements and Servitude, 58. The question here is the construction of the clause quoted above, containing the condition. It is contended by appellee, and seems to have been the view of the chancellor below, that what was said between the parties upon the occasion when appellee bought the first lot, and the fact that he now owns both lots, using the one first purchased as a residence lot, and the second in connection therewith, that the covenants in the two deeds should be read together. These two deeds in no sense evidence parts of one transaction. The two lots were bought at different times, and in independent transactions. Neither deed can be enlarged or restricted by what may have been said between the parties anteceding its execution. This suit is not for a reformation of the deeds upon the ground of mistake or fraud. Nor does there appear in this record ground for such claim. Each deed must, therefore, be interpreted according to its own terms alone, and, as they are not ambiguous, it is unnecessary and would be improper to inquire into the surroundings or extraneous circumstances for aid in its construction.

Appellee insists that as a stable is not a nuisance per se (Hyden v. Terry, 108 S. W. 241, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 1198; Albany Christian Church v. Wilborn, 112 Ky. 507, 66 S. W. 285), and as his is a suburban residence, and his profession that of a physician, that a stable under such circumstance is a residence purpose, and the building of the stable is not a violation of the covenant in the deed. If the residence required by the condition in the deed had been first erected, a stable to be used in connection with it might fall within the term "residence purposes." (Blakemore v. Stanley, supra), but it can scarcely be maintained that a stable alone fulfills the condition of residence purposes. That which is allowed as an incident of a principal right should follow in order of time, if it is not contemporaneous, else as the grantor here could not ever compel the erection of the dwelling house, the stable alone would be upon the lot, in spite of the condition to the contrary. That such a structure, though not a legal nuisance, might be so objectionable as to offend the taste of the near neighbors and affect the values of adjoining or adjacent properties, is easy to be conceived. It was precisely such conditions that were sought to be avoided by appellant and those who had previously purchased from it. The covenants run with the land, and are mutual, inuring to the benefit of all appellant's vendees. Nor do they appear to be unreasonable so as to cause their rejection by the courts.

Appellee's contention that he is using the 40-foot lot for residence purposes by building a stable on it to be used in connection with the 100-foot lot on which his residence is located must be rejected. When he covenanted not to use the 40 foot lot for any but residence purposes, it was contemplated by the language that the residence and such incidental use as went with it should all be upon that lot.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions to grant and perpetuate the injunction prayed for.

SUMNER v. GRIFFIN et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 12, 1908.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 570*)—BAR—DISMISSAL WITHOUT PREJUDICE.

The record of the proceedings, in an action which was dismissed without prejudice, on motion of plaintiff, is not admissible in a subsequent action between the same parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1030; Dec. Dig. § 570.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 949*)—PLEADING AS ESTOPPEL—IDENTITY OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

To make a former judgment a bar to a subsequent action, it must appear that the two causes of action were identical, and that the proceedings in the former suit were such as to preclude plaintiff from bringing another action for the same cause; and allegations that the controversy had been litigated in a prior suit between the parties, the record of such suits being only referred to as a part of the answer, are defective in failing to set out the record in the former suit, so as to show that the present cause of action was in issue and was adjudicated therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1800; Dec. Dig. § 949.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 311*)—ALLEGATIONS—REFERENCE TO EXHIBITS.

An exhibit referred to therein will not aid a defective pleading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 945; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 949*)—PLEADING AS ESTOPPEL.

A plea of former adjudication should show the nature and scope of the former decision, and its application to the present controversy, and particularly should show that it was rendered before the institution of the present suit, the relief granted therein, and that it was a final adjudication, but it need not allege that the former judgment is valid, or remains in force, or has not been reversed, vacated, or appealed from; these being presumed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by Peter Sumner against William Griffin and another. From a judgment on a directed verdict for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

T. Z. Morrow, for appellant. Virgil P. Smith and O. H. Waddle & Son, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. Peter Sumner brought this suit against William Griffin and Nody Griffin, alleging that he was the owner of a certain tract of land, and that the defendants were without right in possession of a part of the tract, and were unlawfully keeping him out of possession. William Griffin filed an answer, in which he denied that Sumner was the owner of the land, and pleaded that he was the owner, and that he and those under whom he claimed had been in adverse possession of it for 30 years. In another paragraph of the answer he pleaded that the controversy in the action had theretofore been litigated and settled between the parties in two separate suits in the same court, in which the same questions were at issue, and that, by reason of the judgment in those suits, the plaintiff was estopped from the prosecution of this action. The record in those cases was referred to as part of the answer. By consent of parties the affirmative allegations of this paragraph of the answer were traversed of record. After the plaintiff on the trial had introduced evidence which made out for him a prima facie case, the defendant William Griffin was introduced as a witness, and said that Nody Griffin was living on the land under him, and that he had been sued for this land three times by the plaintiff. The clerk of the court was then introduced, and read to the jury a judgment in case 3,801 of Peter Sumner v. William Griffin, which showed that the court, at the conclusion of the evidence, had instructed the jury in that action peremptorily to find for the defendants, and that this was done and the petition dismissed. But no part of the pleadings in that case were read, and nothing was introduced but the judgment, which does not show what was in controversy in that action, or identify the cause of action in any way with the cause of action here sued for. The clerk then read to the jury the proceedings in action 3,954 of Peter Sumner v. William Griffin, which showed that the action was, on motion of plaintiff, dismissed without prejudice. The plaintiff objected to the introduction of each of said records, and, his objection being overruled, excepted. The court thereupon instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals.

The court should not have allowed the defendant to read to the jury the proceedings in action 3,954, which was dismissed without prejudice, as that record threw no light upon the controversy. The only other thing read to the jury was the judgment in action 3,801, but this was wholly insufficient to show that the proceedings in that case were a bar to this action. In order to make out a bar the plaintiff must show by the record and other proof the identity of the cause of action in that case with the thing in controversy in this case, and that the proceedings there were such as to conclude the plaintiff from bringing another action for that cause. On the return of the case the defendant will be allowed to amend his answer. The answer does not show that the cause of action is the same, or state facts sufficient to manifest prima facie that the plaintiff is concluded by the judgment in the actions referred to. The rule is well settled that an exhibit will not help out a defective pleading, and here the records are merely referred to. A copy of them was not filed as an exhibit with the pleading. In 23 Cyc. 1525, the rule is thus stated: "There is no special form for pleading a former adjudication, nor is it required to be pleaded with special strictness; but the plea should show the nature and scope of the former decision, and its applicability to the present controversy as a judicial determination of the points or questions in issue. In particular it should show the date or time of the rendition of the prior decision, or at least that it was given before the institution of the suit at bar, the amount of the recovery or relief granted by the judgment, and that the judgment was a final adjudication, although it is not necessary to allege that the judgment is valid, that it remains in full force, or that it has not been reversed, vacated, or appealed from, as these things are presumed." To the same effect see 9 Ency. Pl. & Pr., 619-621.

The common-law forms for such a plea are given in 3 Chitty on Pleading, side pages 929, 1062. These forms contain the averment that the judgment is in force, but in 1 Chitty on Pleading, side page 371, it is said: "It is usual, also, to allege that the judgment still remains in full force and effect, and that the plaintiff has not obtained execution or satisfaction thereof; but this allegation is unnecessary." In Kenney v. Howard, 67 Vt. 380, 31 Atl. 850, the court, holding sufficient such a plea, said: "It is urged that this plea is bad because it does not allege that the judgment of the probate court still remains in full force, and not reversed, satisfied, or made void. Such an allegation is not necessary. If a judgment set out in a plea does not remain in full force, the other party may show it in the replication." So in Campbell v. Cross, 39 Ind. 155, the court said: "We think that on principle, as well as authority, a party in pleading a judgment is not bound to allege, in addition to the statement of its recovery or rendition, that it still remains in full force, etc., because when rendered it is presumed to remain in force until the contrary appears. Presumptions of law need not be stated. If a judgment pleaded has been set aside or reversed, the other party can avail himself of the fact in response to the party pleading the judgment." To the same effect are Murphy v. Orr, 32 Ill. 489, Fenn v. Roach (Tex. Civ. App.) 75 S. W. 361, 2 Saunders on Pl. & Ev., 254, and 1 Abbott's Forms, 333. Hornick v. Holt-rup, 76 S. W. 874, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1030, went off, on the ground that the case was submitted prematurely.

While the plea here was not defective in that it was not averred that the judgment pleaded in bar was in force, it was defective in that it did not set out so much of the record as was necessary to show that the matter here sued for was in issue and was adjudicated in that action on the merits.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

OWENSBORO SEATING & CABINET CO v. MILLER.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—STOCK—SUBSCRIPTION—DISCHARGE OF LIABILITY.

Defendant subscribed for shares in a Wisconsin corporation, to be organized with a capital stock of $250,000, with the understanding that the corporate plant would be located in a certain city, and attended the first meeting of those interested, but left the meeting when he learned that the plant was not to be located in that place, and those remaining adopted a resolution making the capital stock $250,000, to be divided into 2,500 shares, 1,500 common and 1,000 preferred stock, and at the next meeting, which defendant did not attend, it was agreed to dissolve the Wisconsin corporation and organize a Kentucky corporation in its place, the latter corporation having an authorized capital stock of $200,000, divided into 2,000 shares, 800 of which might be 7 per cent. preferred stock, with priority of dividends, and the same number 6 per cent. preferred. Held, that defendant's liability as a subscriber to the Wisconsin corporation terminated with its dissolution, so that the Kentucky corporation could not enforce his subscription, and he was not estopped from denying his liability thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 327; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 197*)—STOCK—SUBSCRIPTIONS—RIGHT OF SUBSCRIBERS.

A mere subscriber for capital stock, before its issue or payment therefor, has no right to vote, and cannot participate in the management of the corporation.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—STOCK—SUBSCRIPTIONS—RELEASE.

A material alteration in a contract of subscription for stock without the consent of the subscriber will release his obligation, so that one subscribing under an understanding as to the amount and nature of the capital stock, the corporate business, or the location of its organization, is not liable upon his subscription if the corporation, when organized, is different in those respects from that contemplated by the contract of subscription, in the absence of facts estopping him from denying his liability.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Daviess County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by the Owensboro Seating & Cabinet Company against Elmer Miller. From a judgment for defendant dismissing the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Wells and Hays & Johnson, for appellant. J. D. Atchison and O. S. Walker, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. The appellant company, plaintiff below, sought to recover of appellee, defendant below, $2,500 on the following subscription: "We, the undersigned, hereby subscribe for the number of shares of stock in the R. O. Evans Company, and of the kind that is set opposite our names, and we agree to pay for the same twenty-five per cent. cash, balance in one, two and three months, at one hundred dollars per share. This subscription not to be binding unless $75,000.00 or more is subscribed." In October, 1903, the appellee subscribed for 25 shares of stock, but the subscription does not describe the kind of stock. The R. O. Evans Company at the time appellee subscribed for the stock was a Wisconsin corporation, organized under the laws of that state. In 1904 the Wisconsin corporation was dissolved, and a Kentucky corporation, styled the "R. O. Evans Company" was organized. The articles of incorporation of the Kentucky corporation declared that it was the object and purpose of the corporation to acquire and hold all the property and privileges acquired under the Wisconsin charter, and to operate the plants, mills, and factories of that corporation, carry on the business theretofore done by it, and to assume all of its liabilities and obligations. Subsequently, by amended articles of incorporation, its name was changed to the Owensboro Seating & Cabinet Company. The appellee having refused to pay his subscription, this action was brought against him in September, 1906.

The petition alleged that more than $75,000 was subscribed for stock in the corporation before the 3d day of November, 1903, and that on that date the appellee and others who had subscribed for stock met for the purpose of organizing the corporation, and did organize it under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, pursuant to the articles of incorporation which had been executed in January, 1903, according to the laws of that state. The answer set up several defenses, among them that the amount of subscriptions required to bind the shareholders was never subscribed; that the subscription sued on was obtained by fraud; that the R. O. Evans Company at the time the subscription was made was an existing corporation, and its dissolution rendered invalid the subscription. At the time the subscription paper was signed by appellee, the R. O. Evans Company was in fact an existing corporation, with an authorized capital stock of $250,000, and his subscription was really a purchase of 25 shares of stock, upon the condition that $75,000 or more should be subscribed. So that the first question to be considered is, Did the dissolution of that corporation discharge appellee from his obligation to pay for the stock? If appellee subscribed for stock in a Wisconsin corporation, and the corporation went out of existence before he was required to pay his subscription, could the Kentucky corporation enforce the subscription? The Wisconsin corporation, to which appellee subscribed, had a large authorized capital stock, but no assets. It had never attempted to transact any business, and was really not organized for the purpose of doing business. It was a foreign corporation, with an authorized capital of $250,000, to consist of 2,500 shares of the par value of $100 each. The rights and liabilities of its stockholders were fixed and determined by the laws of the state of Wisconsin. The Kentucky corporation had an authorized capital of $200,000, divided into 2,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Six hundred shares of this stock, at the option of the stockholders, might be 7 per cent. preferred stock, and 600 shares 6 per cent. preferred stock, the holders of the 7 per cent. preferred stock being entitled to priority in the distribution of dividends. The rights and liabilities of its shareholders were determined by the laws of Kentucky.

Appellee's name does not appear as one of the organizers or shareholders in the Kentucky corporation. In fact he never attended but one meeting of the persons interested in these corporations. It seems that appellee subscribed for the stock with the understanding that the plant to be operated by the corporation should be established within the city of Owensboro, and not in the suburb called "Seven Hills"; and that, except for this understanding on his part, he would not have subscribed at all. But at the first meeting of the persons interested in the concern, held on November 3, 1903, at which appellee was present, it was disclosed that the establishment was to be conducted at Seven Hills, and not in the city of Owensboro, and also that an existing plant at Seven Hills was to be bought by the corporation and used in connection with its business; and when appellee learned this, he immediately left the meeting, and never afterwards took any part in the enterprise, nor did he attend any other meeting of stockholders or persons interested in its affairs. After he left the meeting the Wisconsin charter was produced, and a resolution presented and adopted by those present, organizing under it and electing officers. A resolution was also adopted at this meeting providing that the total amount of the capital stock of the corporation should be $250,000, divided into 2,500 shares of $100 each, and that 1,500 of these shares should be common stock, and 1,000 preferred stock. The next meeting was held in September, 1904. At this meeting it was resolved: "That it is for the best interests of this incorporation to dissolve as a Wisconsin corporation and surrender its charter and reorganize under the laws of Kentucky, as suggested by the report of the committee just received; and the directors are hereby requested to take such action as may be necessary to bring about such dissolution and reorganization, and to transfer all the assets of the present corporation to the new corporation." Accordingly, the Wisconsin corporation was thereupon dissolved, and the Kentucky corporation organized.

Assuming that appellee's subscription was binding as an obligation upon his part to take and pay for 25 shares of stock in the Wisconsin corporation, the question is, Can the Kentucky corporation, under the facts heretofore stated, enforce this liability? We think not. The agreement on the part of appellee was to subscribe for a specific number of shares in a Wisconsin corporation. When that corporation dissolved and its legal existence was terminated, the liability of appellee as a subscriber to its stock also ended; there being no creditors of that concern seeking relief. No stock was ever issued to appellee, and the mere agreement to subscribe for stock in a corporation does not bind the subscriber to take the same amount of stock in another corporation that may be organized as the successor of the one to whose capital he subscribed. Appellee, as a mere subscriber for stock, had no voice whatever in the management or conduct of the corporation, and could not participate in its affairs. Hence he had no right to a vote, nor anything to say about its management, dissolution, nor reorganization. Nor do we find anything in the record that operates to estop appellee from making the defense that he was not a party to the dissolution of the Wisconsin corporation or the creation of the Kentucky corporation. On the contrary, it is conceded that he was only present at the first meeting of the subscribers of stock in the Wisconsin corporation, and did not thereafter in any manner participate in the subsequent meetings of the shareholders, or consent to the dissolution of the Wisconsin corporation or to the organization of the Kentucky corporation in its place. A contract to subscribe for stock in a corporation is governed by the same principles that apply to other contracts. It is a well-established rule that a material alteration or change in the contract without the consent of the subscriber will release him from his obligations under the contract. A subscriber to the shares of a corporation, where the amount and nature of the capital stock, the business the corporation proposes to engage in, and the situs of its organization are agreed upon, cannot be held liable upon his contract of subscription if, without his consent, or the existence of facts or circumstances that operate as an estoppel or constitute a waiver upon his part, the corporation organized is different in purpose or character, or has a different capital, or varies in any essential particular from the corporation described in the subscription paper. Thompson on Corporations, §§ 72, 1268; 1 Cook on Corporations, § 197; Clarke & Marshall on Corporations, p. 1495; 10 Cyc. 405; Burrows v. Smith, 10 N. Y. 550; Norwich Lock Mfg. Co. v. Hockaday, 89 Va. 558, 16 S. E. 877; Newport Cotton Mill Co. v. Mims, 103 Tenn. 465, 53 S. W. 736.

Applying this principle to the case at hand, we find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that material, indeed radical, changes in the subscription contract were made by the associates of the appellee in the enterprise, and that these changes were made without his consent, and that he did not waive his rights to resist the enforcement of his subscription, or do anything to estop him from setting up a defense. Wherefore the judgment of the lower court dismissing the petition of appellant is affirmed.

FELAND v. BERRY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 12, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 878*) — CROSS-APPEAL—FAILURE TO PROSECUTE.

Appellee's failure to prosecute a cross-appeal is a waiver of rulings against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 8578; Dec. Dig. § 878.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 322*)—CROPPING CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

A cropping contract provided that the landlord was to have a 12-acre tobacco barn built, she to pay the cost of the same, the tenant agreeing to attend to the building of the barn, and that all labor should be at a reasonable price. Held, that the landlord was bound to furnish on the ground material to build the barn, the tenant being only required to attend to the work of putting up the building, and to procure the workmen to be paid by the landlord, so that the landlord was liable for injury to the tenant's tobacco crop because of her failure to furnish materials for the barn in time to allow its erection before the crop was injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 322.*]

3. INDEMNITY (§ 14*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—EVIDENCE.

Where a tenant, with his landlord's consent, sublet half of the tobacco land he had agreed to plant under a cropping contract, in which the landlord agreed to build a tobacco barn to house the tobacco, which she failed to do, resulting in the loss of a large part of the sublessee's tobacco, as well as that of the tenant, and the sublessee recovered judgment against the tenant for the damages sustained, such judgment, while not conclusive against the landlord, was admissible against her to establish the tenant's damages; it further appearing that the tenant employed counsel and made a reasonably efficient and skillful defense in the suit in which the judgment was recovered against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

4. DAMAGES (§ 23*)—CONTRACT—BREACH.

Where defendant was notified, when a contract was made, that it was made with reference to a subcontract, on defendant's breach plaintiff could recover from defendant damages, caused by his being compelled to break the subcontract, because of defendant's breach of the original contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 331*)—CROPPING CONTRACT—BREACH—DAMAGES.

Where, when plaintiff made a cropping contract with defendant, and assumed one-half of the expense of supporting both families, who lived together, defendant's family was composed of herself, her husband, and daughter, and the family was increased by defendant's son afterwards becoming a member without plaintiff's consent, plaintiff was entitled to recover for the additional expense imposed on him by being compelled to furnish part of the son's support.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lincoln County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by R. L. Berry against M. C. Feland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. M. McRoberts and J. W. Alcorn, for appellant. G. B. Saufley, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. The appellant, Mary C. Feland, is the owner of and resides upon a valuable farm in Lincoln county. Her husband being an invalid, appellant, in October, 1905, induced the appellee, R. L. Berry, her son-in-law, then a resident of Bath county, to remove to her farm and cultivate 175 acres thereof in the year 1906, under the following contract: "This contract entered into between Mrs. A. M. Feland, party of the first part, and R. L. Berry, party of the second part, said Mrs. Feland rents to R. L. Berry 175 acres of land more or less to cultivate 100 acres for corn, 50 acres for hemp, and 20 for tobacco, the corn to be well cultivated by party of the first part and one-half of said corn to be put in crib for Mrs. Feland and her half of fodder to be set up and tied, one field of corn known as Pike field, and two more fields on each side of garden, said party of the first part rents said second party 50 acres for hemp, bluegrass sod, known as hill field, said second agrees to cultivate well and deliver Mrs. Feland when it is sold, said R. L. Berry gets three-fifths of money and Mrs. Feland two-fifths; also 20 acres for tobacco, 15 acres in backwoods, and rest 5 in hill field, said R. L. Berry agrees to raise this tobacco and give Mrs. Feland one-half of same in bulk in winter order, said R. L. Berry agrees to furnish all seed, tools, and teams that are necessary to cultivate said crop, Mrs. Feland agrees to graze (in season) six work mules, three horses, and two milch cows free of charge for R. L. Berry, also pay him in money, $160.00 rent on house and land for tenant, also lets him have a lot for his stock, known as bull lot. Said R. L. Berry is to live in the house with said Mrs. Feland, and each to furnish one-half of living expenses. R. L. Berry is to keep two hands and Mrs. Feland is to board one for work done for such as cutting wood, working in garden, milking and feeding and attending to her stock. Said R. L. Berry agrees to cut weeds around fencing where he cultivates. This agreement for land is for the year 1906 R. L. Berry has the right to stay with Mrs. Feland until he has time to save his crop. Said Mrs. Feland agrees to have a twelve acre tobacco barn built, she to pay all costs for same, and said R. L. Berry agrees to attend to the building of same, and all labor to be at a reasonable price for same." Pursuant to the above contract appellee took up his residence at the home of appellant, and undertook the cultivation of the 175 acres of land as therein provided. At that time appellant's family consisted of herself, husband, and an unmarried daughter. The contract between appellant and appellee required the latter to cultivate 100 acres of the land rented by him in corn, 50 acres in hemp, and 20 in tobacco, the corn and tobacco to be equally divided between appellant and appellee, the former to be paid two-fifths and the latter three-fifths of the hemp. It will be observed that the contract also provides: "Said Mrs. Feland agrees to have a twelve acre tobacco barn built, she to pay all cost for same; said R. L. Berry agrees to attend to the building of same and all labor to be at a reasonable price." It was contemplated by the parties, and meant by the contract, that the barn was to be of sufficient size to store all the tobacco raised on the 20 acres of land, as the first cutting would, after hanging a few days in the barn, so shrink as to allow room for the second or more cuttings when made. When the contract in question was made, appellee informed appellant that he had, subject to her approval, made a contract with D. L. Clark, whereby Clark was to cultivate 10 acres of the 20 acres allotted to tobacco, which appellee agreed he might house in the barn to be erected by appellant, to which she readily assented. Appellant was to receive one-half of the tobacco raised by Clark under the contract with appellee, and Clark the other half, appellee to remain responsible to appellant for the proper cultivation and division of the tobacco by Clark. The 20 acres of land were cultivated in tobacco, one half by appellee, and the other half by Clark; but, as the barn was not completed by appellant by the time the tobacco on the 20 acres was cut and ready to be housed, it was so injured by overripeness, frost, and exposure to the weather that much of appellee's, and practically the whole of Clark's, tobacco was rendered unmarketable and worthless. In January, 1907, appellee was sued by Clark for the injury to and destruction of the tobacco raised by the latter on the 10 acres of land, resulting from the failure of the former to furnish him a barn in which to store it. Appellee made defense to the action, but the trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in Clark's behalf for $500, and this sum, together with $59 costs adjudged Clark in the action, appellee paid. He thereupon instituted the present action against appellant, seeking to recover of her the $559 he paid in satisfaction of Clark's judgment, and further damages to the amount of $560, for the loss of a large part of the tobacco he (appellee) raised upon the 10 acres cultivated by him, all of which damages, it was alleged, resulted to him from a breach of the rent contract, caused by the failure of appellant to build the barn in time to store the tobacco raised by himself and Clark.

In addition to the damages mentioned appellee also sought to recover of appellant in the action $75 damages for a further breach of the rent contract, alleged to have been committed by her in taking into her house, after appellee removed to her residence her son, A. M. Feland, Jr., and making him a member of her family, the son doing nothing to support himself, or in rendering assistance in running the farm; and this, it was averred, added to appellee's burden by putting him to additional labor and expense, as under his contract with appellant he was compelled to provide "one-half of the living expenses" of the family. It was further averred in the petition that, at the time the rent contract was entered into, appellant agreed that the family, the half of whose support he was required to provide, should be composed of appellee and his wife, appellant, her husband, and unmarried daughter. That appellant then promised him her son should not reside with or become a member of the family, and that in inviting and receiving him into the family she violated that promise and her contract with appellee, and increased the expense of maintaining the family during the son's stay with them at least $150, one-half of which, $75, appellee was compelled to pay, and did pay. We omit mention of other items of damages claimed in the petition by appellee, as they were rejected by the lower court, and appellee has not taken a cross-appeal. Appellant's answer controverted the affirmative matter of the petition, and by way of counterclaim sought to recover of appellee damages for certain alleged violations, on his part, of the contract between them; that it is charged that, while under the contract appellant was to pay for the material and work of building the barn, appellee by the contract was required to procure the material, which he failed to do until much of the tobacco produced by him and Clark had been injured and destroyed, although she was all the time ready and able to pay for such material and labor, and that the alleged negligence of appellee in this particular caused the injury to and loss of the tobacco of appellee and Clark, and of her part of it as well, whereby she was damaged $700, for which sum she prayed judgment. The other items of damage asserted by the counterclaim were based upon the alleged improper cultivation by appellee of the corn and hemp crops, and these, as we shall presently see, were by the judgment of the lower court allowed appellant.

The averments of the answer and counterclaim were controverted by reply, and upon the issues thus formed the case went to trial before the court, the parties having waived a jury. The court's findings of fact, as shown by the record, were: First, that appellee violated the contract, in that he failed to properly care for the corn and hemp crops; second, that appellant violated the contract, in that she failed to furnish on the ground material for the building of the barn in time, and that the barn was not built because of her fault; third, that A. M. Feland, Jr., became a member of appellant's family, which was not contemplated by the parties at the time the contract was entered into. Resulting from the above conclusions of fact, the court found as a matter of law: First, that appellant was entitled to recover of appellee on her counterclaim $150; second, that appellee was entitled to recover of appellant the sum of $559, the amount of the Clark judgment and cost, and the further sum of $25, on account of additional expense for maintaining A. M. Feland, Jr., as a member of appellant's family. Upon these findings of law and fact judgment was entered in appellee's favor for $434. Appellant was refused a new trial, hence this appeal.

The failure of appellee to prosecute a cross-appeal makes it unnecessary for us to consider the ruling of the circuit court in allowing appellant $150 damages for appellee's improper cultivation of the corn and hemp crops. We concur, however, in that court's conclusion that appellant's failure to furnish on the ground material for the building of the barn prevented its erection by appellee in time to house and save the tobacco. The contract declares that, "Mrs. Feland agrees to have a twelve-acre barn built, she to pay all cost for same. * * *" The language quoted imposed no duty upon any person other than appellant to build the barn. By necessary implication she was to furnish the material for the building, and place, or cause it to be placed, where the building was to be erected; that is, on the ground. The next words of the clause relating to the barn, are: "Said R. L. Berry agrees to attend to the building of the same. * * *" There is not here an intimation that appellee was to see to the selection of the material, to bargain for it, or have it carried to the place where the barn was to be erected. But he was required to "attend to the building of same"; that is, to control the work of erection or construction, after the material was placed on the ground. The remaining words of the clause are: "And all labor to be at a reasonable price." This sentence, in connection with the preceding words "Said R. L. Berry agrees to attend to the building of same," defines appellee's whole duty with respect to the barn. He was simply to attend to the work of putting up the building and to procure the workmen; but, as to the latter service, he was required to get the workmen at reasonable prices, for they were to be paid by appellant, and the contract limited him to the employment of only such labor as could be had at "a reasonable price." If it had been contemplated by the parties to the contract that appellee should bargain for the material for the barn and have it furnished on the ground, that instrument would, we think, have been made to contain a provision restricting him to the payment of reasonable prices in purchasing material, as it restricts him to reasonable prices in procuring workmen for the building of the barn. The absence of such restriction as to the price of material is strongly persuasive that it was the purpose of appellant to retain in her own hands the purchase of all material for the barn. So our conclusion is that, in obligating herself by the contract to "have a barn built," appellant undertook to build the barn and furnish everything to complete it, except that she was relieved of hiring workmen and superintending the building; that part of the work having been imposed by the contract upon appellee, although the workmen were to be paid by her.

Our construction of the contract appears to be sustained by much of the evidence. Appellee does not seem to have been known by the people of Lincoln county, and was apparently without money or credit. Although appellant was to pay all cost of building the barn, it appears from the evidence that she neither furnished, nor offered to furnish, appellee or any other person money with which to buy material or hire workmen. At first she insisted that the material for the barn should be made from timber on her farm, and then abandoned this idea. She seems also to have refused to engage one Barnett, the owner of a sawmill, to saw the lumber, though appellee had made for her a tentative contract with Barnett to do so. Afterwards she changed her mind, and concluded to contract with Barnett, but it was then too late, his mill had been removed from the community. At another time she commenced to get some of the material for the barn from a tract of knob land adjacent to her farm, but found the timber there insufficient in quantity. By neglecting appellee's advice, interfering with his plans to assist her, and otherwise delaying work on the barn, she prevented its completion until the tobacco produced by appellee, from over-ripeness and exposure to inclement weather, was greatly injured, and that of Clark from the same causes was practically destroyed. Appellee saved a part of his by storing it in stock barns on appellant's farm, but no place could be secured for the tobacco of Clark. There seemed to have been an opportunity afforded appellee at one time to rent a barn in the neighborhood from one Hackly, but it could only be reached by a rough road, hauling the tobacco in its green state over which would have greatly bruised and injured it. Besides, when Hackly offered to rent appellee the barn, Clark's tobacco, which ripened before appellee's, had been substantially all cut, and from over-ripeness and exposure to inclement weather ruined in the field. Moreover, when Hackly's barn could have been rented, it was believed by appellant and appellee that appellant's barn could still be finished in time to store therein the larger part of appellee's crop, as it only lacked a roof, and but for appellant's persistency in trying to get boards from her knob land, where they were not to be had, the roof would have been completed in time to save the greater part of appellee's tobacco. It is useless to consider whether appellee was negligent in failing to rent Hackly's barn, or whether such negligence caused injury to his own tobacco, as the lower court allowed him no damages for injury to or the loss of his tobacco.

It is, however, insisted for appellant that the amount of the judgment obtained by Clark against appellee cannot be recovered by the latter of appellant in this case. We do not think this contention sound. It was, in substance, alleged in the petition, and established by the evidence, that when appellant contracted to build the barn she knew Clark was to cultivate in tobacco 10 of the 20 acres appellee had agreed to produce on her land, and that the barn she was to build was to be used for housing Clark's tobacco as well as appellee's. The petition further alleged that in Clark's action against him appellee "made a reasonably efficient and skillful defense, employed counsel," etc., and that "judgment was duly rendered in favor of Clark for $500 and $59 costs, which was paid by Berry." The averments quoted were not denied by appellant's answer. As between Clark and appellee, it was clearly the latter's duty to furnish the former a tobacco barn, and equally clear that appellee could not escape liability for the failure to furnish the barn upon the ground that it was appellant's fault. As between appellee and appellant, the issue was as to whose fault it was, and as to the construction of the contract. Appellee's action against appellant rests upon the rule of contract law that where the defendant in an action for breach of contract is shown to have entered into the contract with knowledge of a special use or subcontract by plaintiff, upon the breach of the original contract the latter will not be confined to nominal damages, but may recover such damages resulting to him from the breach as may be held to have been reasonably contemplated by the parties in making the contract. In other words, as said in 13 Cyc. 34, 35 (quoting from the leading case of Hadley v. Braxendale, 9 Exch. 541): "Where special circumstances have been communicated to a party at the time of the making of the contract, which go to show that the breach will involve special damages, such damages may be recovered, although not the result of an ordinary breach. When a contract is made under special circumstances, and those circumstances are communicated to one of the contracting parties by the other, the damages resulting from the breach of the contract which they would reasonably contemplate are the amount of the injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach under those special circumstances." Again, on page 35 of the same volume, it is said: "When a party makes a contract, and at the time notifies the defendant, that such contract is made with reference to a subcontract already entered into or contemplated, upon a breach he will not be confined to nominal damages, but may recover such damages as necessarily result from the breach."

In the instant case appellant, at the time of the making of the rent contract with appellee, was not only informed of his contemplated subcontract with Clark, and of his need of the barn she agreed to build, but she consented to the contract with Clark. The above doctrine has been approved by this court in numerous cases. Elizabethtown, etc., R. R. Co. v. Pottinger, 10 Bush, 185; Bluegrass Cordage Co. v. Luthy, 98 Ky. 588, 33 S. W. 835; Illinois C. R. R. Co. v. Nelson, 97 S. W. 757, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 114. Perhaps the latest reaffirmance by the court of the rule in question is stated in American Bridge Company v. Glenmore Distilleries Co., 107 S. W. 279, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 873, where, after citing many authorities from the earliest down, it is said: "And this rule, so far as we know, has never been successfully questioned since." As appellant was not a party to the action of Clark v. Berry, it cannot technically be said she was concluded by the judgment therein rendered, either as to the issues involved or the amount recovered, yet that judgment determined the liability of appellee to Clark, and gave him a right of action against appellant; and the proof in this case conclusively shows that the damages he sustained by her breach of the contract between them was certainly as great in amount as the judgment Clark recovered against him. Therefore, if entitled to recover at all, he should have received judgment for the amount the lower court allowed him by way of damages.

We do not think the allowance to appellee of $25, on account of his maintenance of ap-pellant's son, was improper. In making him a member of her family appellant violated her contract with appellee. This allowance, properly speaking, was not for the board of her son, which, it is claimed, could not be recovered in the absence of a contract to pay board. In entering into the contract with appellant, appellee assumed the burden of bearing one-half of the expense of supporting the family, to be composed of himself and wife, appellant, her husband and daughter, and the family expenses were increased by the son's becoming a member of the family by the act of appellant, and without appellee's consent, which placed upon him an additional burden, for which appellant should compensate him; and, according to the evidence, the amount allowed him is little enough for the time appellant's son remained with the family.

We must, in an action at law, where the trial is had before the court and without the intervention of a jury, give to the judgment the same weight we would accord to the verdict of a properly instructed jury. Hence the judgment should stand, unless based on substantial error, or unsupported by evidence. We have found no prejudicial error, and there was much evidence to support the trial court's findings. Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 302*)—LIABILITY FOR ACTS OF SERVANT—INJURY TO THIRD PERSON—SCOPE OF SERVANT'S AUTHORITY.

The mere employment of a watchman to guard property did not authorize him to shoot a trespasser who was running away from the premises.

2. PLEADING (§ 254*)—CONSTRUCTION—SUBSTITUTED PLEADING.

Where an amended and substituted petition is filed in lieu of the original petition and its amendment, a purpose is indicated to rely upon the amended and substituted petition as alone stating the cause of action, and whether it is demurrable depends upon its allegations alone; the rule that a pleading and its several amendments are ordinarily to be considered together in determining whether a cause of action is stated not being applicable.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 302*)—SCOPE OF SERVANT'S EMPLOYMENT—CONSENT OF MASTER TO SERVANT'S ACTS—"COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT"—"SCOPE OF AUTHORITY."

The terms "course of employment" and "scope of authority," as applied to a servant's acts, are not susceptible of accurate definition, since what acts are within the scope of the servant's employment so as to render the master liable therefor must be gathered from the surrounding circumstances, the master's liability depending upon his consent, express or implied, to the servant's acts.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 302*)—INJURY TO THIRD PERSON — LIABILITY OF MASTER — SCOPE OF SERVANT'S AUTHORITY.

Where authority is conferred to act for another, without special limitation it carries with it by implication, authority to do all things necessary to its execution, and hence where a servant's employment involves the exercise of discretion, or the use of force towards a third person, the exercise of discretion or use of force becomes, as to third persons, the discretion and act of the master, though the servant abused his authority and disregarded the master's private instructions, if he was acting within the general scope of his employment.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 302*)—INJURY TO THIRD PERSON — LIABILITY OF MASTER — SCOPE OF SERVANT'S AUTHORITY.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Oscar Robards, by his next friend, W. P. Robards, against the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company and another. Demurrers to the petition original and amended and to an amended and substituted petition were sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the amended and substituted petition.

Popham & Webster, for appellant. Chas. F. Taylor and Kohn, Baird, Sloss & Kohn, for appellees.

CLAY, C. Oscar Robards, suing by his next friend, W. P. Robards, instituted this action against George Vanetta and the P.

Bannon Sewer Pipe Company to recover damages for personal injuries inflicted by George Vanetta while acting as watchman for the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company. The trial court sustained the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company's demurrer to plaintiff's petition and amended petition, and also to his substituted and amended petition; and the propriety of this ruling is before us for determination.

That portion of the petition necessary to be considered is as follows: "He states that the defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company is a corporation, created and existing by virtue of law, and as such has power to sue and be sued in its corporate name, to operate a general brickyard and brick manufacturing establishment in the city of Louisville, and to employ night watchmen and other persons to protect its property and conduct its said business. He states that the defendant George Vanetta was at all of the times hereinafter set out in the employ of defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company as its night watchman in said brick establishment, and as such it was his duty to said company to protect from injury its said properties during the nighttime. He states that on or about the 8th day of December, 1907, this infant plaintiff was passing at and close to said brick establishment in said city, when he approached said establishment, and was then and there mistaken for a wrongdoer, burglar, or other law-breaker by the defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company by and through its agent and night watchman, defendant George Vanetta, who suspected said infant of attempting to destroy or steal said property. He states that he was at said time and place acting in the peace, was guilty of no wrong or violation of law, and that the defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company by and through its agent and night watchman, Vanetta, and the defendant Vanetta, severally and jointly, and with gross negligence, culpable carelessness, and recklessness, then and there set upon him, this infant, and he was then and there shot by said Vanetta with a firearm containing lead bullets or other hard substance, from the infliction of said gunshot wounds by said Vanetta this infant plaintiff was caused to and did, does and will in the future, suffer great mental and physical pain, has become and is obligated for great doctor's bills and expenses on account thereof, and his power to earn money has been materially lessened and impaired permanently, by reason of all of which he has been damaged in the sum of at least $25,000. He states that the defendant Vanetta was at said time and place acting as the night watchman, agent, and employé of his codefendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company, and as such it was his duty to protect the property of said corporation, and was in the course of his employment as such at the time and place of the disaster and injury to this infant plaintiff hereinbefore set out by the infliction of the gunshot wound hereinbefore described." The demurrer of the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company to the petition being sustained, plaintiff amended his petition as follows: "For amendment to his original petition against defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company, plaintiff says that on the night complained of in his original petition he entered the property of defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company for the purpose of getting warm; that defendant George Vanetta, agent for defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company, then in charge of said property, directed plaintiff to leave said property; that as plaintiff was running away from said property defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company by its said agent in charge thereof negligently shot plaintiff as set out in his original petition." The demurrer of the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company being sustained to the petition as amended, the plaintiff filed an amended and substituted petition containing the following allegations: "That defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company is a corporation, created and existing by virtue of law, and as such has power to sue and be sued in its corporate name, to operate and control a general brickyard and brick manufacturing establishment in the city of Louisville, and to employ night watchmen and other persons to protect its property and conduct its business; that defendant George Vanetta was at all of the times hereinafter set out in the employ of defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company as its night watchman in said brick establishment, and as such he was authorized by said company to carry firearms to protect said property from injury during the nighttime, and was authorized to use such firearms whenever, in his judgment, it seemed necessary or advisable; that on or about December 8, 1907, while defendant Vanetta was acting as night watchman for defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company as hereinbefore set out, upon its said premises, and while said Oscar Robards was on or near said premises, with gross negligence he wrongly adjudged that said Oscar Robards was doing or attempting to do wrong to the property of defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company, and with gross negligence adjudged that it was necessary or advisable to fire at said Oscar Robards to properly protect said property; that thereupon said Vanetta fired lead bullets or other hard substance at said Oscar Robards, wounding and injuring said Oscar Robards, whereby he was and will be caused to suffer great mental and physical pain, has become obligated for doctor's bills and expenses on account of said injuries, and his power to earn money has been materially and permanently lessened and impaired, all to his damage in the sum of $25,000." We are inclined to the opinion that the court ruled properly in sustaining the demurrer of the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company to plaintiff's original and amended petition, upon the ground that the mere employment of a watchman to guard the property did not involve the authority to shoot the plaintiff under the circumstances described. Belt R. Co. v. Banicki, 102 Ill. App. 642.

Counsel for appellee insist that the court's action in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the amended and substituted petition was also proper, for the reason that the pleadings are to be construed all together and most strongly against the pleader; that under this rule the plaintiff is bound by the allegation that he was actually running away from the property when he was shot by Vanetta. That being the case, it is insisted that under the rule laid down in the case of Golden v. Newbrand, 52 Iowa, 59, 2 N. W. 537, 35 Am. Rep. 257, the act of Vanetta was not within the scope of his employment. While it may be the rule that a pleading and the several amendments thereto are ordinarily to be considered all together for the purpose of determining whether or not a cause of action is stated, we are of opinion that, where a party files an amended and substituted petition in lieu of the original petition and its amendment, he thereby indicates a purpose to rely upon the amended and substituted petition as alone setting forth his cause of action. The question whether or not the latter pleading is demurrable depends altogether upon the allegations which it alone contains.

The question, then, is whether or not the allegation that the plaintiff was "on or near said premises," being considered from the standpoint of the weaker term (that is, that he was merely near said premises), is conclusive evidence of the fact that Vanetta at the time of the shooting was not acting within the scope of his employment.

The question of the liability of the master for the acts of his servant depends altogether upon the fact of whether or not the servant was acting within the scope of his employment. The terms "course of employment" and "scope of the authority" are not susceptible of accurate definition. What acts are within the scope of the employment can be determined by no fixed rule; the authority from the master generally being gatherable from the surrounding circumstances. The master is liable only for the authorized acts of the servant, and the root of his liability for the servant's acts is his consent, express or implied, thereto. When the master is to be considered as having authorized the wrongful act of the servant, so as to make him liable for his misconduct, is the point of difficulty. Where authority is conferred to act for another without special limitation, it carries with it, by implication, authority to do all things necessary to its execution; and, when it involves the exercise of the discretion of the servant, or the use of force towards or against another, the use of such discretion or force is a part of the thing authorized, and when exercised becomes, as to third persons, the discretion and act of the master, and this although the servant departed from the private instructions of the master, provided he was engaged at the time in doing his master's business, and was acting within the general scope of his employment. It is not the test of the master's liability for the wrongful act of the servant from which injury to a third person has resulted that he expressly authorized the particular act and conduct which occasioned it. In most cases where the master has been held liable for the negligent or tortious act of the servant the servant acted, not only without express authority to do the wrong, but in violation of his duty to the master. It is in general sufficient to make the master responsible that he gave to the servant an authority, or made it his duty to act in respect to the business in which he was engaged when the wrong was committed, and that the act complained of was done in the course of his employment. The master in that case will be deemed to have consented to and authorized the act of the servant, and he will not be excused from liability, although the servant abused his authority, or was reckless in the performance of his duty, or inflicted an unnecessary injury in executing his master's orders. The master who puts the servant in a place of trust or responsibility, or commits to him the management of his business or the care of his property, is justly held responsible when the servant, through lack of judgment or discretion, or from infirmity of temper, or under the influence of passion aroused by the circumstances and the occasion, goes beyond the strict line of his duty or authority, and inflicts an unjustifiable injury upon another. Rounds v. Del., Lack. & West. R. R. Co., 64 N. Y. 129, 21 Am. Rep. 597. Furthermore, the law under such circumstances will not undertake to make any nice distinctions fixing with precision the line that separates the act of the servant from the act of the individual. When there is doubt, it will be resolved against the master, upon the ground that he set in motion the servant who committed the wrong. South Cov. & Cincinnati

Let us, then, apply these principles to the facts as set out in plaintiff's amended and substituted petition. That pleading alleges that George Vanetta, the watchman who shot plaintiff, was the night watchman of the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company, and, as such, he was authorized by said company to carry firearms to protect said property from injury during the nighttime, and was authorized to use said firearms whenever in his judgment it seemed necessary or advisable; that on the occasion in question, and while Vanetta was acting as such night watchman for the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company, and while the plaintiff was "on or near said premises," he, with gross negligence, wrongly adjudged that the plaintiff was doing, or attempting to do, wrong to the property of the defendant P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company, and with gross negligence adjudged it was necessary to fire at said Oscar Robards, in order to protect said property; and that he did actually fire at and wound the plaintiff. Where the master employs a watchman and authorizes him to use firearms in his discretion, we cannot hold as a matter of law that the act of the watchman in shooting a third party who, at the time, was only near the premises, is conclusive evidence of the fact that the watchman was not acting within the scope of his employment. The master cannot escape liability for the acts of his servant when he has given the servant authority to act and the discretion when to act, and the servant negligently acts at a time when such action was not necessary. The statements of this pleading may be overcome when all the surrounding facts and circumstances are made known; but taken by themselves, as we must do for the purposes of the question before us, they show that the act of Vanetta was within the scope of his employment.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer of the P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Company to the amended and substituted petition.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. KEIFFER.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 24, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 227*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—LIABILITY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

The rule that the reciprocal rights and duties of the parties and the defenses that may be invoked to escape liability for breach of duty are governed by the laws of the place where the tort occurred applies to the relation of master and servant, and the question what is, and the effect of, contributory negligence or assumption of risk, is determined by the law of the place where the tort occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 669; Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 160*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—LIABILITY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

The common-law rule exempting a master from liability for injuries to his servant occasioned by a fellow servant's negligence, prevailing at the place where the injury occurred and the cause of action arose, governs, though the rule has been changed by statute at the forum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 326; Dec. Dig. § 160.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 86*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—LIABILITY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

An action brought in Kentucky by a citizen thereof for an injury received in a sister state while engaged in the performance of his duties as a servant for defendant, a citizen of Kentucky, is governed by the laws of the sister state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 137; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE.

The breaking of a knuckle on a double-header train is not actionable simply because the train is run as a double-header, and the reason why it is so run is immaterial, in an action by an employé for injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 62*)—"PROXIMATE CAUSE."

The "proximate cause" of an accident is the immediate cause, or that without which it would not have happened. It is not the remote cause or the occasion of the accident, and, where the original wrong only becomes injurious because of the intervention of some distinct wrongful act of another, the injury is imputed to the last wrong as the proximate cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-81; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 129*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

A railroad engineer was injured by running into a train from the rear. The train in front was run as a double-header because of the leaky condition of one of the engines, and as it pulled out of a station a knuckle broke. While an emergency knuckle was being put on, the engineer ran into the train. Had proper signals been given him, he would have stopped his train before the collision, provided he did not run at an excessive speed. Held, as a matter of law, that the leaky engine was not the proximate cause of the injury.

7. NEGLIGENCE (§ 140*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE—QUESTION FOR JURY—QUESTION FOR COURT.

Where there is room for a difference of opinion between reasonable men as to what is the proximate cause of an injury, the question is for the jury; but, where there is no room for a difference of opinion, the question, where the facts are undisputed, is for the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 373-381; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 279*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—INCOMPETENCY OF FELLOW SERVANTS—EVIDENCE.

A railroad engineer ran into a standing train from the rear. The flagman of the leading train was negligent in not starting back in time to flag the engineer, and the conductor was also negligent in not sending the flagman back in time. Witnesses testified that the flagman was, in their opinion, not competent; but they did not show in what respects he was incompetent, or that knowledge of the incompetency had been brought home to the company. The flagman had stood his examination and had been in the service of the company for 15 months. Held, as a matter of law, not to show the incompetency of the flagman.

Nunn, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by L. J. Keiffer against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Benjamin D. Warfield and Sims, Du Bose & Rodes, for appellant, Proctor & Herdman, Wright & McElroy, and Greene & Van Winkle, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. L. J. Keiffer was the engineer on train 111, which left Bowling Green for the South on August 19, 1904. The second and third sections of train 115 had left Bowling Green that afternoon several hours before Keiffer's train. One of the sections had a leaky engine, and by reason thereof this section lost time. At Erin, Tenn., an order was given these two sections to consolidate and run as a double-header from that point to Paris, Tenn. Keiffer there received an order to follow train 115 to Paris; the order informing him of the consolidation of the two sections, but not informing him why it had been done. Train 115 left Erin shortly before 12 o'clock at night, and Keiffer had to wait there until the hill engine returned to pull his train over the hill, as well as for a passenger train which had the right of way. Train 115 ran from Erin to Big Sandy, a distance of 23 miles, without further trouble from the leaky engine after it passed over the hill near Erin. It stopped at Big Sandy to take water. One of the engines took water. It then backed up for the other engine to take water and started out, but as it pulled out a knuckle broke about the twelfth car back from the engine. There were 29 cars in the train. They undertook to mend the knuckle, but could not do it. They then undertook to put in an emergency knuckle, and, while they were doing this, Keiffer's train ran into them from the rear, about 3:30 a. m. He had left Erin about 2:30 a. m., and, according to the time of train 115, it should have been at Paris, and would have been there, perhaps, but for the breaking of the knuckle, which had delayed them at Big Sandy 10 or 15 minutes.

The proof as to the cause of the collision is conflicting. The evidence for Keiffer is, in effect, that the men on train 115 gave him no warning of its presence on the track until he was within a few feet of it, and it was then too late for him to avoid the collision. The evidence for the railroad company is to the effect that Keiffer was running 25 or 30 miles an hour, when, under the rules, he should have been running only 12 miles an hour, and that timely warning of the presence of train 115 on the track was given him, if he had been running at the proper speed. The rules required that train 115 should send a flagman back something over a quarter of a mile, and that he should give warning by placing torpedoes on the track, as well as by a light. This, it is conceded, was not done. The proof for the railroad is that the flagman went back about 200 yards, while Keiffer says he was less than 100 feet from the back of the train. By the collision, Keiffer's engine ran through both cabooses, a car load of flour which was standing in front of them, and knocked the end out of the car beyond the one containing the flour. The engine turned over and caught Keiffer under it. He was badly mashed and bruised, and brought this action to recover for his injuries. On a trial of the case in the circuit court, he recovered a verdict and judgment for $25,000, and the railroad company appeals.

The action having occurred in the state of Tennessee, the defendant pleaded the law of that state in bar of a recovery. By the law of Tennessee the contributory negligence of the injured employé of a railroad company bars his right of recovery, where it is either the proximate cause of the accident or directly and materially contributes thereto. On the other hand, if the negligence of the injured servant was neither the proximate cause of the accident, nor directly or materially contributed thereto, but only indirectly and remotely contributed to bring about the accident, such negligence would not bar a recovery, but would only mitigate the damages. By the law of Tennessee, also, the men on one train in the service of the railroad are fellow servants of the men on another train, and no recovery can be had by one for an injury due to the negligence of the other. This was so declared by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Dillard, 114 Tenn. 240, 86 S. W. 313, 69 L. R. A. 746, 108 Am. St. Rep. 894, and, although that case was decided after this injury occurred, it merely declared the law; the court simply holding that the law as thus declared had always been the law of Tennessee, there being no statute governing the question. As to what is the law in Tennessee there is no conflict in the evidence; the witnesses introduced both by the plaintiff and the defendant agreeing as to what the law is in that state.

But it is insisted that, as the railroad company is a citizen of Kentucky, and as Keiffer is also a citizen of Kentucky, the courts of this state should administer its own laws as between its own citizens. It is not material where the parties reside. When the injury was done in Tennessee, a cause of action arose there. The rights of the parties as they then were cannot be affected by the fact that the suit was not brought there, but in this state, for the courts of this state, simply enforce the cause of action which plaintiff has. In 2 Wharton on the Conflict of Laws, § 478b, the rule is thus stated: "The reciprocal rights and duties of the parties and the defenses that may be invoked to escape liability for a breach of duty are governed by the law of the place where the tort occurred, rather than by the law of the forum. This principle has been applied, inter alia, to the reciprocal rights and duties of master and servant and of carrier and passenger. So the question as to what constitutes, and the effect of, contributory negligence, or assumption of risk, to defeat or limit the right of action for the negligent killing or injury of a person, is to be determined by the law of the place where the tort occurred, and not by the law of the forum. And the common-law rule exempting the master from liability for injuries to his servant by a fellow servant's negligence, prevailing at the place where the injury occurred and the cause of action arose, will govern, although the rule has been changed by statute at the forum." See, also, Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) p. 552; I. C. R. R. Co. v. Jordan, 117 Ky. 512, 78 S. W. 426; L. & N. R. Co. v. Melton, 105 S. W. 366, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 51, and the cases cited. This court has in a number of cases enforced liability on the part of the master under the laws of a foreign state, although by the laws of this state no right of action existed, upon the ground that, if the act was actionable where it occurred, it was actionable everywhere. Manifestly the converse of the doctrine must be true, and, if the act was not actionable under the common law of the state where it occurred, it is not actionable anywhere. The rule must be the same both for the plaintiff and the defendant, and it is immaterial whether the parties live in this state or elsewhere. The residence of the party in no wise affects the cause of action.

Keiffer, as ground for recovery, insists that the leaky engine was the proximate cause of his injury, and that, the master having furnished an engine which was not reasonably safe, he may recover. He also insists that Veazie, the flagman of train 115, was incompetent, and that he may recover for the incompetency of Veazie, although he may not recover for his negligence. The circuit court did not submit the latter question to the jury, but he submitted the case to them on the question whether the leaky engine was the proximate cause of Keiffer's injury. The defendant insists that he should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for it, and this is the only question we find it necessary to consider.

It is manifest from the proof that the leaky engine gave no trouble after the train passed over the hill near Erin, an hour or more before the injury. It is also manifest from the proof that train 115 would not have been at Big Sandy when Keiffer got there but for the breaking of the knuckle. It is further manifest from the proof that, after all this had occurred, if train 115 had given the signals as required by the rules, Keiffer's train would have been stopped before any injury was done. If the defendant's proof is true, ample notice of the presence of train 115 on the track was given to Keiffer, and the accident was due either to his not heeding the signals, or not seeing them in time, or his running into the station at a speed forbidden by the rules, while the proof for him shows that he was complying with the rules, and that the signals were not given in time. However this may be, the proximate cause of the injury was not the leaky engine, nor even the breaking of the knuckle, but it was either the failure of the men on train 115 to give proper signals, or the failure of Keiffer to obey the signals. The accident could not possibly have occurred if Keiffer had been running at the speed required by the rules and the signals had been given as required by them, for manifestly Keiffer could have stopped his train in this event long before he reached the other train. It is said that the leaky engine was the proximate cause of the knuckle breaking, as but for the leaky engine the train would not have been doubled into one section, and, perhaps, the knuckle would not have broken but for the weight of all the cars. No negligence on the part of the defendant is shown in regard to the breaking of the knuckle. Double-headers are run on all railroads, the breaking of a knuckle on a double-header train is not actionable, simply because the train is run as a double-header, and the reason why it is so run is immaterial. The defendant having the right to run a double-header train, its reasons for exercising its right can furnish no cause of action. But aside from this, as we have said, the proximate cause of this accident was either the failure to give Keiffer the proper signals, or his failure to observe them and run at a proper speed. The proximate cause of an accident is the immediate cause, or that without which it would not have happened. It is not the remote cause of the accident, or the occasion of it. In Coolley on Torts, § 70, the rule is thus stated: "If the original wrong only becomes injurious in consequence of the intervention of some distinct wrongful act or omission of another, the injury shall be imputed to the last wrong as the proximate cause, and not to that which was more remote." See, also, Thompson on Negligence, § 47; Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, § 31; Setter's Adm'r v. City of Maysville, 114 Ky. 60, 69 S. W. 1074. It is also true that, where there is room for a difference of opinion between reasonable men as to what is the proximate cause of an injury, the question is for the jury; but where there is no room for difference of opinion, under the rules of law, the question, where the facts are undisputed, is one of law for the court. As a matter of law, it must be held here that the leaky engine was not the proximate cause of Keiffer's injury, for manifestly, if train 115 had stopped as it did because of a flood in front of it, and train 111 had run into it because by negligence either proper signals were not given it, or those given were not heeded, the flood in front would not have been the proximate cause of the collision.

It remains to consider whether the case should have been submitted to the jury on the incompetency of Veazie, the flagman. The plaintiff introduced several witnesses, who testified that they had run with Veazie and had seen him at work, and that in their opinion he was not competent; but none of them showed in what respects he was incompetent, or that knowledge of his incompetency had been in any way brought home to the master, or that any complaint had been made of him which would put the master on notice of his incompetency. It was shown that he had stood the examinations and had been in the service of the railroad as a brakeman for some 15 months. The thing that he was required to do was to go back behind his train a certain distance and there flag train 111. What actually happened, according to all the proof, was that he did not start back until they heard train 111 coming, and, before he had gotten half as far back as he should have been, according to his own evidence, train 111 passed him. Any man can walk down a railroad track. Any man can carry a lantern, or put a torpedo on the track, or light a fuse. The trouble with Veazie was that he did not start back in time. His failure to start back in time was due to his negligence in discharging his duty. The conductor was also negligent, for he was with the flagman and should have sent him back. To submit the case to the jury on these facts, on the question of Veazie's incompetency, would be to shut our eyes to the truth, and to call negligence incompetency. That the train crew of 115 were negligent is conceded in the evidence. There was negligence on the part of the conductor in not sending his flagman out, and there was negligence on the part of the flagman in not going out. There was no proof in the record that Veazie was not thoroughly competent to do everything he was required to do under the rules at the time. He knew what he ought to do as well as any one, but he simply neglected his duty.

On the whole case, we conclude that the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant. This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to consider the other questions discussed by counsel.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Suit by John L. Jones and others against A. Gatliff and another. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

L. L. Peace and R. L. Pope, for appellants.
E. L. Stephens, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. On May 12, 1902, Dr. A. Gatliff, who owned a large body of land in Whitley county, under what is known as the "Clapp patent," dated in 1872, conveyed by special warranty deed to F. M. Jones, in consideration of $1, and the further consideration that Jones relinquished all his right to what was known as the "John Bryant survey," the following tract of land, as described in the deed: "A certain parcel of land on Poplar creek, Whitley county, Ky., beginning on white oak near the William Jones original line on the south side of the mountain on Poplar creek; thence with said Jones line to a white oak a corner of the John Bryant survey thence leaving said William Jones line running up said ridge with Bryants line to the top of said ridge to a maple and chestnut thence leaving said line and running to a N. E. direction to the top of a mountain to a stake; thence with the top of said mountain to Maine and Jones line thence with same to the beginning so as not to convey any part of the G. W. Jones survey. This deed also contains a one-half interest in and to a survey of land lying on the north side of the Pine Mountain known as the William Jones survey adjoining the land of F. M. Jones, G. W. Jones, A. Gatliff, and others containing about 35 acres more or less." On September 1, 1903, Dr. Gatliff conveyed by a like deed to George Jones a tract adjoining his home farm, containing 95 acres; also a tract containing 100 acres near the top of Pine Mountain. On July 15, 1905, Frank Jones having died, his widow and children executed to Dr. Gatliff a title bond, by which they sold to him for $10 an acre the tract of land deeded to Frank Jones, he paying at the time $100 cash, and agreeing to pay the balance when the quantity of the land was ascertained by a survey. On June 28, 1906, they brought this suit against Dr. Gatliff for the specific performance of the contract of purchase, making also John F. Jones a defendant to the action, and alleging that John F. Jones was asserting some kind of claim to the land without right. George Jones, the father of John F. Jones, filed his petition in the action, which was taken as his answer, in which he alleged that he owned about 50 acres of the land referred to. John F. Jones filed an answer, in which he pleaded that he, and those under whom he claimed, had been in the adverse possession of the land for more than 15 years. Dr. Gatliff filed an answer, in which he charged that Frank Jones had obtained the deed from him for the land by fraud, and he prayed that the deed be canceled. Replies were filed to these pleadings and the issues made up. Proof was taken, and on final hearing the circuit court canceled the deed which Dr. Gatliff had made to Frank Jones, and dismissed the plaintiffs' petition. From this judgment they appeal.

The essential facts of the case are about these: Frank and George Jones were brothers. They each claimed some land within the Clapp patent; and, after Dr. Gatliff became the owner of that patent, he undertook to make a settlement with both of them to avoid any litigation, and in this settlement the two deeds above referred to were made, the first being made to Frank Jones, and the second to George Jones something over a year afterwards. Dr. Gatliff was not personally acquainted with the boundary of the land which each of these men claimed, and he did not go upon it. When this controversy arose he found out that a part of the land which he had deeded to Frank Jones was also embraced in the deed to George Jones. In the meantime he had bought the George Jones land under a contract similar to that which he had made with the heirs of Frank Jones. So really the question here is between the two Joneses. If Dr. Gatliff pays Frank Jones' people for the land, he will not have to pay George Jones for it. The main question, therefore, is, Shall George Jones or the heirs of Frank Jones get the money for this land? As Dr. Gatliff made to each of them a special warranty deed, he is not responsible to either of them if his title fails; and, if he had no title, at the time he made the deed to George Jones, to any part of the land because he had previously conveyed it to Frank Jones, George Jones will simply lose this much of the land by a paramount title, against which Dr. Gatliff did not warrant. The two Joneses lived near by each other. There was no dispute between them as long as Frank lived, and none after his death until the land was sold, and the question who was to get the purchase money, came up. Dr. Gatliff seems to have acted in entire good faith throughout the transaction. His side of the case is this: Frank Jones claimed the Bartley survey, and he made the deed to Frank Jones in settlement of this claim. George Jones claimed the Peace entry, and when this controversy arose, it developed that the Peace entry and the Bartley survey covered the same land; Peace having moved in after Bartley went out. But we do not find any evidence to warrant the cancellation of the deed which Dr. Gatliff made Frank Jones. Dr. Gatliff cannot testify as to anything that took place between him and Frank Jones, and all of his testimony must be excluded. The other testimony shows that Frank Jones was claiming the Bartley survey, and that it was agreed between Dr. Gatliff and Jones that two men, agreed upon by them, should go upon the land and lay off to Jones what land he was entitled to. These two men did go out upon the land, and after they had laid off to Jones the boundary, which he finally agreed to take, the deed was drawn and signed by Dr. Gatliff. There was some consideration for this deed, and upon the whole record we are satisfied that Dr. Gatliff made the deed because he then believed it was cheaper to settle in that way than to litigate with Jones. The two men, who went out upon the land, do not show that any misrepresentation was made, and, after their settlement was carried into a deed, it is too late to assail the deed. Frank and George Jones claimed under the same entry, but under different men. It is not material now which of them had the better title, or whether either had any title. If their title had been known to be perfect, no settlement would have been made. It was the doubt as to the title that induced the settlement. The evidence is clear that the two men who made it made no effort to learn if Frank Jones' title was valid. Their sole effort was to lay off to him a boundary he would accept, and release all further claim to the land. Their aim was to settle his claims, and this they did. This settlement cannot now be disturbed on the ground that this claim was not as good as it was supposed to be. While the testimony of the two men who laid off the land to Frank Jones varies one from the other in some details, we think it is clear from both that they made the settlement with Frank Jones, and that Dr. Gatliff simply made the deed according to the writing they drew up. John Jones was then living on the land he claims, and this one of them knew, and also knew of the claim of George Jones. Frank Jones is now dead, and the transaction, not having been assailed in his lifetime, cannot now be disturbed on the proof offered.

At the time this deed was made, John F. Jones, holding under his father, George Jones, had actual possession of about 19 acres of the land embraced in it. He was living in the old Bartley or Peace house, and had been living there about 7 years, but previous to his entry the place had been vacant for something over 15 years. The fences had rotted, the chimney to the house had fallen in, and the doors were off when he entered. No title was shown by adverse possession to the land, but to the extent of the 19 acres which he actually held the deed from Dr. Gatliff to Frank Jones was void under the champerty statute; but in other respects that deed is valid, and as to the remainder of the land covered by it, the title of Frank Jones is superior to the title of George Jones. On the return of the case to the circuit court the court will ascertain the quantity of land embraced in the deed from Dr. Gatliff to Frank Jones after excluding that part of the tract which John F. Jones had inclosed and was occupying. He had settled there as a mere intruder. His possession was limited to his close, and to this extent only was Frank Jones' deed champertous. John F. Jones was living there when the title bond here sued on was executed, as was then well known to the parties, and justice will be done by enforcing the contract as to the remainder of the tract.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a judgment as above indicated.

CENTRAL KENTUCKY TRACTION CO. v.
CHAPMAN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 12, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 303*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER ALIGHTING FROM STREET CAR—DUTY OF EMPLOYEES.

If the place where a street car stopped, the crossing of a steam railroad, was a regular stopping place for passengers, or where passengers, with the knowledge of the carrier, were in the habit of entering or leaving its cars, it was the duty of the employés in charge, before starting, to ascertain whether passengers desiring to leave the car had done so; but, if it was not such a place, and the stop was merely to look out for any steam train, then those in charge of the street car had no reason to suppose that a passenger would attempt to leave at that point, and unless they knew a passenger was so attempting to do, they were not negligent in starting without seeing whether she had alighted, and this, though she had, when getting on, notified the conductor that she wished to get off at the street next before the railroad crossing, and the car had not stopped there.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1228½; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 321*) — STARTING UP STREET CAR—LOOKING FOR PASSENGERS ALIGHTING —INSTRUCTIONS.

The addition to a proper instruction as to the duty of persons in charge of a street car relative to seeing, before starting up the car, whether a passenger was alighting, where the stop was merely to see whether a steam train was coming, and not at a place for passengers to get on or off; that if those in charge could with ordinary care have known of the passenger's purpose to alight, they were bound to look out for her safety, as well as if they knew of her purpose—is error, in placing substantially the same duty on the carrier at such a place as at one where passengers had the right to alight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1332; Dec. Dig. § 321.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 159*)—PERSONAL INJURY—LOSS OF TIME—PLEADING.

Loss of time from personal injury is a special damage, which must be specially pleaded, that it may be recovered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 443; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

4. DAMAGES (§ 159*)—PERSONAL INJURY—PER-MANENT IMPAIRMENT OF EARNING CAPACITY
—PLEADING.

While permanent impairment of earning capacity from personal injury is an element of general damages, it ought to be pleaded, if recovery for it is sought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 443; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

5. DAMAGES (§ 143*) — SPECIAL DAMAGES —
PLEADING.

The allegation of the petition that plaintiff was confined to her room for some time by reason of her injury, if not clearly referable to the nature and extent of the injury, rather than as asserting a claim to special damages from the injury, at least contains an ambiguity, which should be resolved against the pleader.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Woodford County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Georgia A. Chapman against the Central Kentucky Traction Company. Judgement for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Stoll & Bush, Wallace & Harris, Morton, Webb & Wilson, and W. O. Davis, for appellant. Field McLeod, H. A. Shoberth, and R. B. Franklin, for appellee.

O'REAR, C. J. Mrs. Chapman was a passenger on one of appellant's electric inter-urban cars from Versailles to Lexington, this state. The cars made stops at certain stations along the line to receive and discharge passengers, and it is said also stops at street corners along the route in the city of Lexington for that purpose, its terminus then being at "Center" on Main street. Appellant's conductor in charge of the car on which appellee was a passenger was notified when she got on that she wished to leave the car at High street in Lexington. The car failed to stop at High street crossing, but proceeded to the next street, which is Water street. The lines of the steam railroad, the Louisville & Nashville and Chesapeake & Ohio, run along the latter street, and at right angles with Broadway, along which appellant's cars run. The car on this occasion stopped at the edge of Water street, it is claimed by appellant, to enable the conductor to go ahead onto the L. & N. tracks to see whether there was a free and safe passage across for his car. When the car made this stop, appellee attempted to alight from it. The car was then started upon the signal of the conductor that the track was clear, when appellee was thrown heavily to the ground, and sustained an injury to her knee. She recovered a substantial verdict for damages in this action.

It is contended by appellant that the stop at Water street was solely a safety stop, and not for the purpose of allowing passengers to get off or on the car; that it was not a regular passenger stop, and that its servants in charge of the car did not know of appellee's intention to leave the car at that point; that, therefore, they were not charged with the duty to look out for her safety in alighting until they knew in any event that she intended then to do so. On the other hand, it is argued that appellant was notified of appellee's desire to get off at High street; and, having carried her beyond her destination, it must have known that she would probably want to leave the car at the next stop. However, this is not an action for damages for carrying the passenger beyond her destination. It is solely for her personal injury negligently inflicted by appellant. Having been wrongfully carried beyond her destination, she was rightfully on the car, and therefore entitled to all the care and protection due a passenger. If Water street was a regular passenger stop, or if passengers were in the habit of entering or leaving appellant's cars at that point with its knowledge, then

It must be held to have anticipated that appellee, or any other passenger, might elect to leave the car there on this occasion, and in that event must have used the utmost of care for their safety in alighting from the car. If, however, Water street was not a regular or accustomed passenger stop, appellant was not bound to anticipate that appellee would attempt to leave the car there, although she had been carried beyond her destination. As to whether Water street was a regular or accustomed passenger stop was disputed in the evidence. The primary questions for the jury then were, first, was Water street a regular stopping place for passengers, or where passengers, with knowledge of the company, were in the habit of entering or leaving the cars? If it was, then appellant's servants in charge of the car were charged with the duty of looking out for the safety of passengers attempting to alight there when the car stopped, and before starting should have ascertained whether passengers desiring to leave the car had done so. This phase of the question was fairly submitted to the jury in the first instruction given. The second question was, if Water street was not a regular or accustomed passenger stop, but was for purely precautionary purposes, then those in charge of the car had no reason to suppose that passengers would attempt to leave it at that point; and, unless they actually knew then that appellee was so attempting to do, they were not negligent in starting the car without ascertaining whether she had alighted.

In the second instruction, which was doubtless framed to present the second phase of the case, the idea just expressed was submitted, but with the addition that if those in charge of the car could, with ordinary care, have known of appellee's purpose, they were bound to a duty to look out for her safety as well as if they in fact knew of it. This we think was an erroneous conception of the carrier's duty. It placed it on substantially the same footing as to looking out for its passengers at places where they had not the right to leave its cars, and therefore were not expected to attempt to do so, as where they had such right. If a passenger is wrongfully carried beyond his destination, it does not impose a duty on the carrier to provide a safe place for him to alight the first time the car stops, but must carry him safely back to his station, or safely to its next regular stopping place, unless by agreement with the passenger a special stop for his convenience is made in lieu of either of the others.

The petition charged a certain injury, describing it as painful and disabling, so that appellee was confined to her room for several weeks. In the instruction defining the measure of damages, it was allowed that appellee might be compensated, in addition to her suffering endured and reasonably anticipated, and her impairment to earn money, for her loss of time. Loss of time is classed by the courts and writers as special damages. Like physician's bills, medicine, and other special elements of even proximate results of actionable negligence, they must be specially pleaded in order that they may be recovered for. Permanent impairment of earning capacity is an element of such general damages. But even that ought to be pleaded if a recovery on its account is sought. Much more so is it deemed that items of special damage should be set out, so as to bring notice home to the defendant that compensation is sought on that score, that the defendant may bring its witnesses to rebut the claim if it is so desired. The allegation of the petition that plaintiff was confined to her room for some time by reason of her injury we understand to be referable to the nature and extent of the injury, rather than as asserting a claim to peculiar or special damages resulting from such injury. At any rate its ambiguity should be resolved against the pleader, rather than in her favor, is the safe and established rule of construction. Nor was there evidence of the value of the time lost. The verdict is so considerable that we cannot say the jury may not have included that item in their finding in this case, which, under the state of pleadings and proof, was prejudicial error.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial, under proceedings consistent herewith.

Action by Rebecca Riley against the Citizens' Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Helm Bruce, for appellant. Wootton & Morgan, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. In May, 1906, for the recited consideration of $132.50, and the payment of a like sum on the 15th day of May in every year during the continuance of the contract, the appellant company issued a policy on the life of Harvey Riley for the sum of $5,000. The beneficiary in the policy was the appellee, Rebecca Riley. The insured died in May, 1907, after having paid the premium due on May 15, 1907. After his death proofs of loss were made out by the appellee and forwarded to the company, and upon its refusal to pay the insurance, this action was brought to recover the amount of the policy. The company filed an answer and an amended answer, to both of which a general demurrer was sustained, and, declining to plead further, judgment went against it for the amount claimed.

It will be observed that the only question we are called upon to consider is whether or not the answer and amended answer presented a defense, or made an issue upon which the appellant company was entitled to offer evidence and ask a trial on the merits. The answer denied that the first annual premium, the payment of which was acknowledged in the policy, was in fact paid, but admitted that the premium due in May, 1907, was paid. Further answering, it said:

"The first premium required by said contract to be paid to the defendant company was $132.50, and said Riley, in settling for said premium, gave one S. H. Webb, who was then the agent for said company, and had procured said Riley's application, the sum of $66, and his (Riley's) note for $66.50, and thereupon this defendant issued and caused to be delivered the policy to said Riley, on the information received by it from Webb that Riley paid the premium; and the defendant company did not itself receive, and has never received, any part of the first premium required by said policy, and upon information and belief that Riley had settled for the premium with the company's agent, the company did issue and cause to be delivered the policy. Subsequent, however, to the issuance of said policy, and after the maturity of the note given by Riley to Webb for part of the first premium, Riley refused to pay the note, and insisted that he had been induced to take said policy by misrepresentations, and accordingly repudiated the policy, and denied wholly his liability upon the note on account of said alleged fraud and misrepresentations. Thereupon the said agent Webb brought suit against Riley upon the note in the Perry quarterly court, in which suit the said Riley filed an answer, in which he alleged that the note had been procured from him by misrepresentations and fraud, which answer Riley also made a counterclaim against Webb, alleging that the note had been given for a premium on a policy of $5,000 to the Citizens' Life Insurance Company, which is the same policy referred to in the petition in this action, and that the total premium was $132.50, and that at the time of giving the note he had also paid him $66 in cash as a balance of the premium, but that he had been induced to sign the contract by misrepresentations and fraud, and by reason thereof said contract was void, and therefore prayed that the plaintiff's petition on said note be dismissed, and that he (Riley) have judgment on his counterclaim against Webb for $66, with interest. Said Webb, plaintiff in said suit, replied to said answer, denying the charge of misrepresentation or fraud, and upon the trial of said action and said issues therein, the court, after a verdict by a jury and pursuant thereto, entered a judgment for the defendant, Riley, in said action upon said note, and also a judgment for $22.50 in his favor on his counterclaim, and for costs. Defendant is informed and believes and alleges that the reason for the jury finding $22.50 on said counterclaim instead of $66 was that the jury considered that Riley had received the benefits of insurance up to the time of the finding of the verdict, and that this insurance was worth the difference between the amount of the cash payment, $66, and the amount of their verdict in favor of Riley, to wit, $22.50; and thus it is that defendant says that said policy contract was wholly repudiated by said Riley during his lifetime, and that said contract was, in effect, judicially determined to be null and void, and the consideration moving to this defendant under said contract wholly failed long prior to the death of Riley.

"Defendant says that the said Webb, who was its agent when said policy was issued, but had ceased to be its agent before the death of Riley, failed to notify this defendant of said Riley's repudiation of said policy, or of the fact that he was resisting the payment of the premium note, and was seeking to recover back the cash payment on account of said premium, and this defendant remained in entire ignorance of said facts until after the death of Riley. Accordingly, about 32 days before the second premium would have become due on said policy, if it had been in force, the defendant company, in entire ignorance of the fact that Riley had repudiated the policy, or had defeated recovery upon the premium note, or recovered judgment for the cash paid on account of the premium, or any part thereof, and supposing that said policy was in force, sent to the said Riley, as a matter of courtesy, a notice to the effect that his second premium would be due on May 15, 1907. Said Riley received said notice after he had been shot and injured, and was in a serious condition on account thereof, and from which he ultimately died. But, without explaining to the defendant his repudiation of said policy, or any of the facts hereinbefore alleged, he sent to the defendant the amount of the second premium, which amount the said company received while still in complete ignorance as to his repudiation of said policy, or his resistance of the payment upon said premium note, or his recovery of the cash payment made by him. Said second premium was received by defendant on the very day that Riley died, to wit, May 10, 1907. Defendant did not learn of the facts aforesaid as to said Riley's repudiation of said policy, or as to said Riley's action upon said note, until some time after the death of Riley; and, immediately upon hearing of the same, it began an investigation into them, and thereupon ascertained the facts hereinbefore stated. Whereupon it informed the beneficiary herein that it would not pay said policy, but was ready and willing to return the amount of the second premium, which it had received under the circumstances hereinbefore alleged, so soon as an administrator of the estate of Harvey Riley should be appointed, and this it still avers it is ready, willing, and able to do, although no administrator of said estate has yet been appointed. Defendant says that, by reason of the facts hereinbefore alleged, said policy contract, sued on herein ceased to exist before the death of said Riley, and was not in force at his death or now."

In an amended answer it pleaded that the policy contained the following provision, which was a part of the contract between it and Harvey Riley, to wit, "If any note or other obligation given for the first year's premium or any part thereof on this policy shall not be paid when due, this policy shall be and become null and void, without notice or action of the company, notwithstanding any receipt which may have been given for such premium," and further set out that this condition in the policy was never complied with by Riley, but on the contrary, was broken by his repudiation of the contract in the manner stated in the answer.

Inasmuch as there will probably be a trial on the merits, after other pleadings have been filed and proof taken, we do not think it advisable or proper at this time to go into a discussion of the legal effect of the facts set up in the answer, in estoppel and avoidance of the right of appellee to recover on the policy. What we should now say might be misleading, or at least not applicable to the state of facts presented when the case is heard on its merits.

For the purposes of this opinion, we must accept as true the averments of the answer, and, assuming them to be true, we think the pleading presented a defense that entitled the appellant to a trial on the merits. Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

BALLOU v. SKIDMORE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 296*)—DISSOLUTION—AUTHORITY OF PARTNERS.

After the dissolution of a firm, a partner cannot enter the appearance of a copartner not served with summons, in an action against the partners for a personal judgment in severalty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 670; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 519*) — ACTIONS — DIRECT ATTACK.

In an action on a judgment, a defense that the party against whom the judgment was rendered was not in fact before the court is a direct attack on the record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 963; Dec. Dig. § 519.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 906*)—ACTIONS—DIRECT ATTACK.

Where, in an action on a judgment, directly attacked on the ground that defendant was not before the court, it appeared that defendant owed the amount for which the judgment was rendered, and he made no defense to the claim, the court, under Civ. Code Prac. § 90, properly rendered judgment for the amount due.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1726; Dec. Dig. § 906.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 190*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW.

The court will not reverse a case because the attachment therein was not authorized, there having been no motion to discharge the same.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harlan County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Ewell Skidmore against W. R. Ballou. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sampson & Sampson, for appellant. H. C. Clay, for appellee.

O'REAR, O. J. Jerome Skidmore, who was a merchant, sued appellant and his former partner, W. R. Maupin, upon an account in the Harlan circuit court, and obtained a judgment. It appears that an attorney filed a joint answer on behalf of the defendants, but it does not appear that appellant, Ballou, otherwise appeared, or was served with summons. This action was brought upon a return of no property, indorsed upon the execution which is sued upon. Attachments in the nature of garnishee process were served upon appellant's debtor, who answered that it owed appellant something less than the amount of the judgment. In this action appellant answered, denying that he had been served with process in the common-law suit, and denying that he entered his appearance to it, or authorized the attorney or his former partner, Maupin, to enter his appearance or to file an answer in his behalf.

In his testimony appellant claimed that the account sued on had been settled by his executing a note for a smaller amount to Jerome Skidmore, which was subsequently paid; also that he and Maupin sold out their partnership business to another firm before the suit in which the first judgment was rendered, the purchasers assuming the payment of the Skidmore debt, to which he assented, accepting their undertaking and discharging Ballou and Maupin. Skidmore denied that the note alluded to had any connection with the debt for which the judgment was rendered; and denied the novation. We think the evidence supports Skidmore's testimony on both these points. We are also satisfied that appellant was not served with summons in the first suit, and did not enter his appearance, or authorize the filing of the answer in his behalf. While it has been declared by some courts, though denied by others, that in an action by a creditor of a copartnership against the several parties to recover personal judgments in severalty against them, one partner might enter the appearance of the others not served, yet the authorities seem to be agreed that no such power exists in one partner after the dissolution of the firm. Parsons on Partnership, § 118; Bates on Partnership, § 1092. It has also been questioned whether a judgment rendered against one not summoned, but on whose behalf an answer had been filed by an unauthorized attorney (Durett v. Durett, 89 S. W. 210, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 275), is not void. In Holbert v. Montgomery's Adm'r, 5 Dana, 11, it was held that the appearance by attorney, although the attorney was without authority, was binding upon the party whose appearance was thus had. But this position seems to have been abandoned in Howse v. Reeves & Co., 76 S. W. 513, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 949, and Francis v. Lilly's Ex'x, 124 Ky. 230, 98 S. W. 996. In the case at bar we may say that in an action upon a judgment a defense that the party against whom the judgment was rendered was not in fact before the court is a direct attack upon the record, under our practice, as much so as if the suit had been brought by him to vacate it. So treating it, we inquire into the merits of the case, disregarding the first judgment. It appears that appellant did owe, and has not paid, to Jerome Skidmore the amount for which the judgment was rendered. Nor does he now make out a defense to same. Civ. Code Prac. § 90, provides that upon issue joined a plaintiff may have the relief to which he may show himself entitled upon a prayer therefor. In our view of the record it was proper that the plaintiff, as assignee of Jerome Skidmore, should recover judgment now and in this action for the unpaid account. While the attachment was not authorized, there was no motion to discharge same, and to reverse the case for that reason alone would involve nothing but the costs.

Judgment affirmed.

BURTON'S ADM'R v. CINCINNATI, N. O. & T. P. RY. CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 356*)—PERSONS ON TRACK—TRESPASSERS—LICENSEES.

A person at a place, within private grounds of a railroad, which has been habitually used by the public generally for many years is a licensee, and not a trespasser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1228-1234; Dec. Dig. § 356.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR IN INSTRUCTIONS CURED BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

The error in an instruction, in an action against a railroad for the death of a person struck by a train while at a place habitually used by the public and intended for the use of the traveling public, that the company had the exclusive use of its tracks at that place, and any person entering on the track at that place was a trespasser, was not cured by an instruction that the company must keep a lookout and give warning of the approach of trains and keep them under control and use caution to avoid injury to persons on the track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 359*)—TRESPASSERS—DUTY TO PROTECT.

A railroad company does not owe a trespasser any duty of lookout or warning. Its only duty is to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring him, after discovering his peril.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1238, 1239; Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 400*)—INJURY TO PERSONS ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a railroad for the death of a child struck by a train, evidence held to require the submission to the jury of the issue of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1365-1367, 1373-1376; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 387*)—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a railroad company failed in the performance of its duties in operating its trains, and thereby struck a licensee on the track, it was liable, unless the licensee was guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by W. B. Burton's Adm'r against the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and new trial granted.

Campbell & Williams and Virgil P. Smith, for appellant. O. H. Waddle & Son and John Galvin, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. This is an action brought by the appellant, who was the plaintiff below, to recover damages for the death of his intestate, W. B. Burton, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the appellee company, and its locomotive engineer, in so operating and managing one of its engines and trains as to run the same against and upon him. The answer was a traverse and a plea of contributory negligence, and the charge that the deceased was a trespasser on its tracks and premises at the time he received the injuries complained of. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the railway company. The errors complained of are that the court erred in giving and refusing instructions, and that the verdict is against the evidence.

The deceased was a boy about 11 years of age. He was struck by one of appellee's engines in the daytime in its yard at Somerset, Ky. His father worked for the company in its roundhouse, located in the yard, and the deceased, who for some months had each day been taking his father's dinner to him, was on his way home from the roundhouse, where he had gone to take his father's dinner, when he was struck. Immediately in front of the passenger depot there are two parallel tracks, the nearest one to the depot being track No. 1. Between track No. 1 and track No. 2, there is a cinder path, the space between the two tracks being about 7 feet. The boy on his way home walked north on the outside of track No. 1, but parallel with it, for some distance, until he came nearly to the depot. He then crossed track No. 1, and continued to walk north toward the depot on the cinder path between the two tracks. About the time he crossed track No. 1 to get on the cinder path a passenger train came in, going south on track No. 2, and stopped in front of the depot. At the time the south-bound train came in, a passenger train was coming north on track No. 1. This is the train that struck the deceased. For some reason, doubtless to be entirely clear of the train on track No. 2, he left the position in which he had been walking in the middle of the cinder path, and stepped over to the end of the ties on track No. 1, and while walking on the end of the ties was struck by the pilot beam of the engine on track No. 1. His back was towards this engine, as he was going in the same direction it was. He was struck immediately in front of the depot, where a large crowd had congregated. The bells on both engines were ringing, and there was the noise and confusion incident to the arrival of two passenger trains at a depot, where a large amount of railroad business was carried on. The engine that hit him was moving, according to the evidence of some witnesses, at the rate of four or five miles an hour, while other witnesses said it was running faster than this. The engineer and fireman were both keeping a lookout, but the engineer did not, and could not, see the boy when he was hit, because he was on the opposite of the engine from him. The fireman, however, saw him, and upon his signal to the engineer that the boy had been struck, the train was soon stopped. Track No. 1 is straight for a distance of 1,000 feet south of where the boy was struck, and a person standing or walking at this place could be seen for this distance by the persons in charge of the engine. There is evidence tending to show that, when the south-bound train on track No. 2 reached a point about opposite where the boy was, he left the middle of the cinder path in which he had been walking, and stepped over to track No. 1, and had walked about 40 feet on the end of the ties of this track before he was struck. On the other hand, there is evidence that he did not leave the middle of the cinder path or get on the ties of track No. 1 until the engine on this track was within 10 feet of him, and that when he got on this track it was too late to prevent the injury. If the boy had remained in, or continued to walk in, the center of the cinder path, he would have been in a place of safety, and out of the way of harm from either train. It was only when he got on track No. 1 that he was placed in danger. The fireman testifies that he saw the boy walking up in the middle of the cinder path, but did not pay particular attention to him, as persons frequently walked there; that the moment he saw the boy step on track No. 1, he signaled the engineer to stop, but it was then too late.

The cinder path, as well as the tracks in front of the depot at the place where the deceased was walking, had been frequently and habitually used by the public generally for many years; so that he was a licensee, and not a trespasser, although in the private grounds and yard of the company. The boy when struck was immediately in front of the depot, which is some 200 feet long. Passengers in going to and from the depot to track No. 2 are obliged to cross track No. 1, and the cinder path between the two tracks in front of the depot was evidently intended for the use of the traveling public, and it is clear that appellee was not a trespasser. The court, however, instructed the jury that: "The Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railroad Company have the exclusive use of its track at the point where the deceased was killed, and any person entering upon this track at the point where deceased was killed was a trespasser." In other instructions the court put upon the railroad company the duty of keeping a lookout, of giving warnings of the approach of its trains, and keeping its trains under control, and using caution to avoid injury to persons found on its tracks; but this did not, in our opinion, cure the radical error in the instruction, telling the jury that decedent was a trespasser. In truth the instructions in this particular are not consistent. If the deceased was a trespasser, the company did not owe him any duty of lookout or warning. Its only obligation was to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury to him after his peril was discovered. The question of the duty of railroad companies to persons on its premises and tracks, at a place where the public have a right to be, and its duty to trespassers, is so fully considered in L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Redmon, 122 Ky. 385, 91 S. W. 722, C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Barbour, 93 S. W. 24, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 339, C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Nipp's Adm'r. 100 S. W. 246, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 1131, Gregory v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 79 S. W. 238, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1986, and I. C. R. R. Co. v.

Murphy, 123 Ky. 787, 97 S. W. 729, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 352, that we do not deem it necessary to extend this opinion in the treatment of these subjects. It is earnestly argued for the appellee company that the jury should have been directed to return a verdict in favor of the defendant. In view of the fact that the case is to be remanded for a new trial, we will not express any opinion as to the weight that should be attached to the evidence. It is sufficient to say that the testimony offered by appellant authorized a submission of the case to the jury. On another trial so much of instruction No. 1 as is quoted herein should be omitted, and there should be added to instruction No. 1, given by the court, these words: "And if you believe that the defendants failed in the performance of either of these duties, then you should find for the plaintiff, unless you believe decedent was guilty of contributory negligence as defined in instruction No. 2."

The judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial not inconsistent with this opinion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Floyd County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Mousie McCoy and others against W. B. Fraley and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. S. Harkins and James Goble, for appellants. Hopkins & Hopkins and May & May, for appellees.

LASSING, J. Appellants filed suit in the Floyd circuit court, wherein they alleged they were the owners of, and in possession of, two tracts of land, upon which appellees were committing trespasses by cutting and threatening to remove certain timber therefrom, and they asked that appellees be enjoined and restrained from entering upon their said land for the purpose of removing the timber. A temporary restraining order was granted. Appellees answered, denying title in appellants, and claimed title in themselves, under a contract executed to appellee W. B. Fraley by Arta Fraley, mother of appellants and appellee W. B. Fraley. They alleged that under said contract they had purchased of Arta Fraley all of the timber of a certain designated size and kind set out in the contract, which they filed with their answer and made a part thereof. The reply denied the execution of the contract under which appellees claimed title to the timber, and denied that the $200 alleged to have been paid by appellees was paid as a part of the consideration for the timber on the two tracts of land described in the petition. The affirmative matter in the reply was traversed in the rejoinder. Proof was taken upon the questions in issue, and upon final hearing the temporary restraining order was dissolved, and the petition of appellants was dismissed, and appellees were adjudged the owners of all of the timber on said two tracts covered by the contract set up in the pleading. It is not seriously contended that Arta Fraley, the mother of appellants and appellee W. B. Fraley, did not own the timber which appellee W. B. Fraley claims to have bought from her, but the real contention is that the contract under which W. B. Fraley claims to have purchased it was not executed by Arta Fraley, his mother, and that, if she signed anything at all, she signed what she believed to be an agreement that her son W. B. Fraley might haul timber from another tract of land through the lands on which the timber stands which he claims to have bought.

The first question, then, for determination is, Did Arta Fraley execute the contract under which appellees claim title to the timber? The chancellor found that the weight of the testimony was in support of the contention of appellees that she did sell him the timber in question, and evidenced the sale by the contract, which is filed with appellees' answer. From the testimony of all of the witnesses it is plain that the sale of this timber to W. B. Fraley and others had been freely talked about and considered by Arta Fraley. The record before us affords no satisfactory explanation of the payment by W. B. Fraley to his mother of the $200, if it was not as a part of the consideration for the sale of this timber. Considering all of the evidence, we are of opinion that the chancellor correctly found that Arta Fraley made the sale of timber to her son W. B. Fraley, which is evidenced by the contract filed with the answer of appellees. The appellee Cline comes into the case by having purchased a one-half interest in the contract of appellee W. B. Fraley.

Having determined that the contract was made, the next question is, What title passed under it? It is admitted that after the execution of the contract, and before any of the trees had been measured, counted, or marked, Arta Fraley died. For appellants it is insisted that the contract, if executed as alleged, was merely the evidence of a sale of personal property; and therefore, as the transaction had not been completed before the death of Arta Fraley, no title passed, and the contract is of no binding force and effect. Numerous authorities are cited to the effect that in a sale of personal property, where certain acts are to be done to determine the price that is to be paid, or the amount of goods that passed by the sale, the transaction is not completed until these necessary steps are taken, and that hence the title to the personalty does not vest in the purchaser upon the execution of the contract, but only upon the doing of the acts necessary to determine the amount of the property covered by the sale and the value thereof. The correctness of this principle is not questioned by appellees, but they contend that this sale is to be treated as a sale of an interest in real property. In the case of King v. Cheatham, 104 S. W. 751, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1176, this court said: "A sale of standing timber, not for immediate severance, is a sale of an interest in realty." In Wiggins v. Jackson, 73 S. W. 779, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2189, it is said: "Standing timber is a part of the realty. It was not sold in contemplation of immediate separation from the soil, and therefore is not within the rule announced by this court in Cain v. McGuire, 13 B. Mon. 341, and Ryassee v. Reese, 4 Metc. 372, 83 Am. Dec. 481." In Hogg v. Frazier, 70 S. W. 291, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 930, the principle is thus stated: "The law is well settled in this state that the title to standing timber, in the hands of a purchaser under a written contract indicating no specific time for their removal, passes in the same way as the land itself." In Dils v. Hatcher, 69 S. W. 1092, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 826, the court, through Judge White, said: "It is a rule of real property, long established, that growing trees and everything permanently fixed to the soil is realty, and, when the trees are severed, they become personalty. This rule yet prevails, except as it is modified by the equity rule that equity will treat that as done which was intended to be done. We have, bearing in mind these two rules of law, held that, where growing timber was sold with the purpose of immediate severance from the soil, we would treat it as personalty. It was intended to immediately sever and make personalty, and we would therefore treat the growing timber as having been cut down, and therefore personalty. However, every sale of growing trees is not intended for immediate severance. The contract of sale may, or may not, so provide. Where the time given for severance is indefinite, as in the case of Asher Lumber Company v. Cornett, 63 S. W. 974, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 602, or where no time is fixed, the trees are considered as a part of the realty, which they always were. In such cases there is nothing in the contract of sale upon which to base the application of the equitable rule of treating as done that which was intended. There is no expressed intention of immediate severance. * * * In this case, therefore, we are of the opinion that the trees sold were realty, and not personalty." There being no time fixed for the removal of the trees in the contract under consideration, the sale thereof must be treated as passing or conveying an equitable interest in the real estate.

Having determined that the contract was executed by Arta Fraley, and that under it appellees acquired an equitable interest in the land, and Arta Fraley having died before the trees were measured, counted, and marked, the chancellor directed his court commissioner to go upon the land and ascertain the number of trees which passed to appellees under the contract. We think in so doing he adopted the only feasible and practicable method open to him for carrying out the contract which was uncompleted at the death of Arta Fraley. Had the contract called for a sale of the land by the acre, and the payment of the money as soon as the amount thereof had been ascertained, the chancellor would have directed the survey to be made and the number of acres ascertained, and in this way completed the contract. The plan which the court adopted in ascertaining the number of trees which passed under the contract was in no wise prejudicial to appellants.

Perceiving no error in the finding and rulings of the chancellor, the judgment is affirmed.

BURTON-WHAYNE CO. v. FARMERS' & DROVERS' BANK et al.†

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 6*) — DEFECTS — EFFECT.

A deed of a man and wife, acknowledgment of which was not in proper form because taken before a notary public, was good as between the parties and, in connection with the grantee's possession, notice to the world of his ownership.

† For modified opinion, see 114 S. W. 258.

2. DEEDS (§ 88*) — RECORDING — STATUTORY PROVISIONS—DEEDS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

A deed by a man and wife, not filed for record within 8 months, as required by 1 Stanton's Rev. St. c. 24, §§ 15, 23, was void as to the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 228; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 891*)—RECORD—RECORD IN ANOTHER CASE.

In an action involving the title to land, the record of another suit to quiet title, filed with the record on appeal, cannot be considered, where it does not appear that the same premises were involved.

4. LIS PENDENS (§ 16*)—NOTICE—FAILURE TO INCORPORATE DATE OF ATTACHMENT.

The purpose of Ky. St. 1903, § 2358a, subd. 2, requiring the date of the attachment to be contained in the body of the lis pendens notice, is to put subsequent purchasers and incumbents on notice; and, where the notice filed was correct, except that the date of attachment was not in the body thereof, and the date of filing was certified to by the clerk with his record of the notice, it afforded proper notice to persons filing an attachment on the property 13 days thereafter, so as to prevent the second attachment taking precedence.

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 112*)—POSSESSION UNDER VOID DEED—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where deeds by husbands and wives, though void as to the wives, because not recorded within 8 months, as required by 1 Stanton's Rev. St. c. 24, §§ 15, 23, were executed more than 50 years ago, if the grantees and those claiming through them have been in adverse possession for 30 years, the presumption is that the title is good by limitation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, First Division.

"To be officially reported."

Attachment of land by the Farmers' & Drovers' Bank and others against the Columbia Finance & Trust Company, administrator of S. S. Meddis. Burton-Whayne Company, purchasers at the commissioner's sale, filed exceptions to the report of sale, which were overruled, and it appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

George L. Burton, for appellant. Chas. H. Shield and George Cary Tabb, for appellees.

CLAY, C. This action involves the invalidity of the title to a piece of property, sold under an attachment secured by the appellee against the Columbia Finance & Trust Company, administrator of the estate of S. S. Meddis, deceased, Victor N. Meddis, and George S. Meddis, Jr. Appellant, Burton-Whayne Company, bought the property in question at the commissioner's sale, and filed certain exceptions thereto. These exceptions were overruled, and it appeals.

It appears from the record that about the year 1856 Foster Ray and Francis S. Ray owned an undivided one-fourth interest in a lot containing some 60 acres, at the northeast corner of Fifteenth or Cherry street and Magnolia avenue. Francis S. Ray died intestate, leaving no children. His only heirs were his brothers and sisters and the children of his deceased brothers and sisters. After Francis S. Ray's death Foster Ray, who owned one-half of an undivided one-fourth of the 60-acre tract, and inherited from his brother Francis S. Ray one-eighth of the latter's one-half of an undivided one-fourth, purchased the interest of Robert C. Ray and wife, Nancy I. Ray, in the 60-acre tract of land, by deed dated February 2, 1856, and recorded in the Jefferson county clerk's office January 9, 1857, in Deed Book 97, page 147. He also purchased the interest of Sarah Helser and her husband, Thomas Helser, by deed dated March 15, 1856, and recorded in the Jefferson county clerk's office January 9, 1856, in Deed Book 97, at page 147. He also purchased the interest of Amanda Ray and her husband, Asher B. Ray, by deed dated April 30, 1856, and recorded January 9, 1856, in the Jefferson county clerk's office, in Deed Book 97, at page 148. In addition to the above interests in the 60-acre tract of land Foster Ray bought the interests of all the other heirs, except the interest of B. F. Ray, Sarah Batsel, Amanda Batsel, Spencer, Sally C. Curd, and Ann Eliza Curd. He thereupon filed against these parties, who had not sold their interest, an action to have the 60 acres of land partitioned among the owners thereof according to their respective interests. The persons who conveyed to Foster Ray were not made parties to this action. All the others interested in the property were made parties. Robert C. Ray owned $\frac{3}{102}$ of the whole tract, Sarah Helser $\frac{3}{102}$, and Amanda Ray $\frac{1}{102}$ of the whole tract. In the partition proceedings Foster Ray was awarded 12.92 acres, and the property involved in this action is a portion of said tract of 12.92 acres.

It is first insisted by counsel for appellant that the title to the property purchased by it is defective because Robert C. Ray's deed to Foster Ray was acknowledged by him before a notary public. While this deed was not acknowledged in proper form, we think it was good between the parties. It at least had the effect of an unacknowledged deed, and, connected with Foster Ray's possession after the division, was notice to the world of his ownership. Simpson's Ex'x v. Loving, Jackson, etc., 3 Bush, 458, 96 Am. Dec. 252.

It is next insisted that the deeds from Asher B. Ray and Amanda Ray and Thomas and Sarah Helser are not valid because they were not filed for record within 8 months, as required by Rev. St. (Stanton's) vol. 1, c. 24, §§ 15, 23. This precise question was before this court in several instances, and it has been held that such deeds are void as to married women. The effect of this interpretation of the statutes in question was to cause their subsequent repeal by the Legislature. McGuire v. Bowman, etc., 6 Bush, 550; Butler v. Wheeler, etc., 82 Ky. 475; Dugan v. Corn, Id. 206.

There was filed with the record in this case the record of an action brought by Lizzie Adams in the Jefferson circuit court against Sarah C. Dycus, J. V. Dycus, and Anne E. Fulcher to quiet her title. Sarah C. Dycus is the same party as Sally C. Curd, given in the list of heirs of Francis S. Ray. In their answer to Lizzie Adams' petition Sarah C. Dycus and others claimed that they had never conveyed their interest in the property in question to the devisees of Foster Ray, but that they still held the interest in said property which they had inherited from Francis S. Ray. Issue was joined on this point, and Lizzie Adams filed a reply, pleading both the 15 and 30 year statutes of limitation. Two witnesses gave their depositions in that case, and the court held that Lizzie Adams had had adverse possession of the property in question for a period of more than 30 years. We are asked to consider here the record of that case. It does not appear, however, that the same lot of ground is involved, and we can not, therefore, consider such evidence.

Appellant's next exception to the report of sale is based upon the fact that the date of the attachment, as required by subdivision 2, § 2358a, Ky. St. 1903, is not contained in the body of the lis pendens notice. It appears, however, that in every other respect the notice filed in the county clerk's office was correct. It is also admitted that the date said notice was filed is certified to by the county clerk in connection with his record of said notice. Above the signature of the clerk is the following: "Filed March 15, 1907, at 9:40 o'clock a. m. By C. H. Shield." The attachment was levied March 13, 1907. After the attachment was secured in this action, it appears that Oscar Stutz and others levied on the property in question on March 28, 1907, 13 days after notice of this action had been filed in the county clerk's office. It is therefore contended that, as the lis pendens notice did not give the date of the attachment, Stutz's attachment took precedence. We cannot agree with counsel in this contention. The primary purpose of the notice required by section 2358 is to put subsequent purchasers, lessees, and incumbrancers on notice. The question is: Did Oscar Stutz and others file their attachment with notice of the prior attachment? Of this there can be no question. The prior lis pendens notice was not only on record, but the date of filing thereof was attached by the county clerk. Under these circumstances, therefore, we do not think the attachment filed by Oscar Stutz and others took precedence of the attachment sustained in this action.

For the reason that the deeds from Sarah Heiser and her husband, Thomas Heiser, and from Amanda Ray and Asher B. Ray are void, as to the married women, we are of opinion that the chancellor erred in overruling appellant's exceptions to the commissioner's report of sale. Inasmuch, however, as the deeds were executed more than 50 years ago, and, as the statute of limitations would now bar a recovery by the vendors if, as a matter of fact, the appellees Meddis and those through whom they claim have been in the adverse possession of the property for a period of 30 years (L. & N. R. Co. v. Thompson, 105 Ky. 190, 48 S. W. 990; Rose v. Ware, 115 Ky. 420, 74 S. W. 188; Watkins v. Pfeiffer, 92 S. W. 562, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 97), the presumption is that the title to the property is good by limitation. In view of this fact we have concluded to remand the case, with directions to the chancellor to hear proof upon the question of adverse possession. If such adverse possession is shown, the chancellor will overrule appellant's exceptions to the report of sale.

Judgment reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MATTINGLY et al. v. EVERSOLE et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. PLEADING (§ 149*) — CROSS-COMPLAINT — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 96, declaring that a cross-petition shall not be allowed to a defendant, except upon a cause of action which affects or is affected by the original cause of action, a cross-petition setting up an independent cause of action against persons not parties to the original suit is bad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 406*)—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER.

A cross-petition, setting up an independent cause of action against persons not parties to the original suit, is not a misjoinder of actions, objection to which would be waived by filing an answer to the cross-petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1370; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—HARMLESS ERROR—PRACTICE.

Though it is the better practice to move to strike a cross-petition setting up an independent cause of action against persons not parties to the original suit, instead of demurring, the error in failing to resort to the proper practice was not material, where the right conclusion was reached.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Leslie County.
"Not to be officially reported."

The Kentucky Coal Lands Company brought a suit against W. H. and James Mattinglys to quiet title, to which the Mattinglys filed an answer, counterclaim, and cross-petition, and by such cross-petition made A. B. Eversole and others parties. Eversole and others demurred to the cross-petition, and it was dismissed, and the Mattinglys appeal. Affirmed.

Cleon K. Calvert, for appellants. Jas. H. Jeffries, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. The Kentucky Coal Lands Company brought a suit against the appellants, W. H. and James Mattingly, alleging that it was the owner and in possession of a tract of land containing some 700 acres, upon which the Mattinglys were trespassing. It asked that they be enjoined from entering upon the land or asserting title or claim thereto, and that its title be quieted. To this petition the Mattinglys filed an answer, counterclaim, and cross-petition. In this pleading they asserted that they and some of the cross-defendants were the owners of a portion of the land described in the petition. In another paragraph they averred that the appellees, whom they also made defendants to their cross-petition, had without right entered upon the land, to which they set up ownership in their answer, and cut down and carried away timber therefrom of the value of $258, for which sum they asked a judgment against them on their cross-petition. The cross-defendants, who are the appellees here, filed an answer to the cross-petition against them. Afterwards the answer was withdrawn, and a general demurrer filed to the cross-petition, which was sustained, and the cross-petition was dismissed. From the judgment dismissing the cross-petition this appeal is prosecuted. At the same term the court further adjudged that the Mattinglys were the owners and entitled to the possession of the land to which they asserted title in their answer.

The record presents a simple question of law. That is, whether or not the appellants had the right under the Code to make their answer in the suit of the Kentucky Coal Lands Company a cross-petition against the appellees and obtain the relief therein sought. The Civil Code of Practice provides that an answer may contain a cross-petition, which is defined in section 96 to be "the commencement of an action by a defendant against a codefendant, or a person who is not a party to the action, or against both; or by a plaintiff against a coplaintiff, or a person who is not a party to the action, or against both; and is not allowed to a defendant except upon a cause of action which affects or is affected by the original cause of action, nor to a plaintiff except upon a cause of action which affects or is affected by a set-off or counterclaim." So that, unless the cause of action asserted in the cross-petition against the cross-defendants was "upon a cause of action which affects or is affected by the original cause of action," the ruling of the lower court in dismissing it was proper. The original cause of action was against the Mattinglys to quiet the title of the Kentucky Coal Lands Company to the land described in its petition, and to prevent the Mattinglys trespassing on said land. The complaint of the Mattinglys against the appellees was concerning a matter entirely between the Mattinglys and the cross-defendants. The Kentucky Coal Lands Company had no concern in the controversy between the Mattinglys and the cross-defendant, nor did the controversy between these parties have any connection with the cause of action set out in the petition. It was not necessary to a complete adjudication of the matters in issue between the Kentucky Coal Lands Company and the Mattinglys that the Eversoles should be made parties. If, in place of failing, the Kentucky Coal Lands Company had succeeded in establishing its title to all the land described in the petition, it is manifest that the decision in its favor would have defeated the cross-petition of the Mattinglys, because the effect of it would have been to determine that the Mattinglys had no interest in the land they sought to recover damages from the Eversoles for trespassing upon. On the other hand, if the Mattinglys succeeded, as they did, in establishing their right to the land upon which they claimed the Eversoles had been trespassing, the Kentucky Coal Lands Company could not have any concern in the litigation between the Mattinglys and the Eversoles. So that in no state of case was the original cause of action affected by the complaint set up in the cross-petition.

In 5 Encyclopædia of Pleading & Practice, p. 641, it is said, supported by ample authority, that: "The new facts which it is proper for a defendant to introduce into a pending litigation by means of a cross-bill are such, and such only, as it is necessary for the court to have before it in deciding the questions raised in the original suit to enable it to do full and complete justice to all the parties before it in respect to the cause of action on which the complainant rests his right to aid or relief. If a defendant in filing a cross-bill attempts to go beyond this, and to introduce new and distinct matter not essential to the proper determination of the matter put in litigation by the original bill, although he may show a perfect cause against either the complainant or one or more of his codefendants, his pleading will not be a cross-bill but an original bill. And no decree can be rendered on such matters."

In Newman's Pleading & Practice, p. 612, in speaking of cross-petitions, the author states: "And it must at all times be deemed essential to a cross-bill that it should be confined to the subject-matter of the original bill. Any other departure from it was not admissible. * * * For the cross-bill must relate exclusively to the subject-matter of the original bill and things connected therewith, and foreign matter cannot be introduced, unless under special circumstances." The rule of practice here announced is fully supported in the following authorities: In Wells v. Boyd, 1 Duv. 367, a case very much like the one before us, Preston brought an action against Boyd upon a note. Boyd answered, and alleged that the note was executed as part of the purchase price of a jack, which he bought from Preston, and that one Wells and Preston, at the time of the execution of the note, executed to him a writing, in which they warranted the jack to be a good foal getter. In considering the right of Boyd to make his answer a cross-petition against Wells, the court said: "The subject-matter of this action is the right of the plaintiff, Preston, to collect from the defendant Boyd the amount of money which by his note he promised to pay, and that right was not and cannot be affected by any right Boyd had secured to him by reason of the covenant executed to him by Wells. And the two judgments in this case forcibly illustrate the correctness of that conclusion. Preston here recovered the amount of his note against Boyd, notwithstanding the litigation between Boyd and Wells, the subject-matter of his action being entirely unaffected by any cause of action which the defendant Boyd had against Wells; and Boyd got an independent judgment on his cause of action against Wells, showing conclusively that Boyd's cause of action on the covenant of Wells was distinct from and wholly independent of Preston's cause of action against him. He should have brought his original action thereon. The proceeding against Wells cannot therefore be sustained by way of counterclaim, nor by way of cross-petition." In Royse v. Reynolds, 10 Bush, 286, it appears that one Fee sought to enjoin Royse from enforcing a judgment against him, upon the ground that he was his surety, and had been released from liability by lapse of time. Royse made his answer a cross-petition against Reynolds, alleging that Reynolds, as sheriff, had failed to return the execution for more than 30 days after the return day thereof, and had failed to sell certain property that had been levied on. The court said: "There is no connection whatever between these causes of action and the subject-matter of Fee's suit, except that Fee was a party defendant in the judgment upon which the execution issued. None of his property had been seized, and he was released, if at all, not by the delay or neglect of the sheriff, but by want of diligence on the part of Royse." In Crabtree v. Bank's Adm'r, 1 Metc. 482, Mary Banks recovered a judgment against J. V. Banks, administrator with the will annexed of C. P. Banks, and sought to recover the amount of the judgment from the devisees, to whom she alleged the estate had come. In this action the administrator, who was made a party defendant, made his answer a cross-petition against the devisees, and prayed judgment against them for a balance found due him upon settlement as administrator several years before. To this cross-petition the devisees answered, endeavoring to surcharge the settlement of the administrator. The court said: "In this case the cause of action stated in the cross-petition did not affect the subject-matter of the action in the name of Mary Banks against the devisees of C. P. Banks. The two causes of action were separate and distinct. There was no connection between them, and they should not have been blended in the same action. If J. V. Banks had a demand against the devisees of C. P. Banks, he could have asserted it in his separate action, and it was his duty to do so. And, upon the other hand, if the devisees desired to surcharge the settlement made by the administrator with the will annexed, they could have brought their action for that purpose, or have relied upon the same matter, in any action which he might bring against them for the recovery of the alleged balance found in his favor upon the settlement aforesaid."

Counsel for appellants insists that by filing an answer to the cross-petition the appellees waived their right to object to it, although the answer was afterwards withdrawn and a demurrer entered and sustained. This argument is based upon the theory that the cause of action set up in the cross-petition amounted to a misjoinder of actions, and therefore this error was waived by filing an answer; but there was no misjoinder of actions. The cross-petition did not amount to this. It simply set up a new and independent cause of action against persons who were not parties to the original suit. It would have been better practice to have moved to strike from the pleading so much of it as asserted a cross-petition; but the error in failing to resort to the proper practice is not material, as the right conclusion was reached.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McCracken County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Rosa A. Baker against the Paducah Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wheeler, Hughes & Berry, for appellant. Crice & Ross, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. For personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the negligence of the defendant company and its agents, by reason of which she was violently thrown or fell to the street from the car upon which she was a passenger, appellee brought this action. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict in her favor, and the judgment on this verdict we are asked to reverse.

The petition stated appellee's cause of action as follows: "She states that, when the car on which she was a passenger arrived within about one-half a block of her destination, the conductor thereon rang the bell, notifying the motorman in charge that a passenger wished to leave the car at the corner of Eleventh and Madison streets. She avers that, when the car had approached to within a short distance of the corner of said streets, it began to slacken its speed, and continued to go less rapidly until it had crossed the street and reached the point where it usually stopped for the discharge of passengers. That while the car was going at this rate of speed, and just before it reached the point where the plaintiff was to alight, the conductor on the car came around where she was sitting, and took her umbrella from her and raised it, stepping out on the step to assist her off, and just at this time, and immediately before the car reached its usual and customary stopping place on this corner, and the place where the plaintiff desired to alight, the car was going at a slow rate of speed. She arose for the purpose of stepping off the car when it had stopped, and while she was in a standing position on the car, and before she had made any attempt to alight, the conductor, who was standing on the steps, extended his hand to assist her from the car, when the car started up suddenly with a jerk and threw her to the ground with great force and violence. Plaintiff says that the sudden starting of the car with a jerk as aforesaid was caused by reason of the gross negligence and wanton carelessness of defendant's agents and servants who were in charge of said car, or because of the gross negligence and wanton carelessness of the defendant in operating this car, while it and the machinery and appliances connected therewith were in a dangerous and defective condition, which dangerous and defective condition existed at the time, and was well known to the defendant, its agents, and servants in charge thereof, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence. Plaintiff avers that the accident aforesaid, and the injuries resulting therefrom, were caused by reason of one or both of the acts of negligence just indicated, but she cannot state positively which." Appellee was the only witness who testified in her behalf concerning the nature and cause of the accident that resulted in her injuries. She testified that, when she had placed her foot on the running board of the car for the purpose of getting off at the crossing which the car was slowly approaching, and while being assisted by the conductor, the car gave a lurch and threw her off. She did not state what caused the car to suddenly start forward. There was no evidence whatever that the car or any of the machinery or appliances connected therewith were in an unsafe or defective condition, nor was there any evidence that the motorman was negligent. The evidence for appellant conduced to show that the car did not suddenly, or with a lurch or jerk, start, but that the appellee stepped on the footboard, running lengthwise of the car to enable passengers to get on and off, while the car was in motion; that the footboard was wet from the falling rain, and her foot slipped, and she fell to the ground without any negligence or carelessness on the part of the company or any of its employees.

With the evidence in this condition, the court instructed the jury that: "It was the duty of the defendant to exercise the utmost care, which careful and prudent persons are accustomed to exercise when engaged in like business and under like or similar circumstances of this case, to have its said car and the machinery and appliances thereto attached, in a reasonably safe condition; and it was the duty of the defendant's employes in charge of said car, and in the operation and management of same, to exercise a like degree of such care to safely carry the plaintiff to the place where she wanted to leave or get off said car, and to stop same at said place long enough to allow plaintiff a reasonable opportunity to get off of said car in safety. And if you shall believe from the evidence that the defendant's employes in charge of said car failed to exercise such care, and that, while plaintiff was preparing to leave or get off of said car, with notice or knowledge to the employes in charge of said car, before the same had been stopped, and while said car was being slackened up for the purpose of being stopped, the employes in charge of said car suddenly and with a jerk started said car, or if you shall believe from the evidence in this case that the machinery and appliances of said car were defective and unsafe, and defendant knew this, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known it, and by reason of such defective and unsafe machinery and appliances said car was caused to suddenly start with a jerk, and by reason of either of these things, and as a direct and proximate cause of either, plaintiff was thrown to the ground and injured, then defendant was guilty of negligence, and the law in this case is for the plaintiff, and you should so find."

Appellant complains of so much of this instruction as submitted to the jury the question as to the unsafe or defective condition of the car, its machinery or appliances, upon the ground that, although the petition alleged that the car, its machinery, or appliances were unsafe, dangerous, and defective, there was no evidence offered or heard in support of this allegation. It contends that by incorporating this idea in the instruction the court submitted an issue, not involved in the case, that was calculated to mislead the jury and was prejudicial to its substantial rights. In answer to this counsel for appellee argues that all that appellee could say was that the car was negligently started with a violent jerk when she was in the act of getting off. Whether the sudden lurch of the car was caused by the negligence of the persons in charge of it, or by reason of defects in the machinery or appliances of the car, that prevented the motorman from controlling it, she did not know and could not state. That she did not see the motorman at the time, and could not say that he was negligent, or that the sudden start was caused by reason of the brake being in such defective condition that it slipped, or was jarred loose, or on account of some other defective appliance of the car. A sharp issue was made by the evidence of the company and the appellee as to whether or not the car increased its speed while she was in the act of alighting. This was the vital point in the case, and the question is, Must the appellee fail because she could not in her evidence specify in what particular the negligence complained of consisted? To put it in another way, Must a passenger, under circumstances similar to those proven in this case, be able to state or prove by witnesses the cause that produced the acts alleged to be negligent, or falling in this, go out of court?

The plaintiff in an action like this has the right to state, in as many different ways as the facts will justify, the negligence that caused the injuries complained of. He is not confined to one act of negligence on the part of the defendant, but may state separate and distinct concurring acts that produced the accident, and may recover upon sufficient proof to support one or more of them. To illustrate: The plaintiff in this case had the right to charge generally that her injuries were caused by the negligence of the persons in charge of the car, or because the car or some of its appliances or fixtures were in a defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition, or because the tracks or appliances used in connection therewith were out of repair, or in an unsafe condition, or she might have pointed out with particularity the several acts of negligence that contributed to bring about the injury complained of. Gaines & Co. v. Johnson, 105 S. W. 381, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 58. There is no question that the plaintiff stated a good cause of action in her petition, nor is there any doubt that she had the right to charge that the accident was due to the negligence of the motorman or to defects in the car. There is great force in the argument that appellee could not in her evidence state accurately, or indeed at all, what caused the car to start, or whether it was negligence on the part of the motorman, or negligence in the company in failing to have the car in such condition as that the motorman might control its movements. She knew the car started suddenly and with a lurch. Why it did so she could not state, because she did not know. If, as a matter of fact it did suddenly start, after it had slowed up for the purpose of permitting appellee to alight, it is clear that either the motorman was guilty of negligence, or that the car or some of its appliances were so defective that he could not control it. There was no direct evidence of defective appliances, nor indeed was there any direct evidence of negligence on the part of the motorman, or that any person or thing caused the car to suddenly start forward, as shown by the evidence of appellee. Under this state of facts, if the argument of counsel for appellant is sound, the court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find a verdict in favor of the company. If there was no evidence to show defective appliances, neither was there any to show negligence on the part of the persons in charge of the car. If it was error to submit to the jury the question of defective appliances, it was equally error to submit the question of negligence of the motorman. So that, carried to its logical conclusion, the result would be that in cases of this character, unless the plaintiff was able to introduce direct evidence of negligence on the part of the persons in charge of the car, or evidence of defective appliances, there would be a failure of proof. But the argument of counsel is not sound. It often happens that a passenger or a common carrier, who is injured by its negligence, is not able to point out the particular person or thing that caused the negligence, or describe in what it consisted, as the passenger does not know, and may not have any means of knowing. But, it does not follow from this that the passenger may not make out his cause of action, or a case that would authorize a submission of the issue to the jury.

It is the general rule that the plaintiff, in actions to recover damages for personal injuries, as well as in other cases, has the burden of proof, and must introduce evidence in support of the cause of action set out in his petition; but, if the cause that produced the negligence and consequent injury is not within the reasonable reach or knowledge of the plaintiff, then he may, especially in actions against carriers, go to the jury upon evidence of negligence and resulting injury without being required to specify the particular cause of the negligence. And this, by the application of the well-recognized rule of res ipsa loquitur, which means, "the thing speaks for itself." Accepting the statements of appellee as true, it is manifest that the car suddenly started, although the appellee could not state what caused it to start. That it was started, either by the negligence of the motorman, or by the company in failing to have the car properly equipped, is equally plain. Whether it was due to one of these causes or the other, or both of them jointly, is not material, so far as the appellee is concerned, as in either event she was entitled, upon her own showing, to recover for the injuries sustained by the negligent starting. Her evidence established the two essential things necessary to recover—injury to herself without her fault, and that negligence upon the part of the carrier caused it.

The scope of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and its ready application to the facts of this case, is well illustrated in the statement of the rule in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 59, where it is said: "The accident, the injury, and the circumstances under which they occur, are in some cases sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence, and thus cast upon the defendant the burden of establishing his freedom from fault. Proof of an injury occurring as the proximate result of an act of the defendant, which may not usually, if done with due care, have injured any one, is enough to make out a presumption of negligence. Where a thing which causes the injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who had the management of it used proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of an explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care. So, also, where it is shown that the accident is such as that its real cause may be the negligence of the defendant, and whether it is so or not is within the knowledge of the defendant, the plaintiff may give the required evidence of negligence, without himself explaining the real cause of the accident, by proving the circumstances, and thus raising a presumption that if the defendant does not choose to give the explanation, the real cause was negligence on the part of the defendant."

The text is fully supported in Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188, 59 N. E. 925, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630. Griffen was injured in an elevator accident. The court in that case said: "The death of the plaintiff's intestate was caused by the fall of the counter-balance weights. Those weights were held in a frame, to which was attached a rope or cable, passing around a drum. The weights fell down from the frame, and the rope was thrown off the drum. That no such accident could ordinarily have occurred had the elevator machinery been in proper condition and properly equipped seems to me very plain. The court was therefore justified in permitting the jury to infer negligence from the accident construing, as I do, the term 'accident' to include, not only the injury, but the attending circumstances."

And so in Breen v. N. Y. Central R. R. Co., 109 N. Y. 297, 16 N. E. 60, 4 Am. St. Rep. 450, the court said: "There must be reasonable evidence of negligence; but, when the thing causing the injury is shown to be under the control of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of business does not happen if reasonable care is used, it does, in the absence of the explanation of the defendant, afford sufficient evidence that the accident arose from a want of care on his part." In Howser v. Cumberland & Pa. R. Co., 80 Md. 146, 30 Atl. 906, 27 L. R. A. 154, 45 Am. St. Rep. 332, the plaintiff was injured by being struck by cross-ties that fell from a moving car, although the plaintiff was unable to state what caused the cross-ties to fall. The court said: "While the general rule undoubtedly is that the burden of proof that the injury resulted from the negligence on the part of the defendant is upon the plaintiff, yet, in some cases the very nature of the accident may in itself, and through the presumption it carried, supply the requisite proof."

In Consolidated Traction Company v. Thalheimer, 59 N. J. Law, 474, 37 Atl. 132, the facts are almost identical with those in this case. The only witness who testified in behalf of plaintiff in her suit against the company to recover damages for personal injuries was herself. She said that: "She was a passenger in a street car operated by the traction company and running upon Orange street, in the city of Newark; that she notified the conductor of the car that she desired to alight therefrom at Fifth street (which crossed Orange street); that when the car approached Fifth street the conductor called out the name of that street; that she got up from her seat, while the car was still in motion, and walked to the rear door of the car, which was open, and when she arrived at the door and was just coming out of it, she was thrown into the street by a movement of the car which she called a 'lurch' or a 'jerk,' and described as of sufficient force to 'throw her right off.' The fall produced serious injury." After the motion for a peremptory was overruled, the company gave evidence tending to show that Mrs. Thalheimer fell upon the street after she had safely alighted from the car. In denying the motion for a new trial the court said: "Our review is limited to the consideration of the question whether Mrs. Thalheimer's evidence, if credence were given to it, was sufficient to establish the liability of the traction company to answer for her injury. The contention that the evidence in question was insufficient to show a breach of the duty which the traction company, as a carrier of passengers, owed to Mrs. Thalheimer cannot, in my judgment prevail. As street cars run upon rails fixed and leveled in the highway, and not permitting lateral motion, and are provided with brakes which, when applied quickly or when, after being applied, are released quickly before the momentum of the car has been overcome, produce known mechanical effects upon persons on the car, the occurrence of a lurch or jerk of the violence described fairly justifies an inference that either the tracks were improperly laid or were out of order, or the brakes were improperly handled. At all events the fact that such a lurch or jerk occurred as would have been unlikely to occur if proper care had been exercised brings the case within the maxim 'res ipsa loquitur.'"

In a full note to Huey v. Gahlenbeck, 121 Pa. 238, 15 Atl. 520, 6 Am. St. Rep. 790, supported by ample authority, the editor states "that, as a general proposition, a party who charges negligence as a ground of an action must prove it; yet that an accident may be of such a nature as to raise a presumption of negligence is fully sustained by authority. The doctrine is maintained that proof of the occurrence of an accident, which under ordinary circumstances would not have happened if due care had been exercised, raises a presumption of evidence, and the burden of proof is thus raised upon the part of the defendant to rebut the presumption. Or, as expressed in an English case, where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management of it used proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care." In 29 Cyc. 590, and 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 512, numerous cases are cited in line with the foregoing authorities.

The case before us furnishes a fine example for the application of the principle announced in the foregoing authorities. The thing that caused the injury was under the exclusive control of the railway company. It owed a duty to the appellee as a passenger to use due care to avoid injury to her; and the accident was of such a nature that according to her statement it could not have happened in the absence of negligence in the operation or construction of the car. We therefore conclude that it was proper to submit to the jury the question of defective appliances together with the negligence of the motorman, upon the theory that the jury had the right to infer from the plaintiff's evidence that the defendant company was negligent; and, as the plaintiff could not particularize the negligence, as it might have resulted from one or both of the causes stated in the petition, it was not error to permit the jury to infer whether the sudden starting of the car was due to one or both of these causes. Nor is the fact that the defendant, in cases of this character, may introduce direct evidence conducing to establish that there was no negligence in the operation of the car, or defect in the appliances or fixtures, sufficient to warrant the court in taking the case from the jury, as the jury might infer, notwithstanding this evidence, that there was negligence on the part of the carrier. This inference is of course rebuttable, as is any other legal presumption, and the evidence offered in rebuttal might be so conclusive or overwhelming as to authorize the court to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff.

It is strongly urged that the injury to plaintiff was due to the fact that her foot slipped, and not to any negligence in the operation or construction of the car, and that the verdict is against the evidence, and this may be conceded. But the jury, as has been often and over again said, saw the witnesses, heard them testify, and accepted the evidence of the appellee in preference to that offered in behalf of the company, and we cannot say that the verdict is so flagrantly against the evidence as to authorize us for this reason to disturb it.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNION CENT. LIFE INS. CO. OF CINCINNATI v. DUKES et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 35*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—LAWS OF SISTER STATES.

The courts of Kentucky do not take judicial notice of the law of a sister state; such law being a fact to be shown by proof.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 907*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—ABSENCE OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

In the absence of a bill of exceptions showing what proof was made in the lower court, it will be presumed on appeal that the proof heard justified the conclusion reached.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 548*) — REVIEW — STIPULATIONS OF COUNSEL.

A stipulation that either party might submit to the court statutes and decisions to show the laws of other states, and that copies of the statutes and decisions so submitted might be attached in lieu of the original to the record for use in any court, does not warrant the court on appeal in looking to such statute and decisions as may be cited in argument, where there is no bill of exceptions to show what statutes and decisions were submitted below.

Appeal from the Circuit Court, Simpson County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Marshall B. Dukes and others against the Union Central Life Insurance Company of Cincinnati. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George C. Harris and Maxwell & Ramsey, for appellant. Roark & Finn, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. The Union Central Life Insurance Company on October 9, 1894, issued a policy insuring the life of Dona I. Dukes, in the sum of $7,000. It was provided in the policy that, in case of default in the payment of any premium after the third, the policy would be continued in force for the full amount, as a paid-up nonparticipating policy for such a time as its reserve value would carry it according to the American Experience Table of Mortality, with 4 per cent. interest. Mrs. Dukes made the payments on the policy until October 7, 1900, and for that premium she executed her note due 11 months after date. She failed to pay the note or any subsequent premium, and died on March 26, 1904. This suit was brought by the beneficiaries in the policy on January 29, 1907, to recover on it; they alleging that the reserve value of the policy continued it in force for a period of more than five years, or until after October 15, 1905. The defendant by its answer set up the fact that the policy also contained these provisions:

"After three years' premium shall have been paid on this policy, except in case of failure to pay at maturity a note given for premium or for a loan upon the security of this policy, the company will, upon legal surrender of this contract before default in the payment of any premium, issue a paid-up nonparticipating policy payable as herein provided, for the amount as named in table A on the following page.

"In case of default in payment of any premium after the third, except in case of failure to pay at maturity a note given for premium or for a loan upon the security of this policy, no surrender for a paid-up policy having been made as above provided, this policy will be continued in force only as a paid-up nonparticipating term policy for such time only as one annual premium on this policy is contained in its reserve value according to the American Experience Table of Mortality, with 4 per cent. interest. In the death of the insured occurs while the aforesaid term policy is in force there shall be deducted from the amount insured a sum equal to the regular annual premiums, with interest that would have accrued had this policy been kept in force; said deduction not to exceed three annual premiums with interest."

"The failure to pay, if living, any of the first three annual premiums, or the failure to pay any notes or interest upon notes given to the company for any premium on or before the days upon which they become due shall avoid and nullify this policy without action on the part of this company or notice to the insured or beneficiary; and all payments made upon this policy shall be deemed earned as premiums during its currency."

"No suit to recover under this policy shall be brought after one year from the death of the insured."

The note which Mrs. Dukes executed contained these words: "Said policy, including all conditions therein for surrender or continuance as a paid-up term policy, shall, without notice to any party or parties interested therein, be null and void on the failure to pay this note at maturity, with interest at eight per cent. per annum, payable annually. In case this note is not paid at maturity, the full amount of premiums shall be considered earned as premiums, during its currency, and the note payable without reviving the policy or any of its provisions."

The defendant alleged: That Mrs. Dukes, at the time of her application for the policy and of its delivery to her, was a citizen and resident of Texas; that the contract of insurance was consummated by delivery within the state of Texas, and all transactions between the parties relating thereto took place in Texas; that the policy by its terms provided it should be an Ohio contract; that the beneficiaries lived either in Texas or Oklahoma; and that under the laws of both Texas and Ohio the policy was void upon the nonpayment of the note, and no suit could be brought upon it after one year from the death of the insured. A reply was filed to the answer which controverted its allegations as to what the laws of Texas and Ohio are. After the issues had been made up, the case was submitted to the court upon the following agreement: "It is agreed by the plaintiff and the defendant that, in addition to the facts which are admitted and in evidence in this case by the pleadings and exhibits, on the 15th day of October, 1901, the ages of the infant plaintiffs were as follows: James M. Dukes, 15 years old; Elizabeth N., 13 years old; Jonathan Dukes, 11 years old; David N., 8 years old; and the other plaintiffs or beneficiaries under the policy were adults. It is further stipulated that either of the parties may submit to the court in argument such statutes and decisions as they may desire for the purpose of establishing the issues raised by the pleadings in respect to certain of the laws of Texas and Ohio, and that such statutes and decisions may be deemed in evidence subject to competency and relevancy; copies of the same to be attached in lieu of the original for the purpose of the record, in both the trial of the case in this court or any other court." The circuit court entered judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals.

There is no bill of exceptions in the record, and no motion for a new trial was entered in the circuit court. The courts of Kentucky do not take judicial notice of the laws of a sister state. What is the law of Ohio or Texas is a fact to be shown to the court by the proof. When a case comes to this court, the question before us is: Did the circuit court rule properly on the facts before him? What evidence the circuit court had before him as to the laws of Texas or Ohio we cannot know, as there is no bill of exceptions to show what was read or considered in that court. It is insisted that it must be presumed, in the absence of evidence that the contract is valid under the law of the place where it was made, because it is not presumed that the parties made an illegal contract. This is true, but we must also presume that the circuit court decided properly on the case, as it was presented to him, in the absence of any showing as to what he had before him. The presumption is that the circuit court decided correctly. To overcome this presumption, the appellant must bring to this court what was before the circuit court, and, if he fails to show by the record that he has done this, the presumption in favor of the judgment of the circuit court is not overcome. In other words, in the absence of a bill of exceptions showing what proof was made in the circuit court, we must assume that the proof heard by the circuit court justified the conclusion that the court reached, and that the laws of Texas and Ohio, as shown by the evidence before him, are such as to warrant the judgment which he entered. The question does not turn on who had the burden of proof. It turns on the presumption that the circuit court had before him facts sufficient to warrant his conclusion. The laws of Texas and Ohio may in fact be wholly otherwise. On this question we express no opinion, for we can only consider the case on the record before us. The question before us is, not what is the law of Texas and Ohio, but what did the proof in the circuit court show it to be, and on this question the presumption is that the proof before the circuit court warranted his conclusion, in the absence of a bill of exceptions showing what he had before him.

The stipulation which we have quoted does not warrant us in looking for ourselves to such statutes and decisions as may be cited in argument in this court, for the stipulation plainly provides that copies of the statutes or decisions which were introduced in the Franklin circuit court are to be attached in lieu of the originals for the purpose of the record in that or any other court, and there is nothing in the record to show us what the circuit judge had before him. The plaintiff alleged that the reserve value of the policy was $1,196.44, and evidently this would have carried the policy until long after Mrs. Duke's died.

It is not material for us to consider whether the contract is governed by the law of Texas or the law of Ohio, for in either event we must assume that the proof heard in the circuit court sustains the judgment. It is also immaterial what would be the rights of the parties under the laws of Kentucky. It is not a Kentucky contract, and is governed by the lex loci contractus. The defendant pleaded this law. The plaintiff took issue on it. The court decided the issue, and we have not before us the evidence on which he based his judgment. The regular way of proving the law of another state is by the evidence of a witness learned therein, but the parties may consent that the court shall consider such statutes and decisions as they adduce before him and give judgment thereon. When they so consent, neither can, on appeal, complain of the mode in which the case was presented. If we had before us what was before the circuit court, we might then determine whether he ruled correctly on the proof before him; but, in the absence of this from the record, we cannot say that he ruled incorrectly.

Judgment affirmed.

WESTERN & SOUTHERN LIFE INS. CO.
v. QUINN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1906.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 256*)—LIFE INSURANCE—FALSITY OF MATERIAL ANSWERS IN APPLICATION—EFFECT.

Where a question propounded to an applicant for life insurance was material and the answer was untrue, no recovery could be had on the policy, whether the applicant knew it was untrue or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 540; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

2. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT (§ 6*)—REQUISITES.

Where there is a question between parties about which reasonable men may differ as to the outcome, the parties may adjust the difference between themselves by way of a compromise which will be upheld, though it subsequently develops that one of the parties was right and the other wrong.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Compromise and Settlement, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 579*)—COMPROMISE—VALIDITY—CONSIDERATION.

The question of the validity of a life insurance policy, because insured falsely stated in his application that he had not applied to any other insurer for insurance and been rejected, is one about which reasonable men may entertain a substantial doubt, and a compromise of the claim under the policy is not without consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1417; Dec. Dig. § 579.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 579*)—COMPROMISE—FRAUD—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held not to show that the compromise of a claim under a life policy was procured by the fraud of insurer.

5. INSURANCE (§ 579*)—COMPROMISE—ACTION TO SET ASIDE—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

The petition in an action by the beneficiary in a life policy to set aside a compromise of the claim on the ground of the fraud of insurer must allege that the beneficiary tendered to insurer the amount received under the compromise.

6. JUDGMENT (§ 199*)—NOTWITHSTANDING VERDICT—GROUNDS.

Where the petition in an action to set aside a compromise of a life insurance claim, on the ground of the fraud of insurer, failed to allege that the money received under the compromise had been tendered to insurer, the court under Civ. Code Prac. § 386, providing that judgment shall be given for the party whom the pleadings entitle thereto, must give a judgment for insurer, notwithstanding a verdict for plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Mary Quinn against the Western & Southern Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

James Quarles, for appellant. T. A. McDonald, Wm. McKee Duncan, and C. C. McMahan, for appellee.

BARKER, J. When Michael J. Quinn died in 1906, there was an insurance policy on his life issued by the appellant company for $1,000, payable to his wife, Mary Quinn. After the death of the insured, the company denied its liability under the policy, because it claimed that in the application for insurance among the questions propounded to the applicant was whether or not he had ever applied to any other company for insurance and been rejected or postponed, to which he answered "No," that this answer was material and was untrue. After interviewing the widow, she and the appellant company agreed upon a compromise of the claim, by which it paid to her the sum of $750 in full of her claim under the policy in question. The company owed her $116 on another policy, and this was not in dispute. Thereupon it paid to the appellee the sum of $866 in full settlement of both of her claims against it, and the following receipt was issued:

"Form 25.

"Claimant's Receipt. $866.00. Compromise Settlement.

"Louisville, Ky., April 28, 1906.

"Whereas the Western and Southern Life Insurance Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, issued its policies 32776 and 10289A on the life of Michael J. Quinn, and whereas certain differences and disputes exist as to the liability of said company under said policies: Now, for the purpose of compromising and settling the said disputes and differences, the sum of eight hundred and sixty-six dollars has this day been paid to me, receipt of which I hereby acknowledge in full satisfaction, settlement and discharge of all liability of said company under said policies and the same is now herewith surrendered.

"[Signed] Mary Quinn.

"Witness:

"[Signed] M. J. Brady.

"Alex Altman.

"George A. Bolssard."

After nearly nine months had expired from the date of this receipt, this action was instituted by the widow to recover the balance of $250 alleged to be owing her under the policy which had been compromised, and alleging that the compromise had been obtained by fraud, misrepresentation, and deceit. The company demurred to the petition because it did not allege the payment, or tender back, to the insurance company of the amount received by the plaintiff under the compromise. This general demurrer was overruled by the court, and then the company answered, denying the fraud. Upon a trial of the case before a jury a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $250. Thereupon the defendant entered a motion for a judgment non obstante veredicto, which was overruled. It also filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled.

The evidence showed without question that prior to the application of Michael J. Quinn for the policy in dispute he had applied to another company for insurance, and had been rejected, and that his answer in the application for the policy under discussion, that he had not been rejected, was untrue, but it did not certainly appear that Quinn had been informed of his rejection. Undoubtedly, if the question was material and the answer untrue, no recovery could have been had under the policy, whether the applicant knew it was untrue or not. Provident Saving Life Association v. Dees, 120 Ky. 285, 86 S. W. 522; Provident Saving Life Association v. Whayne, 93 S. W. 1049, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 160; Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Thompson, 94 Ky. 255, 22 S. W. 87; Union Central Life Insurance Co. v. Lee, 47 S. W. 614, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 889; American Aid Society v. Bronger, 91 Ky. 406, 15 S. W. 1118. Certainly it could not be said that with this fact existing there was not a question of the liability of the company about which reasonable men might differ. This being so, the dispute was one which the parties might compromise. Where such a compromise has taken place, it is immaterial that it should afterwards transpire that one or the other of the parties to the settlement was right. One of the parties to a disputed question of law must always be right; and, if the mere fact that it subsequently developed that one party was right and the other wrong may upset a compromise about it, there could be no basis of compromise of proposed litigation. The rule is that, if there be a question between parties about which reasonable men might well differ as to the outcome, they may adjust it themselves by way of compromise, and this will be upheld by the courts. Mitchell's Heirs v. Long, 5 Litt. 72; American Mutual Aid Society v. Bronger, 91 Ky. 406, 15 S. W. 1118; Creutz v. Hiel, 89 Ky. 429, 12 S. W. 926; Morgan v. Hodges, 89 Mich. 404, 50 N. W. 876, 15 L. R. A. 438; Gray v. United States S. & L. Co., 116 Ky. 987, 77 S. W. 200; Taylor v. Patrick, 1 Bibb, 168; Fisher v. Mays' Heirs, 2 Bibb, 448, 5 Am. Dec. 626.

We are of opinion that the question between appellant and appellee as to the liability of the former under the policy was one about which reasonable men might entertain a substantial doubt; and, this being so, the compromise cannot be said to have been without consideration. The evidence fails entirely to show the slightest fraud or imposition practiced by the company or its agents upon the appellee. As to this, we can accept her own statement. The company had proposed to compromise the matter, and offered her $500, and then she said: "They claimed that, if I didn't take something, it would be one way or the other, and I said, 'You come back to-morrow, and I will make up my mind what I intend to do,' and I asked them if they would give me $750, and they wanted to give it to me willingly, and I accepted it. I did not know whether I was entitled to it, but I thought that I had paid one year's premium and that I was entitled to it. They only intended to give me $500, and the next day I asked them if they would give me $750, and that was the agreement." It thus appears that the agents of the company were only contending for the right of their employer to dispute the validity of Mrs. Quinn's claim under the policy. This they had a legal right to do; and, when they proposed to give her $500, she declined to accept at once, but took time to consider it, and the next day herself offered to take $750 in compromise, and the company acquiesced. She also shows that the agents of the company, when they offered to settle for $500, told her to consider the matter and let them know in a day or two, saying to her that she "might study it up"; that they had come to compromise with her, but they did not intend to pay the full $1,000. A careful reading of Mrs. Quinn's testimony fails to show the alleged fraud or imposition on the part of the company or its agents. It is true she said she had been sick and was incapable of understanding business matters, but her whole testimony clearly refutes this. She was out of bed and received the agents of the company, and the next day after the check was given her she went down personally to her bank and deposited it. Perhaps her attitude towards the matter under discussion and her clear comprehension of the business proposition involved in it is better shown in the following answer than in any other part of her testimony: "Well, when they first came, they did not offer. They said they would not pay the full amount, and I asked them what amount they intended to pay, and one gentleman, I think it was the man from the home office, said he thought $500, and I said 'No,' I would take it to court before I would agree to compromise with them for that. Then they talked different things that had happened, and then I explained that, if they were satisfied to give me $750, I thought I would take it, and I signed the receipt for the full amount, $866." No reasonable mind could conclude after reading the foregoing answer that Mrs. Quinn did not understand and appreciate her legal rights in the matter of the proposed compromise.

In addition to all this, the petition was fatally defective in failing to state that the plaintiff had paid, or tendered back, the amount received under the compromise. This action was instituted to set aside and vacate the compromise for fraud and misrepresentation. In order to accomplish this, it was necessary that she should first tender back the amount she had received. She could not inveigle the company into a compromise and receive its money, and, after having put it to such a disadvantage, sue for the balance of the disputed claim. This was held in the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. McElroy, 100 Ky. 153, 87 S. W. 844; Home Benefit Society v. Muehl, 109 Ky. 479, 59 S. W. 520; Shields v. Lewis, 49 S. W. 803, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1604; Cunningham v. Belknap, 60 S. W. 837, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1582; City of Louisville v. Louisville Railway Co., 68 S. W. 840, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 540; L. & N. R. Co. v. Helm, 121 Ky. 645, 89 S. W. 709; Ingram v. Railway Co., 89 S. W. 541, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 509; McGill v. L. & N. R. Co., 114 Ky. 363, 70 S. W. 1048. These authorities settle the principle quite beyond question. The court, therefore, erred in overruling the general demurrer to the petition because of the failure to allege that the money received by the compromise had been tendered back to the company, and after the verdict the motion of the defendant for a judgment non obstante veredicto should have been sustained. Section 386 of the Civil Code of Practice provides that judgment shall be given for the party whom the pleadings entitle thereto, though there may have been a verdict against him. Under the pleadings the defendant was clearly entitled to a judgment. We are of opinion that there was no evidence of fraud in the obtention of the compromise sought to be set aside, and the matter in dispute was one which legitimately authorized a compromise to be made.

Judgment reversed, with directions to set aside the order overruling the motion for a judgment non obstante veredicto, and to enter a judgment in favor of the defendant dismissing the petition.

ROBINSON v. HUFFMAN et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 13, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 60*)—NOTICE TO OWNER—NECESSITY.

Where one enters into possession with the consent of the owner under the expectation that thereafter a conveyance will be made, the holding is not adverse without notice to the owner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 290; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 42*)—LIMITATIONS.

Where there is an absolute verbal gift of real estate and nothing further is contemplated, the holding of the premises by the donee is adverse from the taking of possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 207; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 13*)—LIMITATIONS.

An owner in fee simple verbally gave land to a daughter, who, with her husband, immediately took possession, erected a dwelling thereon, and lived there continuously for more than 40 years. Subsequently, the owner becoming apprehensive that he would lose his farm, conveyed the same, with such land, to his sons, who subsequently divided the property. The daughter remained in possession, using the property as a home, and exercising ownership, and her right was not challenged for 40 years. Held, that the daughter acquired title by adverse possession.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Daniel Robinson against William Huffman and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Roscoe Vanover and Auxier & Auxier, for appellant. J. S. Cline, J. R. Johnson, and J. M. York, for appellees.

BARKER, J. The appellant, Daniel Robinson, instituted this action against his sister, Hannah Huffman, and her co-appellees, to recover possession of about 20 acres of land in Pike county, Ky., claiming to be the owner and entitled to possession of the property, and that the defendants (appellees) were wrongfully in possession and unlawfully withholding it from him. By answer the appellees denied the ownership and right of possession of the plaintiff, and pleaded title in appellee Hannah Huffman. The title of the latter was alleged to be by verbal gift from her father, Isaac Robinson, who at the time was the owner of it, and also that she was the owner of the title by prescription; adverse possession of 15 years and for 30 years being pleaded. There was also a plea of champerty, but the view we have reached as to the title by prescription makes it unnecessary that we should examine that feature of the defense. All of the affirmative allegations of the answer were denied, and the action transferred to the equity side of the docket, and coming on for trial before the chancellor, he entered a judgment dismissing the plaintiff's petition. The correctness of that judgment is challenged by this appeal.

The crucial facts are not in substantial dispute. Isaac Robinson, the father of appellant, Daniel Robinson, and appellee Hannah Huffman, in 1864, he being then the owner of the fee-simple title of the property, verbally gave it to his daughter, Hannah Huffman. The property, which, as said before, consisted of about 20 acres, was rough mountain land. Appellee and her husband at once took possession of it under the verbal gift, erected a dwelling house thereon, and lived there continuously for more than 40 years. A daughter married the appellee Judge Wright, who, by permission of his wife's parents, built a house on the property, and made it his home. After Isaac Robinson gave the property in question to his daughter, he became indebted, and was apprehensive that he would lose his farm, of which the property here involved was a small part, and he thereupon conveyed it to his sons, Daniel Robinson, and Andrew Robinson, on condition that they would pay off his debts. In the conveyance to his sons, Isaac Robinson included the land in question in the boundary describing the property. Subsequently the sons divided the farm; Andrew Robinson taking that part which was farthest from the property herein involved, and Daniel Robinson taking a conveyance to that part which adjoins the land claimed by his sister. No change in the status of Hannah Huffman was made by these conveyances. She remained in possession, using and occupying the property as a home for herself and family, exercising every dominion of ownership of which the property was susceptible, and her right so to do was not challenged either by her father or her brother, the appellant, during 40 years. It is shown in evidence that a railroad was projected through the property both of Daniel Robinson and his sister, and, although he stood on the record as being the owner of the property claimed by his sister, he declined to sell to the railroad a right of way through her property, but, when she sold a right of way through it, he joined in the deed to the railroad, but allowed her to take all the money without claiming any part of it. We think this evidence establishes in Mrs. Huffman an indefeasible title to the land under both the 15 and 30 years' statutes of limitations as against the appellant.

It is, however, urged with great force and persistence by the appellant that, inasmuch as his sister entered into possession under a verbal gift of the property, she was therefore merely a tenant at will, and was not holding adversely to the father, or, after his death, to her brother, and that, before she could claim to be in adverse possession, she must give notice of such adverse holding. We do not think this principle is applicable to the facts in the case before us. In some of the cases cited this distinction is made: That, where a party enters into possession with the consent of the owner under the expectation that thereafter a conveyance will be made, then the holding is not adverse without notice being brought home to the owner; but where, as in the case at bar, the conveyance of the property is absolute, and nothing further is contemplated or expected to be done, then the holding is adverse from the beginning, the absolute gift by the owner being of itself notice of the subsequent adverse holding of the grantee. It is not contended in this case that the father was afterwards to complete the title by a conveyance in writing; but, as we understand it, the gift was absolute from the beginning. Therefore the statute of limitations commenced to run as soon as the daughter took possession, and ripened into an indefeasible title at the end of 15 years, and certainly at the expiration of 30 years.

The very question we have here arose in the case of Owsley v. Owsley, 117 Ky. 47, 77 S. W. 397. In that case the father had verbally given to his son a large and valuable farm and the two remained living upon this farm together. Many years afterward, owing to a misunderstanding arising from a business transaction, the father undertook to regain the farm from his son, and in the litigation which ensued the son pleaded title by prescription. In the opinion, on the subject in hand, it is said: "It is conceded that by the parol gift no title passed to appellee. Nor did appellant's admission that he had given his son the property, nor did even his oath to that effect in a trial in another case, divest appellant of his title. If that has been done, it is solely because appellee has, by a continuous adverse possession for 15 years, under claim of title, thereby acquired it. It has been decided a number of times by this court that such possession by the donee under a parol gift will ripen into a fee simple title. [Authorities omitted.]” To the same effect are Medlock v. Suter, 80 Ky. 101; Creech v. Abner, 106 Ky. 239, 50 S. W. 58; Thomson v. Thomson, 98 Ky. 435, 20 S. W. 373; Commonwealth v. Gibson, 85 Ky. 666, 4 S. W. 453; Gilbert v. Kelly, 57 S. W. 228, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 353.

Under the principle settled in the foregoing cases, and the facts shown in this record, we have no doubt of the validity of the title of the appellee Hannah Huffman. More than half of the property in dispute was fenced by her, and she claimed the whole by a well-defined boundary; there being a fence erected between appellant's part of the farm and that in dispute. At no time during the long period of possession did the appellant or his vendor, Isaac Robinson, ever demand rent from appellee, or undertake to exercise any ownership over the property she claimed. If her holding was not adverse, and her title by prescription is not established, we are at a loss to know by what facts or what length of time an adverse possession could be shown, or a title by prescription established.

Judgment affirmed.

MATTHEWS' ADM'R v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 20, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 177*)—INJURY TO BRAKEMAN—NEGLIGENCE OF ENGINEER.

The engineer is not shown to have been negligent in backing the engine with some cars into the rest of the train, causing the fall of deceased, a brakeman, standing on one of the cars, though deceased gave a signal to back the train, as H., a fellow brakeman on the ground, who had just coupled the engine to the cars with it, signaled, to go forward, and the engineer obeyed H.'s signal; it not being shown how deceased signaled, or that the engineer saw or could have seen him or his signal, and the engineer testifying that he received no signal to back and did not know deceased was on the car.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 198*)—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

Any negligence of a brakeman in signaling to the engineer to go forward, when he had seen another brakeman give a signal to back, compliance with his signal causing a collision of cars and injury to the other brakeman, was the negligence of a fellow servant of the injured person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 505; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 187*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE.

To make a railroad company liable for injury to a brakeman by the bumping together of parts of a train, causing his fall from one of the cars, it must be shown that the movement of the train was with unnecessary force and not of a usual character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 274, 277; Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The instructions given fairly presenting the law of the case, and, leaving unsaid nothing needed for the guidance of the jury, other requested instructions are properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 539½*)—QUALIFICATION OF EXPERTS.

Men experienced in railroading and the operation of trains and more or less familiar with the accidents incident to railroad life are qualified as experts to express the opinion that the moving forward of a car was the best and safest means of extricating one under its wheels.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2350; Dec. Dig. § 539½.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 126*)—RES GESTÆ.

Where a brakeman was thrown from a car under its wheels, what he said after being taken therefrom to another place, as to how he was injured, is not admissible as part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-376; Dec. Dig. § 126.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE.

Exclusion of evidence of what one, after being taken from under a car to another place, said as to how the accident happened, even if error, was harmless; others having testified to substantially similar statements of his while under the car.

8. TRIAL (§ 41*)—PLACING WITNESSES UNDER THE RULE—DISCRETION.

Allowing a witness to stay in the courtroom to assist in the trial, while others are excluded, under the rule, is in the discretion of the trial court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Webster County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by William Matthews' administrator against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gordon, Gordon & Cox, for appellant. Yeaman & Yeaman and Benjamin D. Warfield, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. On the night of December 14, 1906, appellant's intestate, Wm. Matthews, at the time a brakeman upon one of appellee's trains, fell at Providence, Ky., from a stock car onto the railroad track, and was run over by the front wheels of a flat car, which broke and mangled both of his legs and otherwise injured him to such an extent that he died that night of the accident. He was a married man, 38 years of age, was then earning $60 to $75 per month, and had been in appellee's service as a brakeman about five years. His administrator brought this action to recover of appellee damages for his death. The answer of appellee contained a traverse and charged appellant's intestate with contributory negligence, and this plea was controverted by reply. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee. Thereupon appellant entered motion and filed grounds for a new trial, but the lower court overruled the motion, and this appeal followed.

The train upon which the intestate was a brakeman was a mixed passenger and freight train, and according to the evidence its locomotive, after leaving two freight cars on a side track, went on the house track for the purpose of getting a stock car and flat car that were standing thereon, and, having coupled to these, it moved out toward the main track, but stopped before the flat car, which was in the rear of the stock car, got entirely upon the main track. Immediately following the stop, the engineer, in obedience to a go-ahead signal from the brakeman Holloman, who had done the coupling and was standing on the ground by the flat car, again started the locomotive and two cars attached. At this juncture, the intestate, who was standing on the rear end of the stock car, lost his equilibrium and fell to the ground in front of the flat car, a front wheel of which ran over his legs, crushing them, as previously stated. It further appears from the evidence that, when the intestate realized that he was about to fall from the stock car, he attempted to jump upon the flat car, but was prevented from reaching it by a piece of timber extending across its front at a height of two feet from its floor. The stunning effect of the contact with this cross-bar rendered more certain his fall to the track below. His fellow brakeman, Holloman, upon seeing the intestate in the act of falling, called to him to jump to the flat car, and promptly signaled to the engineer to stop the locomotive; but this could not be done until one of the wheels of the car had passed over his legs. The sudden stopping of the locomotive resulted in a slight rebound of the two cars attached to it, and this caused the wheel of the flat car, which had just run over the intestate's legs, to back against them and upon some of his flesh and clothing, thereby pinioning him to the track. The intestate received some injury to his breast or stomach, evidently caused by his contact with the cross-timber on the flat car, from the brake beam under the car, or by the moving of the car after his fall to enable the train crew and others assisting them to remove his body from the track. It was found by them that the body would have to be released from the pressure of the car wheel before it could be removed from under the car. A brief discussion arose as to the best means of getting the intestate released. One or more favored the use of a "jack" with which to raise the car, but the conductor and others thought a slight forward movement of the car would more quickly and safely accomplish his release, and the latter method was the one adopted. So the car was moved forward, not more than two feet, by the engineer, which released the intestate, who was thereupon carried to a hotel near by, where he remained until his death. We are unable to find from the record that the witnesses disagreed as to the facts thus far stated. There were, however, disagreements as to certain other matters of evidence to which we will later advert.

Appellant's chief complaint is that the trial court erred in instructing the jury, in that they confined appellant's right to recover to the negligence, if any, of appellee's servants in the matter of extricating the intestate's body from beneath the train, and allowed no consideration by the jury of the question of whether his fall from the stock car was caused by their negligence. We are satisfied the court committed no error in the particular indicated. There was no evidence conducing in the slightest degree to prove that the fall of the intestate from the car was caused by negligence on the part of appellee's servants. It is true one or two persons testified that the intestate, while under the car, or near it, and immediately following his removal from beneath it, said he gave a signal to back the train as Holloman, his fellow brakeman on the ground, signaled it to go forward, and that the engineer obeyed Holloman's signal by moving the train forward, which, being unexpected to the intestate, caused him to lose his balance and fall off the car. We may concede that this statement of the intestate was near enough to the accident and sufficiently connected with it to make it a part of the res gestæ; but it shows no negligence on the part of the engineer, for the intestate did not say, nor did any other witness state, that the engineer saw or could have seen a signal given by the intestate, or that the latter was so situated as to enable the engineer to see him. In what way or by what means the intestate signaled the engineer to back the train did not appear even from the intestate's declaration. The engineer testified that he received no signal on that occasion to back the train, and that he did not know the intestate was upon the top of the stock car. He further testified, however, that he received from the other brakeman, Holloman, who had just coupled the locomotive to the stock and flat car, and whom he knew to be then standing on the ground, a signal to move the train forward, which he obeyed. If it could be said that Holloman saw the intestate's signal to back, and was guilty of negligence in giving at the same time a signal to the engineer to go forward, if he did so, appellee would not be responsible for such negligence, as Holloman was a fellow servant of the intestate.

It is likewise true that the evidence failed to show that the engineer was negligent in the manner of moving the train at the time the intestate fell from the car. There was no sudden jerking or other unusual movement of the train. In order to fasten responsibility upon a railroad company for injury to an employé by a fall from its train caused by the movements thereof, it must be made to appear that the movement was one of unnecessary force, and not of a character usual in the operation of such a train. An illustration of our meaning may be found in the case of Yates v. Millers Creek Const. Co., 89 S. W. 241, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 331, wherein it is said: "The fact that there was a sudden or even hard jerk of the tender by the engine does not prove that the engineer or fireman was negligent. * * * The proof wholly fails to show that the jerk that threw the appellant from the tender was not such as usually attends the movement of such a train, or that it was of unusual force, or was caused by any unnecessary force applied to the train through the engine or in the manner of operating it." Cl. N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Jackson, 22 Ky. Law Rep., 58 S. W. 526, 630; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Fox's Adm'r, 42 S. W. 922, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 81. In confining the jury, by the instructions given, to the sole issue as to whether appellee's servants were guilty of negligence in adopting the means used to remove the intestate from beneath the car, after its wheels had broken and mangled his legs, the court granted him all he was entitled to under the pleadings and proof. The instructions were as follows: "(1) Gentlemen of the jury, the court instructs you that the deceased, W. S. Matthews, in entering the employment of the defendant, assumed all the ordinary risks necessarily incident to the character of work in which he was then engaged at the time of his injury, so you will therefore find for the defendant, unless you shall believe from the evidence that after the deceased, W. S. Matthews, was thrown or fell under the car at the time and place mentioned in the evidence, and after his dangerous position was known to defendant's employees in charge of the train, they, the said employees so in charge, could by the exercise of ordinary care have released him from his then position and avoided further injury to him, and if you shall further believe from the evidence that, in attempting to and in releasing said deceased at said time, they failed to use such care, and by reason thereof said deceased was injured by defendant's said employees to such an extent that it directly contributed to or caused his death, then and in that event the law is for the plaintiff, and you should so find, and in your verdict award to the plaintiff such an amount in damages as will fairly and reasonably compensate the estate of said Matthews for the destruction of his power to earn money, not exceeding the sum of $25,000, the amount claimed in the petition. (2) The court further instructs you that unless you shall believe from the evidence that the injury to the deceased, Matthews, that caused, or that directly contributed to, his death, was caused by defendant's employees in charge of said train failing to use ordinary care in removing or releasing said Matthews from under said car after discovering his position, then in that event you will find for defendant. (3) The court further instructs you that, although you may believe from the evidence that when the deceased, Matthews, fell or was thrown under the car, he was in great peril, and that to move the car was not the best or safest way to rescue or remove him, yet if you shall also believe from the evidence that the persons in charge of said train did in good faith, and in accordance with their best judgment, under the circumstances, as they then appeared to them, adopted that method of rescuing or removing him, provided in so doing they used ordinary care, then in that event the defendant is not liable for not having adopted some other method of removing him, and you should so find. (4) The court further instructs you that by 'ordinary care' as used in the foregoing instruction is meant such care as an ordinarily prudent person would usually exercise in like business and under the same or similar circumstances as proven in this case." The instructions fairly presented the law of the case and left nothing unsaid that was needed for the guidance of the jury. If correct in this conclusion, the instructions offered by appellant were properly refused by the trial court.

The testimony with respect to the main issue was conflicting. Without discussing it in detail, that of appellant, though by no means convincing, tended to prove that appellee's servants, by using the "jack" and lifting the end of the flat car, could have readily and quickly released the intestate from his then position without further injury to him; but that the method adopted by appellee's servants for his release—that is, moving the car forward—not only caused additional injury to his legs, but wholly caused the injury to his breast or stomach which resulted from the pressure thereon of the brake beam under the car as it was moved forward; and, further, that these additional injuries certainly hastened, and otherwise directly contributed to, his death. When we turn to appellee's testimony, it throws an entirely different light upon the transaction, and is strongly conduced to establish the following facts: (1) That the bruise or injury to the intestate's breast or stomach was received in falling from the stock car and by his coming in contact with the cross-bar of timber on the end of the flat car; (2) that in view of the excruciating sufferings of the intestate while pinioned to the track by the wheels of the flat car, and the imminent danger of immediate death if not at once released, the moving of the car, in the judgment of appellee's servants, afforded the quickest and safest means of effecting his release, and for these reasons, and none other, the method of moving the car was resorted to; (3) that it would have taken from 10 to 15 minutes to have removed the car from the intestate's body with the "jack," and the operation would have been attended with greater risk and danger to him than by the moving of the car; (4) that in releasing the intestate the car was moved gently and only about two feet, and the removal of the intestate's body from beneath the car was unattended by additional injury to him. Upon these facts and under the instructions copied in the opinion, the case went to the jury, and we are not disposed to say that the verdict was not authorized. On the contrary, we think it supported by the weight of the evidence. Indeed, the evidence as a whole demonstrates the good faith and good judgment of appellee's servants in what they did to release the intestate from the situation of peril and torture in which he had unfortunately been placed by an accident for which neither he nor his fellow trainmen were in any sense to blame.

We find little force in appellant's complaint that appellee's witnesses were not experts, and, consequently, that their expressions of opinion to the effect that the moving of the car afforded the best and safest means of extricating the intestate from his perilous position should have been excluded. The witnesses referred to were men experienced in railroading, in the operation of trains, and more or less familiar with the accidents incident to railroad life. Their testimony amounted to more than a mere expression of opinion, and we think there was sufficient proof of their qualification as experts to entitle them to express an opinion upon the subject in question.

We find no error in the exclusion by the court of the testimony of appellee Howard as to what was said by the intestate after his removal to the hotel in regard to the manner in which his injuries were received. The statement was too remote from the main transaction to constitute a part of the res gestæ. Besides, if its competency were free from doubt, its exclusion could not have been so prejudicial as to authorize a reversal, for it was, at most, but cumulative. Other witnesses testified to substantially similar statements made by the intestate while he was under the car, with respect to the competency of which there can be no doubt.

It is also insisted for appellant that the court, after granting the separation of witnesses on the trial, erred in allowing appellee's conductor, Bramwell, to remain in the courtroom and thereafter to testify as a witness for appellee. It appears that Bramwell was allowed to remain in the courtroom at the request of appellee's counsel, made when the separation of witnesses was ordered, and that he sat with and advised counsel during the trial as the agent or representative of appellee. Doubtless this was, because of his familiarity with the facts of the case. At any rate, it was allowed by the court, and the question of whether he should or should not have been excluded under the rule was a matter of discretion with the trial court, which this court will not attempt to control.

Finding in the record no error that will authorize a reversal, the judgment is affirmed.

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—COLLISION WITH PEDESTRIAN—INSTRUCTIONS—MOTORMAN'S DUTY.

In an action for death of a pedestrian struck by a street car, it is proper to instruct that the motorman was bound to maintain a lookout in approaching the crossing, whether there was evidence of his failure to keep a lookout or not, since it is necessary to define the several legal duties of the motorman.

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—COLLISION—PEDESTRIAN KILLED—INSTRUCTIONS.

Having refused to instruct that, if after plaintiff's intestate saw the street car which killed him approaching, he undertook to cross the track so close to the car that the motorman in using ordinary care and the means at command could not avoid the accident, plaintiff could not recover, it was prejudicial error to fail to instruct that under those circumstances plaintiff could not recover, unless any inability to stop the car was due to any unusual or dangerous speed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County; Common Pleas Branch, Third Division. "To be officially reported."

Action by Frank Byer's administratrix against the Louisville Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed for new trial.

Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh, and Howard B. Lee, for appellant. R. C. & J. J. Davis, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. Appellee recovered of appellant in the court below a verdict and judgment of $3,500 by way of damages for the death of her intestate Frank Byers, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of appellant's servants in operating one of its electric street cars at an unusual and dangerous rate of speed upon and over one of the principal streets of the city of Louisville. The appellant was refused a new trial, and has appealed.

The answer of appellant contained a traverse and plea of contributory negligence. The material facts were that the intestate on Sunday, March 31, 1907, about 1 o'clock p. m., was struck by a passing car of the appellant at the intersection of Shelby and St. Catherine streets as he attempted to cross the street and railway track in front of it. According to the testimony of a nephew of the intestate, he and his uncle had gone from the home of the latter to the corner of Shelby and St. Catherine streets, intending to take a car and ride out to Cave Hill Cemetery. Upon reaching the place for taking the car, the intestate complained of being cold, and proposed to his nephew that they forego the trip to the cemetery and return home, to which the latter consented. They then started home, attempting to diagonally cross the railway track on Shelby street in front of the car, and walk westwardly out St. Catherine street. As they stepped upon the street from the curbing, the car was apparently half a block away, and approaching rapidly. As they got near the track, the intestate and his nephew walked rapidly or ran to get across it ahead of the car. This the nephew, being in the lead, succeeded in doing, but the intestate was less fortunate, and, though nearly across the track, was struck by the west front corner of the car, hurled to the ground, and killed. At the time of the accident there were two policemen and two ladies awaiting the coming of a car, and standing near the corner of Shelby and St. Catherine streets where the cars usually stopped for passengers. As the car by which the intestate was killed approached them, one of the ladies signaled to it with her hand to stop, but it did not do so, or even lessen its speed, but passed on, going a distance of 30 or 40 feet when it struck the intestate. It was explained by appellant's servants on the trial that the car was what is known as an "extra," which was being rushed to one of its crowded lines, and for this reason it made no stops on Shelby street the day of the accident. The four persons referred to for whom the car would not stop testified on the trial that the car was about 30 feet from the place of the accident when the intestate stepped upon the track in front of it. They all agreed, as did the nephew of the intestate, that the car in approaching the place of the accident was running at a speed of 20 or 25 miles an hour, and that it did not slacken its speed before striking the intestate. The nephew, two policemen, and one of the ladies testified that they heard no signal from the gong of the car as it approached the crossing or before the collision with the intestate. The other lady stated positively that no signals were given. On the other hand, the conductor and motorman testified, in substance, that the car was running at a rate of speed not exceeding five or six miles an hour, which was the customary and a reasonable rate of speed for the car to travel; that in approaching the crossing at or near which the collision with the intestate occurred, the motorman kept a constant lookout ahead, and gave repeated and the usual signals with the gong; and that the intestate suddenly, and unexpectedly to the motorman, ran on the track just ahead and within a few feet of the car, whereupon the latter rapidly sounded the gong, immediately applied the brakes, and did everything in his power to stop the car before it struck the intestate, but found it impossible to do so. It is patent from the evidence that the view of the motorman ahead of the car and in the direction of the place of the accident was unobstructed the length of a block or square, and that the decedent could have seen the car the same distance.

It will be observed that the evidence, especially as to the speed of the car, was very conflicting, but the manifest weight of it was to the effect that the car was moved at an unusual and dangerous rate of speed. Moreover, the testimony of appellee's witnesses as to its speed was supported by these significant facts, viz.: That the decedent, who was a large man of 220 pounds weight, was knocked a distance of 25 or 30 feet by the collision, and the car ran 75 feet after the collision before it was stopped. The most reasonable way of accounting for the decedent's going upon the track in front of the car is that he did so supposing the car would stop on the opposite corner to take on the four persons waiting there to enter it, which stop, if made, would have permitted him to cross the track in safety.

It is not contended by appellant that the evidence was not sufficient to take the case to the jury, but insisted that the trial court erred in giving instruction 1, and in refusing to give instruction A, which was asked by it. Instruction 1 is predicated upon the facts alleged in the petition as constituting appellee's cause of action, and, in addition, advised the jury of the duties to be observed by the motorman in order to avoid injury to persons upon or crossing the street car track. It is only that part of the instruction which told the jury it was the duty of appellant's motorman to keep a lookout ahead of the car in approaching the crossing and place of accident at the intersection of Shelby and St. Catherine streets to which appellant objects. This objection is based upon the assumption that there was no testimony introduced that tended to prove that the motorman did not maintain such a lookout at the time of the accident. It is true the motorman claimed to have kept a lookout and that no witness in terms contradicted him on that point, but there were nevertheless certain circumstances established by the evidence from which the jury might have inferred that a proper lookout was not maintained. One of these was that if the car was going only five or six miles an hour as shown by the appellant's testimony, and could, as it further conducted to prove, have been stopped within a distance of 50 feet, and the decedent, as shown by appellee's testimony, was 75 feet from the car after he stepped on the street from the pavement and started to cross the track, and there was nothing to prevent the motorman from seeing him and that his purpose was to cross the track ahead of the car, the failure of the motorman to slacken the speed of the car in approaching him, if it could not be stopped altogether to prevent striking him, affords some basis for the inference that he was not keeping a proper lookout. But, whether there was any evidence of a failure of the motorman to keep a lookout or not, that part of the instruction objected to was nevertheless proper, and it has been repeatedly approved by this court in cases similar to this. Louisville Railway Co. v. French, 71 S. W. 486, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1279; Owensboro City R. R. Co. v. Hill, 56 S. W. 21, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1638; Louisville Railway Co. v. Bossmeyer, 104 S. W. 337, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 998; South Covington & Cincinnati St. Ry. Co. v. Eichler, 108 S. W. 329, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 1309; Louisville Railway Co. v. Hutchcraft, 105 S. W. 983, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 429; Louisville Railway Co. v. Boutellier, 110 S. W. 357, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 484. It is necessary in such cases to define, in instructing the jury, the several duties imposed by law upon a motorman in operating an electric car, and none of these is more important than that of maintaining a proper lookout.

Appellant's second complaint presents a more serious question. Refused instruction A reads as follows: "The court instructs the jury if they believe from the evidence that plaintiff's intestate saw the car with which he collided approaching, and, after seeing the car, undertook to cross the track in front of it, so close to the front end of said approaching car that the motorman in charge of said car could not by the exercise of ordinary care and the means at his command stop said car or check the speed of same in time to avoid colliding with plaintiff's intestate, then the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find." The court gave the usual instructions applicable to a case such as this, including one as to contributory negligence, but the latter was so modified by another instruction as to make it necessary to give one presenting to the jury the question of whether or not the collision of the car with the intestate was accidental and his death an unavoidable casualty; and this aspect of the case instruction A was intended to cover. The trial court properly refused it in the form offered, but it should have instructed the jury upon that feature of the case as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence plaintiff's intestate, when the car with which he collided was approaching, saw it and undertook to cross the track in front of it so close to the front end of such approaching car that the motorman in charge of same could not, after discovering his peril, by the exercise of ordinary care and the means at his command stop said car or check the speed of same in time to avoid colliding with plaintiff's intestate, then the law is for the defendant and the jury should so find, unless they further believe from the evidence that the inability, if any, of the motorman to stop the car, was due to the unusual or dangerous speed at which he was running it, if he was so running it." The failure of the lower court, after rejecting instruction A offered by appellant, to give one expressed as above directed, was prejudicial error, and for that reason appellant should have been granted a new trial.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. BROWN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 19, 1908.)

1. PLEADING (§ 245*)—AMENDMENT DURING TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In a personal injury case the court acted within its discretion in allowing a trial amendment of the petition, alleging plaintiff's injuries to have been "great mental and nervous shock, and was otherwise painfully, physically, and permanently injured and impaired, and damaged," etc., to present the allegations that plaintiff was "frightened and caused to suffer great nervous and mental shock, and was otherwise injured in his back, left leg, and right ankle."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 659; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

2. COSTS (§ 51*)—TRIAL AMENDMENT.

Where a trial amendment of a petition was allowed, but there was no continuance, and defendant lost neither time nor money by the amendment, it was not entitled to the costs of the trial to the time of amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 348*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—FAILURE TO SIGNAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In actions for injuries to travelers at railroad crossings, alleged to have been caused by the failure of those in charge of trains to give the customary crossing signals, negative evidence of the failure to give signals is sufficient as a basis for a verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1141; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

4. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge that, if the jury find for plaintiff, they should award him a sum that would compensate him for mental and physical suffering and for any impairment of his earning power resulting directly from defendant's negligence, is not subject to the objection that it authorizes a recovery for loss of plaintiff's time because of his injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 553; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1060*)—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

In his closing argument plaintiff's counsel said: "Counsel's contention that you cannot find for plaintiff, unless your verdict is based on prejudice against railroad companies, is an insult to your integrity. We want no verdict based on prejudice. We want the same regard for law in this case as prompted another judge of this country to fine a corporation $29,000,000." Held, that the argument was highly improper, but was not prejudicial, where the jury, in view of the reasonable verdict rendered, were evidently not influenced by it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Personal injury action by John Brown, Jr., against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William C. McChord, William W. Spalding, Charles H. Moorman, and Benjamin D. Warfield, for appellant. Hugh P. Cooper, for appellee.

BARKER, J. A passenger train of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company collided with the buggy which appellee was driving on a crossing of the railroad and the Lebanon and Danville turnpike about two miles east of Lebanon. The horse was killed and the buggy wrecked. The appellee, in order to save his life, jumped from the buggy just before the collision, and claims that he received severe personal injuries, either by the fall or by parts of the wrecked buggy striking him, or both. To recover damages for this injury he instituted this action, charging that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the railroad company's employees in charge of the train in failing to give the proper signals for the crossing. The answer denied all the allegations of negligence set forth in the petition and pleaded contributory negligence. A reply completed the issues. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee for the sum of $250.

The appellant complained that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing appellee to amend his petition during the trial of the case. This objection is based upon the following consideration: The original petition alleged the appellee's injuries to have been "great mental and nervous shock, and was otherwise painfully, physically, and permanently injured and impaired, and damaged in the sum of $5,000." The amendment complained of contains the following change in the extent of the injuries: That appellee was "frightened and caused to suffer great nervous and mental shock, and was otherwise injured in his back, left leg, and right ankle." The court was of opinion that the allegations in the original petition were not sufficient to authorize a judgment for damages and so intimated. Thereupon the appellee offered and was allowed to file the amendment, in which he specified particularly the parts of his body that were injured by the alleged wrongdoing of the appellant company. We do not think the court abused its discretion in allowing the amendment, and, if the defendant was surprised or put at a disadvantage by reason of the amendment, it should have moved for a continuance of the case, which would doubtless have been awarded had it been asked for. In the absence of such motion, we feel authorized to conclude that the defendant was not taken advantage of or its substantial rights injured by the filing of the amendment complained of.

It is also urged that the court should have required appellee to pay all costs occurring up to the time of the filing of the amendment. We do not think this position is sound. If the appellant had been surprised, and the court, on its motion, had awarded it a continuance of the case by reason of the filing of the amendment, doubtless the motion to require the appellee to pay the costs of the trial, which was rendered abortive by reason of the filing of the amendment, would have been sustained; but, as the trial went on, there was no reason for requiring appellee to pay the costs. The appellant had lost neither time nor money by the filing of the amendment, and there was no valid ground for changing the rule that the costs should follow the judgment.

It is further urged that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this appeal, that the evidence for the defendant was of a more satisfactory nature than that of the plaintiff. As usual in such cases, the evidence for the plaintiff was of a negative character; the witnesses saying they did not hear the sound of a whistle for the crossing or the ringing of a bell, whereas, the witnesses for the plaintiff stated positively that they heard the bell and the whistle for the crossing. It has been our rule to uphold verdicts based upon this negative kind of evidence; it being generally the best that the plaintiff's case will admit of. Its infirmity grows out of the necessity of the case. The witnesses for the plaintiff in such suits, where they are conscientious, can only say that they did not hear the customary signals, and, as said before, this character of evidence has been uniformly accepted by this court as a satisfactory basis for such verdicts.

The verdict of $250 is not excessive. There was on this point, as on the others, contrariety in the testimony, but, assuming that for the plaintiff to be true, we think the finding of the jury to be within the bounds of reason.

Appellant complains that instruction No. 2 permitted the jury, in estimating the damages sustained by plaintiff, to give him the value of time lost by reason of his injuries, which it insists is unauthorized because lost time was not pleaded. The instruction complained of is as follows: "If you find for plaintiff, you should award him in damages such sum as you believe from the evidence will reasonably and fairly compensate him for any mental and physical suffering, and for any impairment of his power to earn money resulting directly from defendant's negligence, as set out in instruction No. 1, not exceeding $5,000, the amount sued for." We have scanned this instruction in vain to find any language therein which even remotely authorized the jury to estimate the loss of appellee's time by reason of his injuries. The instructions of the court seem to us to have fairly stated the law of the case and fully protected the rights of the appellant.

The misconduct on the part of counsel for appellee in his address to the jury has given us more trouble than any other question raised by appellant. In the closing argument, he said: "Counsel's contention that you cannot find for plaintiff unless your verdict is based on prejudice against railroad companies is an insult to your integrity. We want no verdict based on prejudice. We want the same regard for law in this case as prompted another judge of this country to fine a corporation $29,000,000." This statement to the jury was unwarranted and highly improper, and the trial court should have so told the jury and rebuked counsel for making it; but we do not feel authorized to reverse this case for the failure of the court so to do, for the reason that the jury were evidently in no wise influenced by what was said, although the motive for saying it, as before stated, was highly improper. The object, of course, was to prejudice the minds of the jury against the corporation; but the good sense of the jury, as shown by the reasonableness of the verdict, furnished an antidote for the sinister poison which counsel for plaintiff sought insidiously to instill in their minds.

Upon the whole case, we are unable to find a sufficient reason for reversing the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

IN RE CITY OF NEWPORT.

LICENSES (§ 14*)—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—VEHICLES.

Under Ky. St. 1903, § 3068, subsec. 2, authorizing cities of the second class to license specified vehicles, "and all other vehicles used or let for hire," there is no power to impose a license tax on vehicles not used or let for hire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 25-29; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Proceeding by the City of Newport on petition to test validity of an ordinance. From a judgment sustaining its validity, appeal is taken. Reversed.

Courtland T. Baker, for petitioner.

BARKER, J. This is a proceeding on the part of the city of Newport (second class), under section 3063, Ky. St. 1903 (charter of cities of the second class), to test the validity of a general ordinance requiring licenses for vehicles owned and operated in the municipality. The ordinance provides for a license to be paid by the owner of every kind of vehicle operated over the streets of Newport, whether for hire or for the business or pleasure of the owner. The circuit court upheld the ordinance in all of its parts, except where it provided for a license for the use of vehicles used as a part of the business of the owner. We do not find it necessary to follow the reasoning of the trial judge or counsel for the municipality, as, in our opinion, the merits of the case turn upon a question different from that discussed in the briefs of counsel or the opinion of the lower court.

Subsection 2 of section 3058, Ky. St. 1903 (charter of cities of the second class), provides that the general council of cities of that class shall have power by ordinance, among other things, "to license, tax and regulate * * * livery, board, feed and sale stables, hansoms, cabs, hackney-coaches, carriages, barouches, buggies, wagons, omnibuses, carts, drays, job wagons and all other vehicles used or let for hire. * * *" In the case of City of Covington v. Woods, 98 Ky. 344, 33 S. W. 84, an ordinance of the city of Covington similar in principle to the one before us was under discussion, and it was there held that, under the charter copied above, cities of the second class had power only to license vehicles that were used or let for hire. In the opinion it is said: "The general council must have concluded that the authority had been delegated by the General Assembly to it to impose and collect of the owners of vehicles, regardless of the use to which their vehicles were put, license fees. The act delegated the power to license, tax, and regulate 'livery, board, feed, and sale stables, hansoms, cabs, hackney-coaches, carriages, barouches, buggies, wagons, omnibuses, carts, drays, job wagons and all other vehicles used or let for hire.' The plain words of the statute are decisive of the question as to the kind of vehicles for which license fees were to be imposed and collected. The statute itself furnishes the means of its own exposition, and the intent of the act clearly appears from reading it. If the General Assembly had intended to have delegated the power to the general councils of cities of the second class to collect license fees on all persons plying vehicles on the streets, the qualifying words 'used or let for hire' would not have been used. It would have been easy for the General Assembly to have said all vehicles plying the streets without any particular designation had it not been the purpose to limit the imposition of license fees to vehicles in certain use. The enumerated vehicles are the kind which are usually 'used or let for hire' in cities. To make manifest and certain the kind of vehicles embraced, the act particularly named some and used the general words 'other vehicles' to designate the balance of like character, but all of which must be 'used or let for hire' to authorize the general council to impose the fees. We conclude that the ordinance, in so far as it imposes license fees on vehicles used or let for hire, is valid. In so far as it attempts to impose license fees on vehicles not used or let for hire, it is invalid. The General Assembly did not delegate the power to the general councils of the cities of the second class to impose license fees on vehicles not used or let for hire, and, if the General Assembly has the constitutional right to grant such power (and we do not decide the question, as it is not involved in this case), then the cities of the second class could only exercise it after receiving such grant."

It follows from this authority that the ordinance of the city of Newport, in so far as it imposes licenses on vehicles used or let for hire, is valid, and, in so far as it imposes licenses on vehicles otherwise used, is invalid.

Upon the authority of the case cited, the judgment of the lower court is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

CITY OF NEWPORT v. FITZER.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 19, 1908.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.
 "Not to be officially reported."

The City of Newport prosecuted William Fitzer for violation of an ordinance as to licensing vehicles, and, from a judgment of dismissal, it appeals. Affirmed.

Courtland T. Baker, for appellant. George Veith, for appellee.

BARKER, J. The question involved in this case is similar in principle to that involved in City of Newport (on petition, this day decided) 113 S. W. 467.

As the vehicle owned by appellee was not used or let for hire, the judgment, dismissing the prosecution against him for a violation of the ordinance discussed in the above-mentioned case, is affirmed upon the authority of the opinion therein.

JAMES, Auditor of Public Accounts, v. KENTUCKY REFINING CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. TAXATION (§ 117*)—CORPORATE FRANCHISE—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Ky. St. 1903, § 4077, imposes a franchise tax on every railroad company, press dispatch, telephone, turnpike, palace-car, sleeping-car, and "every other like company" having or exercising any exclusive privilege not allowed to natural persons or for performing any public service. Held, to impose a franchise tax on a corporation manufacturing cotton seed oil and owning tank cars by which such products were transported to its customers by railroads on a mileage basis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 117*)—FRANCHISE TAX—CHARACTER OF BUSINESS.

Where a corporation is engaged in the business of freight carrying, it is subject to a franchise tax imposed by Ky. St. 1903, § 4077, though such business is incidental only to its main activities.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 117*)—FRANCHISE TAX—FRANCHISE.

The term "franchise," as used in Ky. St. 1903, § 4077, imposing a franchise tax on corporations engaged in freight traffic, etc., is not the right to do the thing, but the doing of it in fact, so it was no answer to a corporation's liability for such tax that its engaging in such business was ultra vires.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2929-2941; vol. 8, p. 7666.]

4. TAXATION (§ 117*)—FRANCHISE—TRANSPORTATION BUSINESS—NATURE OF TAX.

The franchise tax imposed by Ky. St. 1903, § 4077, on persons engaged in the transportation business, is not an occupation tax, nor a tax on a mere privilege of engaging in business, but a tax on the business, since the business is not taxed unless property otherwise taxable is employed in the designated occupation; nor is the business taxed independently of, or without reference to, the tangible property to which it is by the statute annexed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 214; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 47*)—DIFFERENT ASSESSMENTS—CORPORATIONS.

Where part of a corporation's capital was engaged in the carrying business, it was liable to taxation on the capital not so employed, as provided by the revenue act of 1906 (Laws 1906, p. 88, c. 22), and also for the franchise tax imposed on persons engaged in such business, by Ky. St. 1903, § 4077; the proper method being to assess separately the tangible property engaged in the carrying business, and then to impose a franchise tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 109; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

Hobson, Lassing, and Barker, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County.

"To be officially reported."

Suit by the Kentucky Refining Company against F. P. James, Auditor of Public Accounts, to restrain the collection of a franchise tax assessed against complainant for the use of tank cars for the transportation of its product. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded with directions.

James Breathitt, Atty. Gen., for appellant. T. L. Edelen and Arthur M. Rutledge, for appellee.

O'REAR, C. J. Appellee is a domestic corporation, whose principal business is the manufacture of oil from cotton seed, the refining and sale of such oil, and dealing in the by-products of the manufacture. It owns and operates 200 or more tank cars for transporting its oil to market and to its customers. The cars are the familiar oil tank railroad cars in general use for transporting oil in large quantities. Appellee used all its cars in its own business. The method is to hire the cars to the transporting railroads at so much per mile; appellee paying the carrier roads their customary rates for hauling its oils. The net result is appellee furnishes cars to the railroad companies which it patronizes in which to carry its oils, thereby engaging to that extent in the business of a carrier. The State Board of Valuations and Assessments required appellee to report its business done as such carrier, as is required of common carriers generally, and thereupon assessed a franchise tax against it based upon the valuation placed by the board upon the franchise it was enjoying in respect to such business of furnishing these special freight cars for the transmission of freight traffic.

The statute under which the State Board of Valuations and Assessments proceeded is section 4077, Ky. St. 1903, which reads as follows: "Every railway company or corporation, and every incorporated bank, trust company, guarantee or security company, gas company, water company, ferry company, bridge company, street railway company, express company, electric light company, electric power company, telegraph company, press dispatch company, telephone company, turnpike company, palace-car company, dining-car company, sleeping-car company, chair-car company, and every other like company, corporation or association, also every other corporation, company or association having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service, shall, in addition to the other taxes imposed on it by law, annually pay a tax on its franchise to the state, and a local tax thereon to the county, incorporated city, town and taxing district, where its franchise may be exercised. The auditor, treasurer, and Secretary of State are hereby constituted a board of valuation and assessment, for fixing the value of said franchise, except as to turnpike companies, which are provided for in section 4095 of this article, the place or places where such local taxes are to be paid by other corporations on their franchise, and how apportioned, where more than one jurisdiction is entitled to a share of such tax, shall be determined by the board of valuation and assessment, and for the discharge of such other duties as may be imposed on them by this act. The auditor shall be chairman of said board, and shall convene the same from time to time, as the business of the board may require. (Assessment of franchises in first and second class cities, sec. 2984a.)"

This suit was brought and successfully maintained in the circuit court for an injunction against the state board staying it from proceeding to collect the franchise tax so assessed. It is conceded by the state that, if appellee is liable for the franchise tax, it is because it is a like company to some of these enumerated in section 4077, Ky. St. 1906, supra. A very similar question came before this court in the comparatively recent case of Louisville Tank Line v. Commonwealth, 128 Ky. 81, 98 S. W. 635. In that case the appellant owned a number of cars identical with those owned by appellee. It rented them all to one customer—an oil refining company—who used them in its business precisely as appellee does. The question was whether that appellant was liable to pay the franchise tax laid by section 4077, Ky. St. 1906. We held that it was; that it was a like company to palace-car and dining-car companies. It is claimed by appellee in the argument in this case that the Louisville Tank Line Case is not in point, and may be differentiated from this one because in the former the business of the company was to own and lease such cars for the accommodation of freight traffic, while here the owning and using such cars by appellee was a mere incident to its business; but we fail to see that it makes any difference whether the business of engaging, though partially, in the traffic of freight carrying, is the main or incidental business of the persons exercising such franchise, for a person who is a taxpayer may be engaged, in any number of occupations, any or all of which may be connected, yet some of them be of a character that a license tax to conduct them might be lawfully exacted by the state.

Appellee also contends that its charter does not authorize or permit it to engage in the business of a carrier, or in any business save that mentioned in its articles of incorporation; that therefore it does not exercise the franchise sought to be taxed. The franchise spoken of by this statute is not the right to do the thing, but the doing of it. The state does not seek by this section to tax the right to do it. It fixes a value upon the privilege which has been enjoyed, and taxes that value as property of the person who has exercised the privilege. The right to be a corporation is one thing; the fact that the corporation actually engages in a certain business, or enjoys a privilege peculiar to such business, is or may be quite a different thing. The legislative purpose was to classify certain kinds of employment, which upon an examination of the statute will be seen to have been all of a kindred nature—it was the serving of the public in some sense. It does not appear to us to be material whether the person exercising the privilege engaged in it as a sole occupation or not. Indeed, several of those named in the statute may be lawfully exercised by a single corporation, a firm, or a single individual, such, for example, as electric light companies and water companies. Yet if such was the case, and in addition the same concern manufactured and sold ice, or even if the latter were its principal business, it would not be excused from paying not only one but two franchise taxes; one upon its business as an electric light company, and another upon its business as a water company. At the same time, it would be taxable as a corporation, firm, or natural person, as the case might be, upon its property employed in the manufacture of ice. Such, indeed, has been done under statutes not dissimilar to the ones now in existence as to a corporation which did both an insurance and a guaranty company business. Fidelity & Casualty Company v. Coulter, 115 Ky. 806, 74 S. W. 1053. While by statute in this state railroad companies may not engage in any other business, nor may banks, yet, where the statutes are silent upon the subject, we apprehend a corporation may be empowered by its charter to engage in several different kinds of business. Then, if it did, such as has been supposed above, and including electric power and gas, could it be maintained that such concern should pay but a single franchise tax; whereas, under the statute, it might be subject to four if each business were treated separately? Or that it should pay none, if perchance it also did a business not enumerated as liable to a franchise tax, and made that business its principal business?

Such favoritism, such incentive to the concentration of so-called public enterprises in one hand, could not have been the legislative purpose. Equality before the law is the great aim of an enlightened and free commonwealth. Particularly is this so with respect to the tax gathering function of government. To that end classification of subjects of taxation is attempted. Some classifications deal with persons, others with property, and still others occupations. If a single taxpayer should fall within several instead of a single classification, it would argue nothing against the validity of the tax, nor necessarily bring it into repugnance with the Constitution upon the ground that it was double taxation. An examination of section 4077, Ky. St. 1903, shows a classification of certain kinds of business, engaging in any of which is deemed the exercise of such a privilege as that it is reckoned as property, because it gives to the more familiar forms of property employed in the business a peculiar earning value which it would not otherwise have. It is not the mere privilege of doing the thing, but it is the value of the property so employed enhanced by the manner of its employment, which the Legislature has named a franchise for taxing purposes, and taxes it as a separate value of the property. Commonwealth v. Ledman, 106 S. W. 247, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 452. It will be observed it is never taxed unless property otherwise taxable is employed in the designated occupations; nor is it ever taxed independently of, or without reference to, the tangible property to which it is by this statute annexed. It is therefore not an occupation tax, as that term is used in law generally, and for the same reason is not a tax upon the mere privilege of engaging in the business. Among the subjects so classified by this statute is that of carriers of freight and passengers by means of railroads, and their various equipages. If the carrier is a railroad company, its designation is clear, and its liability under the statute not disputed; but railroad companies are known to be not the only common carriers of freight and passengers by the use of railway facilities. Express companies, not owning either tracks, locomotives, or cars, are yet such carriers. Hence they are included. Palace-car companies, owning cars, but neither tracks nor locomotives, are consequently included. Dining-car companies, which may be mere renters of cars, or for that matter caterers upon cars owned and operated by any of the other carrier companies, are so included. It has been held under this statute that a railroad company operating over tracks not owned nor used exclusively by it was subject to the tax, and by like reasoning if it also leased its cars, instead of owning them, it would seem to be liable. It has also been held that a railroad company owning a track but no equipage was liable where its track was leased to and used by another company by perpetual lease. Illinois Central R. R. Co.

v. Commonwealth, 108 S. W. 245, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 1112. And as we have seen in the Louisville Tank Line Case, supra, a concern which owned cars but did not operate them leasing them all to one customer, was liable to the tax. The idea seems to us to be a simple one. The business of carrying freight or passengers upon railroads was deemed to impart a peculiar and special value to all the physical property so employed. Therefore the special value so added was to be assessed and taxed. By whosoever owned whether operated by the owner or not, if engaged in the carrying business, it falls within the statutory classification. If it does much or little, yet does bear some of the burden and enjoy some of the profits of railway commerce, it is so classified, and must be taxed upon the franchise thereby imparted to it and enjoyed by its owner. For these reasons, in addition to those advanced in Louisville Tank Line v. Commonwealth, supra, we hold that appellee is a like company to those carrier companies named in the statute.

Appellee complains that it reported under the Morris Bill (Revenue Act 1906, Laws 1906, p. 88, c. 22) and was assessed and paid a license tax for the year in suit (1907) upon its capital. It or the taxing officers, one or all, may have erred, but that will not prevent a correct application of the law when invoked by the taxing power. Doubtless, credit may be had on the tax now sought to be enforced for any excess, if there was any, so paid on the other assessment, for appellee was undeniably liable on its capital for the tax due under the act of 1906, so far as the capital was not employed in this carrying business. To the extent it was so employed, it seems the correct method is to assess separately the tangible property so employed, and then in addition the franchise tax discussed.

We will notice, in closing, a final argument made by appellee; that is, that it was carrying its own goods, in its own cars, to its own customers, and was not in any sense a common carrier, and that many concerns, such for example as coal mines, quarries, and the like, have tramroads upon which they operate their own cars and motive power in transporting their own property to connecting railroads. Such illustrations may be carried to even greater extreme, and might include the use by a man of his own well bucket. None of these illustrations seem to us to embarrass the question. The legislative classification dealt with the carrying business. That is commonly understood, and the Legislature consequently must have meant to deal with such traffic after it had become a part of the general volume. It was dealing with the tracks and vehicles engaged in that business. It knew they had an exceptional value because they were so engaged, and that value, wherever found, was intended to be taxed separately as part of the owner's property.

We think the learned trial court erred in his construction of the statute.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

HOBSON, J. (dissenting). Appellee manufactures oil from cotton seed. When oil is manufactured, it must be placed in some vessel for delivery to the customer. To deliver its oil to its customers, appellee uses large tanks, and, as these tanks are too large to be shifted from car to car, it owns cars on which its tanks are carried; the railroad company using its cars and charging it for hauling them. It is not in the carrying business, it only delivers the oil it makes to its customers, and it has adopted this method of delivery by means of tanks on cars because more convenient. By the revenue act of 1906, the manner of assessing certain corporations is provided by section 1, art. 4 (Laws 1906, p. 126, c. 22). The manner of assessing all other corporations is regulated by article 11. It is insisted that appellee is one of the corporations to be assessed under section 1, art. 4. That section names 20 kinds of corporations. It includes, also, "every other like company, corporation or association," and "every other corporation, company or association having or exercising any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons or performing any public service." It is conceded that appellee is not one of the 20 corporations named. It is also conceded that appellee neither has nor exercises any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, and that it performs no public service; but it is insisted that it is a like company, corporation, or association to those named, and this is the only question in the case. Section 1, art. 4, is verbatim the same as section 4077, Ky. St. 1903. The opinions of this court construing that section are therefore applicable. In Aetna Life Insurance Company v. Coulter, 115 Ky. 801, 74 S. W. 1050-2, this court in determining what was a like company or corporation, said: "In determining the meaning of the word 'like' in this section, we must follow the rule noscitur a sociis. All the 20 named corporations have special or exclusive privileges or franchises not allowed by law to natural persons. The word 'like' must be read not only in connection with the preceding words, but with the following clause. The likeness which the Legislature had in mind is in having or exercising some special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing some public service. In Levi v. Louisville, 97 Ky. 406, 30 S. W. 976, 28 L. R. A. 480, this court said that the board of valuation was created 'to value every and all corporations, associations or companies having or exercising any special privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons.' And in Board of Councilmen of City of Frankfort v. Stone, 108 Ky. 400, 58 S. W. 679, the court said: 'The franchise primarily in view under section 4077, Ky. St. 1903, is any special or exclusive privilege not allowed by law to natural persons.' In the interpretation of all statutes levying taxes, a cardinal rule is that their provisions are never extended by implication beyond the fair meaning of the terms used, and in every case of doubt they are construed more strongly against the government, and in favor of the taxpayers, because burdens are not to be imposed unless the intention of the Legislature to impose them is distinctly shown." In the case of Fidelity & Casualty Company v. Coulter, 115 Ky. 809, 74 S. W. 1054, the court, having the same question before it, again said: "A company which is in name an insurance company, but is doing a guarantee or security business in this state, is a like corporation, within the meaning of section 4077, Ky. St. 1903, and is therefore embraced by it."

It is manifest that, if what the court said in these cases is still recognized as the law of the state, appellee cannot be held assessable under article 4, for, if the likeness which the Legislature had in mind is in "having or exercising some special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons or performing some public service," it must be admitted that appellee is not a like corporation, as manifestly it exercises no special or exclusive privilege and performs no public service. The rule referred to in these opinions that taxes are never levied by implication, and that tax laws are construed more strongly against the government, is universally held, and to hold appellee a like corporation to those named in the statute is entirely to ignore this principle of construction as well as the rule of noscitur a sociis. By section 6 of article 4, every natural person engaged in the business of any of the corporations named in the first section of the article is required to be assessed and taxed as the corporations therein named. In Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Company v. Commonwealth, 106 Ky. 165, 49 S. W. 1069, 57 L. R. A. 33, it was pointed out that the purpose of the Legislature in this provision was to reach persons or associations having or exercising some special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons or performing some public service. In other words, what the Legislature had in mind was the taxation in a certain way of public service corporations, and it provided that any association or person engaged in the business of any of these corporations should be taxed in the same way. In the case of the Tobacco Warehouse Company and in Marion National Bank v. Burton, 90 S. W. 948, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 870, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 947, the court said: "From these provisions it is manifest that the so-called franchise tax is in reality a property tax upon all the intangible property of the corporations named in this act." In Standard Oil Company v. Commonwealth, 119 Ky. 79, 82 S. W. 1021, the court said: "Franchise taxes are collected, but they are imposed only on the tangible property of those corporations classed as public service corporations, or such as enjoy special or exclusive privileges not allowed by law to natural persons. Section 4077, Ky. St. 1903. Mere trading corporations are not included."

Appellee is a mere trading corporation. It is not in any sense a public service corporation. The Legislature named in section 4077 palace-car companies, sleeping-car companies, dining-car companies, and chair-car companies, and then it added the words, "and every other like company." What it had in mind was that there might be other car companies like those named performing public service. It did not have in mind taxing transportation in a peculiar way, simply because the goods were transported in a car, rather than a wagon. If the aeroplane should be made a success, and a company should be organized to carry goods through the air, it would be a like company to those named; but the farmer who brings his hay to market in his wagon is not engaged in the business of any of the corporations named in the first section of the article. As far as this act goes, there can be no valid distinction between the farmer who hauls his hay to market in his own wagon, and the appellee who hauls its own oil to its customers in its own tank; one is no more within the spirit of the statute than the other. Drummers now travel with a large assortment of trunks, and when they get to a town they hire a room and display their samples. If a large house should own a car in which these samples were displayed, and, instead of the expense of hauling the trunks and opening and displaying the samples at every town, should send a drummer out in a car and let him use the car to display his samples, would it be contended that that firm or company should be taxed under article 4? If a farmer ran 100 of his own wagons hauling his own hay, or a mercantile house put out 500 drummers in such cars with its own samples, would it affect the application of the statute? In other words, does the operation of the statute depend on the quantity of his own goods the owner hauls? If so, where will you draw the line? And by what authority do you draw it there? Again, a great many men own private cars in which they take trips from time to time, and in which they live more or less while on the journey, and carry no little freight and baggage. Nearly all circuses that travel through the country now own their own cars and simply hire the railroads to pull them. Not a few theatrical companies travel in the same way. But did any one ever suppose that these people were in the transportation business within the meaning of article 4? A large number of the coal mines of the state are operated by the owners, who bring out the coal in cars to a tippie, which is sometimes several miles from the mouth of the mine. Are these people in the transportation business, and to be taxed under article 4? And, if not, why not, if appellee may be taxed? No distinction can be made which rests on the size of the vehicle or the fact that it runs on a track. A corporation doing a public service business would fall under the statute, though it used vehicles smaller than the farmer's wagon and requiring no track to run on. The distinction must rest on the character of the business, and to say that the statute applies to all those engaged in the business of carrying their own goods is entirely to abandon the position heretofore expressly held by the court that it applies only to public service corporations, and to make it include practically not only all industrial corporations, but the majority of natural persons engaged in the business of producing. If appellee is taxable under the statute, why must not the grocer who delivers his goods to his customers in his wagons be taxed under it? The court undertakes to lay down no rule by which in future it may be determined how a given corporation may be taxed, and if the rule heretofore laid down by the court is discarded, and it is held that the statute includes now the carrying business and all carrying of goods either by the owner or by anybody else, who is it that will be exempt from the operation of this section, for who does not carry his own goods? The court cannot mean to say that the statute has any special reference to carrying by a car, rather than in any other vehicle, for certainly a corporation who carried in automobiles or launches for the public would be a like company to those named in the statute. The application of the statute cannot depend upon the character of vehicle used, and, if it does not depend upon this, where can you draw a line when you discard the rule which the court has heretofore laid down?

The case of Louisville Tank Line v. Commonwealth, 123 Ky. 81, 93 S. W. 635, lends no support to the opinion. The appellant in that case was organized to operate as a carrier tank cars. It had a special franchise. It was a public service corporation, organized for this purpose and enjoying all the privileges of such a corporation. It was not engaged in carrying its own goods. It was carrying the goods of others. When a corporation is engaged in the carrying business, it is immaterial under the statute whether it carries for 1 person or 50. The whole oil trade of the state is now in the hands of the Standard Oil Company, and to have exempted the Louisville Tank Line from the statute would have been to allow the application of the statute to depend on the number of persons engaged in the oil business. The holding that the Louisville Tank Line, which is a public service corporation, is taxable under the statute, is no authority for holding that appellee, a mere private corporation, may be so taxed. As this court has heretofore expressly held, appellee is not a like company because it transports goods on cars as the tank line transports them. The likeness the statute refers to is likeness in serving the public, not in the manner the goods are transported. So a carrier company which carried in the air or in pneumatic tubes under the ground would be a like company, if it had a franchise to carry and was a public service corporation. The likeness is in having the franchise to serve the public or being in the business of serving the public.

Heavy penalties are provided in article 4 for disobedience of its provisions. It is important therefore that people should know for certain who comes under this article, so they may not incur the penalties. This court, that nobody might suffer, undertook to lay down a broad general rule to define who comes under it, declaring that it embraced only the public service companies. When that rule is now departed from, who can tell what persons who trusted the rulings of this court for their guidance will suffer? And when the court thus abandons the rule itself declared, and disregards its own decisions, how is business to be conducted?

For these reasons I dissent from the opinion of the court.

BEARD v. MASON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov 19, 1908.)

EASEMENTS (§ 26*)—RIGHT OF WAY—GRANT—CONSTRUCTION.

A purchaser of land excluded from any public highway acquired a right of way over adjacent land to a turnpike on condition that the right should cease on the way ceasing to be the only outlet to a public highway. Subsequently the purchaser acquired other land between his land and a public road, but the deed reserved to the grantor a strip which was the only outlet to the public road. Held, that the purchaser's right in the right of way over the adjacent land was not terminated by his failure to purchase the entire tract so as to acquire an outlet to a public highway, not being a fraud on the rights of the adjacent landowner.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Owen County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by F. M. Mason against J. T. Beard. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Vallandingham and H. W. Alexander, for appellant. John W. Douglas, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Plaintiff, F. M. Mason, instituted this action against defendant, J. T. Beard, to enjoin him from closing the passway leading from plaintiff's farm to Lusby's mill and Corinth turnpike. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Andrew Beard, the father of Noah Beard, owned a farm consisting of about 74 acres of land, most of which was situated in Grant county, Ky., about one-half mile from any public road. Between it and Lusby's mill and Corinth turnpike road lay the farm of appellant, who is a brother of Noah Beard. Appellant's farm is situated in Owen county, Ky. Andrew Beard had made an oral gift of the 74-acre farm to his son, Noah, who desired to sell it to one Marine A. Ireland. Ireland would not purchase the farm unless Noah Beard procured for him the right of way over the land of his brother, J. T. Beard, the appellant herein, to the said turnpike road. This Noah Beard succeeded in doing by means of the following writing:—"August 20th, 1890. I, J. T. Beard, hereby guarantee unto Marine Ireland and his successor a private passway ten feet wide through my farm beginning in or near a drain in said Ireland's line and following in the same to the site of the old Horton house, thence along the brink of the right bank of the right prong of said drain to the Lusby's Mill and Corinth Turnpike. Said Marine Ireland and his successors bind themselves to keep a gate in good repair at each end of said passway and to close the same after them. Said J. T. Beard and his successors reserve the right to put one or more intermediate gates across said passway and bind themselves to keep same in good repair and said Marine Ireland and his successors bind themselves to keep the said intermediate gates closed after them. For and in consideration of said guarantee, I have received of Noah Beard, the predecessor of said Marine Ireland to the ownership of the tract of land for which said passway is intended, the sum of fifty dollars. If at any future time said passway should cease to be the only outlet to a public highway for the owners of said land; or should said Marine Ireland and his successors fail to comply with the spirit of this guarantee and agreement, then the same becomes null and void. [Signed] J. T. Beard. Marine Ireland." Marine Ireland subsequently purchased the 74 acres of land, which is known as the "Beagle land." Thereafter he conveyed the same to Joseph Beagle, and the latter sold the same on September 27, 1902, to appellee, F. M. Mason. On the 9th day of April, 1906, the appellee purchased from his sister and her stepdaughters, Mollie and Zula Barnes, the tract of land known as the "Barnes land," lying between said Beagle tract and the public road. The deed to appellee contained the following reservation: "Six feet of land is hereby reserved to Zula Barnes and Mary Barnes between the F. M. Mason tract of land, formerly Joe Beagle tract, and said land herein conveyed." After the purchase of this land by appellee, appellant closed up the passway in dispute.

It is the contention of appellant that the reservation in the deed above referred to is a violation of the spirit of the contract securing the passway, and is in fraud of appellant's rights. From the testimony it appears that, prior to the purchase of the Barnes farm by appellee, appellant stated to him that, if he bought the Barnes farm, he (appellant) would close up the right of way. Appellee replied that, if he did buy it, he would not buy it all. In giving his evidence, appellee frankly admitted that the passway in dispute was of great value to the Beagle tract of land, and that he would not have purchased the Barnes farm if it necessitated the loss of the passway over appellant's land. Indeed, he states that the very purpose of the reservation in the deed was to prevent his losing the passway. His vendors both state that he said he would not purchase the land if he had to give up the passway in dispute. It seems that the Beagle farm adjoins Barnes' farm. The strip six feet wide, reserved to Mollie and Zula Barnes, lies between the Beagle tract and the Barnes farm, and there is no outlet from the Beagle tract to the public road, except by the passway in dispute, unless appellee has the right to cross the six feet reserved in the deed to his grantors. It must be admitted that appellee was under no legal obligation to acquire another passway from the Beagle tract of land. It was entirely a matter of discretion with him whether he would acquire the passway or not. In making the purchase he had a right to buy all of the land, or any portion thereof which he saw fit. Being under no obligation to acquire all of it, his failure so to do could not constitute a fraud upon appellant's rights. If the contract provided that, if the owner of the Beagle tract should ever have an opportunity to acquire another outlet to the public road and should fail to do so, appellant might close the passway in dispute, there might be some merit in appellant's contention. But this is not the effect of the contract actually made. It simply provides that if, at any future time, said passway should cease to be the only outlet to the public road, or should said Marine Ireland and his successors fail to comply with the spirit of the guaranty and agreement, then the same should become null and void.

The only real question in the case, therefore, is whether or not appellee has acquired another outlet to a public highway. He has testified unequivocally to the fact that his grantors owned the strip of land six feet wide lying between the Beagle tract and the Barnes farm. His grantors testified to the same fact. The reservation in the deed is plain and certain. Manifestly, therefore, appellee has acquired no right of passway over the six feet of land lying between the two farms. That being the case, appellant had no right to close up the passway in dispute.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County; Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Louis Weil against the Lorts & Frey Planing Mill Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gibson, Marshall & Gibson, for appellant; Alfred & Joseph Selligman, for appellee.

NUNN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Jefferson circuit court, which was rendered upon a verdict of a jury awarding appellee $500 in damages on account of personal injuries received by him.

Appellants contend that the judgment should be reversed. First, for the reason of unavoidable accident and surprise, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against; second, because of newly discovered evidence showing that the injuries for which appellee recovered damages were not the result of the accident set out in the petition, but had existed for many years prior thereto; third, because the court erred in giving instruction No. 4 to the jury, which allowed them to assess damages against appellants for injuries which he did not allege in his petition that he received; fourth, the court erred in refusing to grant appellant Fred Bicker a peremptory instruction at the close of appellee's testimony, and at the close of all the testimony when it failed to connect Bicker with the accident in any way; and, fifth, because the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence and is contrary to law. We will consider these questions in the order stated.

In order that the reasons assigned for reversal may be understood, we will first state the issues formed by the pleadings and the substance of the facts produced upon the trial. The petition, in substance, charges: That Lorts & Frey Planing Mill Company and Fred Bicker, appellants, in November, 1905, were engaged in erecting a dwelling house for the defendant Bicker; that a joist was placed at the kitchen door to be used for ingress and egress; that appellants carelessly and negligently failed to secure the same properly; that appellee, who was an employé of appellants, necessarily used the same in the performance of the labor he was employed to do; and that while using same it fell and turned, throwing him, whereby he received severe and permanent injuries. The allegations of negligence were made against both Bicker and the company jointly. The answer denies only so much of the petition as states the acts of negligence and the extent of the injuries, and by an affirmative defense pleads contributory negligence on the part of appellee, which was denied by reply. The proof showed that appellee was an assistant or helper to the plumber who had the contract to do that part of the work. The kitchen door at the back part of the building was elevated considerably above the ground, and a joist about 16 feet long, about 12 inches wide, and 2 inches thick, was placed by appellants, or some one in their employ, extending from the kitchen door to the ground, to enable persons laboring for them to pass into and out of the building. Some stobs were placed in the ground at the end of the joist to hold it in place, and the other end of the joist was placed in the door about the center. Appellee passed into the building, in the performance of his work, and after remaining there a few minutes was ordered by his foreman to go to the cellar, which was under the kitchen, and in passing through the kitchen door to go to the cellar he stepped upon this joist, which turned and went down, throwing him to the rock and cellar below, from which he received severe injuries. The evidence for appellee shows that the stob at the end of the joist had been removed, or the joist had been removed from the stobs, after he had entered the building and before he started to the cellar. That of appellants shows that the end of the joist at the kitchen door had been changed and placed outside of and near the door while he was in the building. The court gave to the jury several instructions. The only one complained of by appellants in the brief of the counsel is the fourth.

Appellants contend that they were taken by surprise on the trial by appellee's testimony in regard to the character and extent of his injuries; that it was alleged in the petition: That, as a result of his fall, "the tendons, ligaments, and muscles of his limbs have been permanently weakened, and their strength impaired. That he suffered great physical and mental pain by reason thereof, and his power to earn a living had been greatly and permanently impaired." That on the trial appellee testified that his limbs between the ankle and knee were severely injured. That abscesses had formed which had to be lanced five or six times. That he suffered great pain for several months. That the ligaments in one of his feet, which held the instep in a curved position, were severed, which caused the instep to drop, which produced what is known as "flatfoot." This last statement, appellants claim, surprised them. That they had no reason to anticipate that any such injury would be claimed by appellee. That it was only claimed in the petition that his legs were injured. Appellants did not, when this evidence was introduced, claim that they were surprised and asked a discharge of the jury and for a continuance of the case, nor did they make any objection to the testimony, and made no mention of it until they filed grounds for a new trial. We are of the opinion that appellants had no reason to be surprised at the introduction of this testimony, because, while the word "foot" does not specifically appear in the petition, it was alleged that his limbs were injured, and the word "limb" includes from the hip to the sole of the foot. Appellants knew when they entered the trial that appellee would claim his injuries to be as stated by him in his testimony, for they took his deposition, by way of cross-examination, several days before the trial was entered into, in which he gave his injuries as stated by him in his testimony on the trial, to wit, that his right foot had been permanently injured and made flat by the fall.

With reference to the second ground assigned for reversal, to wit, newly discovered evidence: It appears that appellants filed the affidavits of four persons who stated, in substance, that appellee was lame from a prior injury received by him, and that he had the "flatfoot" before he received the injuries complained of. Appellee produced as many or more affidavits showing that this was untrue. This court will not disturb the action of a lower court in granting or refusing a new trial, unless it appears that the lower court abused its discretion in the matter, and we are of the opinion that this was not done in the case at bar. It is a general rule that, to entitle a party to a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it must be of such permanent and unerring character as to preponderate greatly, or have a decisive influence upon the evidence to be overturned by it. See Allen v. Perry, 6 Bush, 85; Price v. Thompson, 84 Ky. 219, 1 S. W. 408; Leonhart v. Stalzenberger, 7 Bush, 209.

What we have said, in effect, disposes of appellants' objection to instruction No. 4. Their objection to this instruction is based upon the ground that by it the court allowed the jury to find for appellee for any injuries received as a result of his fall, and that this instruction allowed him to recover for injuries to his foot which he had not alleged in his petition.

With reference to the fourth ground for reversal—the failure to give an instruction requiring the jury to find for Fred Bicker, because the evidence failed to connect him with the accident in any manner whatever—it is only necessary to say that the allegations of negligence in the petition were made against both Bicker and his coappellant jointly. By appellants' answer they denied the negligence and the extent of the injuries, but it was not denied that they were engaged in a joint enterprise in the erection of the building. There was no claim by Bicker in his pleadings or evidence that his co-defendant was an independent contractor. That question was not raised until the brief for appellants was filed, which was too late. He should have denied, by a pleading, that he had anything to do with the erection of the building, and have alleged that he let the construction of the building to an independent contractor, and made the necessary allegations, to have relieved himself from all liability for negligence on the part of the contractor.

Finally, appellants claim that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the verdict. It is admitted that appellee was a laborer of appellants in the erection of this house. The law required appellants to keep the place, at which appellee was laboring, in a reasonably safe condition, and this it could not delegate to other servants. This was required of the master. Clay City Lumber & Stave Company v. Noe, 76 S. W. 195, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 668. The joist prepared for appellee to use while laboring for appellants was the thing that caused his injury, and the question of appellants' negligence with reference to it was submitted to the jury, and it found against appellants, and we do not feel disposed to disturb the finding thereon.

Finding no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of appellants, the judgment is affirmed.

GAMBRELL v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 19, 1908.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 234*)—MURDER—EVIDENCE—CONSPIRACY.

In a murder case evidence held to show that there was a conspiracy among accused and his brothers to kill decedent, and that in pursuance of it, and while it existed, decedent was killed by one or more of them; all of them acting at the time in concert.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 423*)—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS AND ACTS OF CONSPIRATORS.

After a conspiracy is formed and exists, each conspirator is responsible for what the others do in the prosecution of their common design, and, in a prosecution of one conspirator for a murder which was the object of the conspiracy, it was competent to show the cause of ill feeling between the conspirators and decedent, threats by them and their hostile declarations, purchase of cartridges by certain of them, and every circumstance that tended to throw light upon their acts in furtherance of the common design.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 112*)—SELF-DEFENSE—NATURE OF DEFENSE.

The necessity at the particular moment to take his adversary's life will not justify a killing, if he himself was the wrongdoer or the aggravating cause of the difficulty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 145-150; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 112*)—RESULT OF CONSPIRACY—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where two or more combine to kill another, and, in pursuance of the conspiracy, seek him out and kill him, or provoke an assault and then take his life, neither of the conspirators can rely upon the plea of self-defense; but, though a person was killed pursuant to a conspiracy, and while it existed, no one of the conspirators sought him out for the purpose of killing him, or provoked the difficulty resulting in his death, or first attacked him, then any one of them could avail himself of the plea of self-defense.

CARROLL, J. The two principal questions in this case are: First, whether there was sufficient evidence to establish the existence of a conspiracy between Allen Gambrell and his codefendants to take the life of John Gambrell, and whether, in pursuance of such conspiracy, and while it existed, his life was taken; and, second, does the existence of a conspiracy, and a homicide as the result of it, operate to deprive the accused of the right to rely upon the plea of self-defense?

The appellant and his brothers, Silas, Rice, Tom, and Nelson, were jointly indicted, charged with the murder of John Gambrell. The indictment contains several counts, in one of them accusing all of them of unlawfully, maliciously, and willfully confederating and conspiring together to kill John Gambrell, and of committing the crime in pursuance of the conspiracy and while it existed. In others, it charges each of them individually with the murder, and the others with aiding, abetting, and assisting in its commission. The appellant was tried separately, and his punishment fixed by the jury at imprisonment for life in the state penitentiary. He asks a reversal of the judgment upon this verdict: First, because of error of the court in admitting incompetent evidence against him, and in rejecting competent evidence offered in his behalf; second, for error of the court in instructing the jury and in refusing to properly instruct the jury; and, third, because the verdict is against the law and the evidence. An examination of the record shows that the only alleged errors we need notice are those relative to the admission of evidence and the correctness of the instructions. Indeed, these are the only ones pointed out or relied upon by his counsel.

John Gambrell was killed in July, 1907. About a month previous to this, Garrett Gambrell, a brother of John, shot Green Gambrell, a brother of appellant, and from the effects of the wound received he died some days afterwards. The difficulty between Green and Garrett was the cause and beginning of the hostility between Allen Gambrell and his brothers and friends, upon the one side, and John Gambrell and his brothers and friends, upon the other. The record does not disclose any previous ill feeling between the parties. Soon after Green Gambrell was shot, Allen Gambrell procured the issue of a warrant against John Gambrell and his brothers Garrett and Hedger, charging them with the shooting of Green Gambrell, and this aggravated the ill feeling between the families. Soon after this, and while Green Gambrell was lying wounded at the house of Elijah Hubbard near where he was shot, Allen and his brothers were almost constantly in attendance upon him, and during the time several, if not all, of them were armed with pistols. John Gambrell occasionally passed along the road near by the house of Hubbard, and on one occasion, while all of the accused were at Hubbard's, Nelson and Rice asked Silas and Allen if they were going with them that night to waylay the boys (meaning John Gambrell and his brothers), and if so to get ready; but for some reason they did not make the attempt. On another occasion, Silas Gambrell ran into the house of Hubbard, got his pistol, and told Allen and Rice to get theirs, that some persons were coming up the road, and he expected John Gambrell was one of them. One witness testified that, a short time after Green Gambrell was shot, he was advising Rice Gambrell to keep out of trouble, when Rice replied that "he would rather fight it out." On another occasion Rice said, speaking of John Gambrell and his brothers, that "he would kill them all." On Sunday morning, the day of the homicide, Nelson Gambrell said he was going to the schoolhouse, that all of his brothers would be there with whisky, and he was expecting trouble. On the same morning, Tom Gambrell called at the house of Gus Warren, got his pistol, and said that if he did not come back to get a wagon and haul him back. On the Saturday before, a man named Mount Warren, in company with Tom Gambrell, borrowed a 32 pistol (Smith & Wesson special) from Gayle Patterson. On Sunday morning, Allen and Rice Gambrell bought pistol cartridges at one place, and Tom bought cartridges at another. Other witnesses said they saw all of the Gambrells at the schoolhouse whispering a short while before John Gambrell arrived there, and heard one of them ask one of the others to let him have some cartridges, when the one to whom the request was made replied, "I need mine." Another witness said that after John Gambrell came to the schoolhouse, and while he was looking in at the window, Allen Gambrell passed by him and gritted his teeth, and presently threw a rock, just missing John's head. Other witnesses say that Allen Gambrell and his brothers were in the schoolhouse where the services were being conducted, and that when John Gambrell rode up all of them went out of the house. The homicide took place on a Sunday afternoon at a schoolhouse in which a religious meeting was at the time being conducted. Numbers of people, men, women, and children, were present, and many testified for the commonwealth, and others in behalf of the accused. The testimony in some of its details is conflicting, but in a general way two views of it were presented; one favoring the commonwealth, and the other the accused. That for the commonwealth tended to show that the altercation that ended in the death of John Gambrell was commenced by Allen Gambrell, who was at all times the aggressor and fired the first shot. The evidence for the accused conduced to show that the difficulty was commenced by John Gambrell, and that Allen shot him in self-defense.

The evidence for the commonwealth tended to show that Allen Gambrell and his four brothers, the majority, if not all of them, being armed with pistols, were present at the schoolhouse, that they knew John Gambrell would be there, and that they assembled for the purpose of engaging him in a difficulty and killing him. That more than one of them shot him is made plain by the evidence of the doctor, who examined the four pistol wounds inflicted upon his person, and testified that one of them was made with a 45 pistol, two with a 38 pistol, and one with a 32 pistol. Two of these balls entered the front of his body, one of them entered his back, and another struck him in the hand or arm. The difficulty commenced almost immediately after John Gambrell alighted from his horse and came up to the house. He there met Allen Gambrell. A few words passed between them. Allen threw a rock at John and drew his pistol, but was prevented from doing further violence by spectators who interfered. When this affray was ended by the interposition of others, John Gambrell went into the schoolhouse through one of the windows near which he was standing, and almost immediately the shooting commenced that ended in his death. The encounter on the outside, the angry words, the display of weapons, and the knowledge on the part of the congregation of the hostile feeling between the parties, naturally caused great excitement and confusion; the result being that the record contains conflicting statements as to who fired the first shot. Some witnesses testified that the first shot was fired by Allen; others that it was fired by John. Allen Gambrell, in his own behalf, said that he was on the outside of the schoolhouse when John went in through the window, and that in a moment afterwards he heard a pistol fired in the house, and some one said, "Rice is shot," and thinking, that it was his brother, he stepped inside the door, when John Gambrell immediately fired his pistol at him; the bullet going through his hat. Thereupon, to protect his own life, he quickly fired two shots at John. Immediately after the shooting, Allen Gambrell and his four brothers left the schoolhouse together, and a few days afterwards, and before his arrest, Allen Gambrell fled from the state and went to the state of Illinois, where he was arrested while going under an assumed name.

There are in the record a number of circumstances pointing to the conclusion that Allen Gambrell and his brothers entertained for John Gambrell a feeling of deadly hostility. These circumstances, taken in connection with the facts heretofore mentioned, were well calculated to convince the jury that there was a conspiracy and agreement between these brothers to take the life of John Gambrell, and that, in pursuance of it, and while it existed, he was killed by being shot by more than one of them; all of them acting at the time in concert. Three of them shot him. Which one fired the fatal shot is not material. The declarations, acts, and conduct of Allen and those indicted with him, heretofore mentioned, were all competent and sufficient to establish a criminal intent on their part to take the life of John Gambrell. The declarations and acts of either of the conspirators, in pursuance of the conspiracy, after it was formed and before the end, was a legal contemplation the act of all of them. Each was responsible for what the other did in the prosecution of the design for which they combined. It was competent to show the cause of the ill feeling, the threats, the hostile declarations, the purchase of the cartridges, the whispered conversation at the schoolhouse, the fact that they left in a body when John Gambrell was seen approaching, and every circumstance and incident that tended to throw light upon their acts in furtherance of the common design. Powers v. Commonwealth, 61 S. W. 735, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1807, 53 L. R. A. 245; Commonwealth v. Hargis, 99 S. W. 348, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 510. A conspiracy is almost necessarily established by the welding into one chain of a number of links, each in itself inconclusive and insufficient to prove the conspiracy, but, when connected and examined as a whole, sufficient to show it. What occurred at the schoolhouse was the end of the conspiracy. The object of its formation had been accomplished. The accused were acting in concert there. Tracing backward their steps, we pick up here and there a link in the chain that united them in the evil purpose of accomplishing the death of John Gambrell.

With the evidence in this condition, the court, in connection with other instructions, gave the following that are especially complained of: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that John Gambrell was killed in pursuance to and in furtherance of a conspiracy, in the manner and form as required by instruction No. 2, and that Allen Gambrell, the defendant, was a member of such conspiracy at the time, you ought not to acquit the defendant on the ground of self-defense, or apparent necessity therefor, or the defense of another, or the apparent necessity therefor, but should find him guilty of willful murder under instruction No. 2." Instruction No. 2 reads as follows: "If you shall believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants Nelson Gambrell, Silas Gambrell, Rice Gambrell, Allen Gambrell, and any other person or persons to the grand jury unknown, or any two or more of them, including the defendant, Allen Gambrell, conspired, confederated, combined, and banded themselves together and agreed to and with each other to kill and murder John Gambrell, and that in pursuance and furtherance of such conspiracy, confederation, combining, and banding together, and while the same existed, any one or more of the defendants above named, or some persons to the grand jury unknown within such conspiracy as included the defendant, Allen Gambrell, did shoot and kill the said John Gambrell in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, then you ought to find the defendant guilty of willful murder as charged in the indictment herein, and fix his punishment at death or confinement in the state penitentiary for life, in your discretion, according to the proof."

It will thus be seen that the jury were instructed that Allen Gambrell's plea of self-defense would not avail him, if the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that the state of facts existed set out in instruction No. 2. The question then presented is: Did the fact that Allen Gambrell was a member of the conspiracy formed to kill John Gambrell, in pursuance of which and while it existed John Gambrell was killed, deny him the right of self-defense, although except for the conspiracy he would upon his own evidence alone have been entitled to an instruction presenting this defense?

The reason upon which the doctrine of self-defense rests may be generally stated to be that the person depending upon it to excuse or justify his conduct must himself at the time of the homicide be free from blame, without fault, and not the aggressor. Every person has the natural as well as legal right to protect his own life, although in so doing it becomes necessary to take the life of another, and the right to defend his person against unlawful violence and use such force as appears to him in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary to protect himself from impending danger; but the fact that it was necessary at the particular moment to take the life of his adversary will not excuse or justify him, if he himself was the wrongdoer or the aggravating cause of the difficulty, or if his own conduct and actions brought about the condition that made it necessary to resort to this method for protection. One who provokes a difficulty, with the purpose of killing his enemy, and carries his plan into execution by killing him, cannot shield himself from the consequences of his wrong upon the pretense that it was necessary that he should take the life of his adversary in self-defense. These general statements are fully supported in Oder v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky. 32, where the court said: "But in no state of case is one person allowed by law to hunt down or seek another for the purpose of killing him, and in pursuance of such an intention, accompanied by such an act, takes his life. Hence, if the defendant sought the deceased with the intention of killing him, or purposely brought about the meeting between them, or made his presence a mere pretext for slaying him, he cannot rely upon the law of self-defense to excuse his act." And Allen v. Commonwealth, 86 Ky. 642, 6

S. W. 645, where the court said: "If, however, one by his own wrongful acts makes the harm or danger to himself necessary or excusable in the person who is inflicting or about to inflict it, then the former cannot, upon the plea of self-defense, excuse the taking of life or the infliction of great bodily harm. Nor can he do so if he seeks the other party, not innocently, but with the intention of provoking a difficulty, and does so. He must not, however, be deprived of the benefit of the plea of self-defense, because words innocently spoken by him or in jest, or some act done by him not calculated or intended to do so, and not resorted to as a shield for an intended wrong, may have contributed to bring on the difficulty." To the same effect are Boner v. Commonwealth, 40 S. W. 700, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 409; Foutch v. State, 95 Tenn. 711, 34 S. W. 423, 45 L. R. A. 687, and editorial note; Logsdon v. Commonwealth, 40 S. W. 775, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 413; Johnson v. Commonwealth, 94 Ky. 578, 23 S. W. 507; and many others that might be cited. And so when two or more confederate and combine together for the purpose of killing a person, and in pursuance of and while such conspiracy exists seek him out and kill him, or provoke or begin the assault or attack and then take his life, they will not be permitted to escape the consequences of their wrongful act upon the theory that it was excusable under the laws of necessity. We cannot think of a state of facts that presents stronger reasons for denying the right of self-defense than when several form a conspiracy to destroy the life of the object of their hatred and malice, and in pursuance of it seek him out or provoke or begin the attack upon him. A conspiracy to murder is the very essence of malice. It includes evil intent, hatred, and predetermination to kill. It embraces every element of guilt and has no one of the mitigating features that reduce murder to manslaughter or excuse or justify homicide. A "conspiracy," as the word indicates, is an unlawful agreement, and the members of the conspiracy are entitled to but scant protection under the law of necessity while they are carrying out their unlawful engagements.

But the instruction goes further than is here indicated, and deprived the accused of his right to rely upon the plea of self-defense if the deceased was killed pursuant to the conspiracy and while it existed, although no one of the conspirators may have sought him out for the purpose of killing him, or have provoked the difficulty that resulted in his death, or have first attacked him. If Allen Gambrell and his brothers, in pursuance of the conspiracy, and while it existed, went to the schoolhouse for the purpose of killing John Gambrell, or if either one of them first provoked the difficulty with him, or first attacked him, then neither of them could rely on the plea of self-defense. On the other hand, although they had previously formed a conspiracy to kill John Gambrell, yet, if they did not go to the schoolhouse with that purpose in view, or did not first attack or assault him, or provoke a difficulty with him, they would be entitled to a self-defense instruction, if it appeared from the evidence that John Gambrell, at the time he was killed, commenced the assault, or made it necessary that they should take his life in defense of their own. Under the facts of this case there is no doubt that the instruction noticed was prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused, and, as it did not in our opinion correctly present the law applicable to the case, we find it necessary to remand it for a new trial. The error in the instruction is not trivial or technical. It treated one of the most important features in the case; and under it, although the jury might have believed that John Gambrell commenced the attack by firing the first shot at Allen Gambrell, and further believed that Allen Gambrell's life was then and there in imminent danger, and that it was necessary that he should take the life of John Gambrell to protect his own, yet they could not acquit him on the ground of self-defense (and that was the only plea he relied on), if they believed that he was a member of the conspiracy formed for the purpose of taking the life of John Gambrell, and that in pursuance of such conspiracy, and while it existed, Allen Gambrell was killed, although they might not have believed that pursuant to the conspiracy Allen Gambrell went to the schoolhouse to kill John Gambrell.

With the exception indicated, and a few minor errors, the instructions clearly presented the law applicable to the various states of case presented by the evidence. It is true that they are quite lengthy, but the facts of the case are so complicated that it was necessary that several phases of the law of homicide should be set out. The instructions, as they should be given on another trial, are as follows:

"1. (a) The words 'willful' and 'willfully,' as used in these instructions, means intentional; not accidental or voluntary. (b) The word 'feloniously,' as used in these instructions, means proceeding from an evil heart or purpose; done with the deliberate intention of committing a crime. (c) The phrase 'with malice aforethought,' as used in these instructions, means a predetermination to do the act of killing without legal excuse; and it is immaterial at what time before the killing such a determination was formed. (d) A criminal conspiracy, within the meaning of the word 'conspired' as used in these instructions, is a corrupt combination of two or more persons to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. (e) You are to take and receive all the evidence which the court permitted you to hear about the alleged shooting of Green Gambrell by Garrett Gambrell for the purpose only, and in so far only, as it may in your judgment tend to show motive for the acts and conduct of the parties to the difficulty in which John Gambrell was killed, in your judgment it does so show or tend to show motive. The word 'motive,' as used in these instructions by the court, means inducement, reason, cause, or incentive to do the acts and things charged in the indictment herein, if they or any of them were done.

"2. If you shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants Nelson Gambrell, Silas Gambrell, Rice Gambrell, Thomas Gambrell, Allen Gambrell, or any two or more of them, including the defendant Allen Gambrell, conspired and agreed to and with each other to kill and murder John Gambrell, and that in pursuance and furtherance of such conspiracy, and in execution thereof, and while the same existed, any one or more of the defendants above named within such conspiracy as included the defendant, Allen Gambrell, did willfully shoot and kill the said John Gambrell, in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, then you ought to find the defendant, Allen Gambrell, guilty of willful murder as charged in the indictment herein, and fix his punishment at death or at confinement in the state penitentiary for life, in your discretion, according to the proof.

"3. But if you do not believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the state of facts as set out in instruction No. 2 existed, yet do believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Allen Gambrell, in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, willfully and feloniously shot and killed John Gambrell, not in his necessary or apparently necessary self-defense, and not in the necessary or apparently necessary defense of Nelson Gambrell, Silas Gambrell, Rice Gambrell, or Thomas Gambrell, or you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Nelson Gambrell, Silas Gambrell, Rice Gambrell, or Thomas Gambrell, or any one or more of them, in this county, and before the finding of the indictment herein, willfully and feloniously shot and killed John Gambrell, not in their necessary or apparently necessary self-defense, or in the necessary or apparently necessary defense of one of them or of Allen Gambrell, and that the defendant Allen Gambrell was present at the time and near enough so to do, and did, willfully and feloniously, aid, encourage, advise, or command the person or persons, who did shoot the said John Gambrell, so to do, not in his necessary or apparently necessary self-defense, and not in the necessary or apparently necessary defense of the other defendants, or some one or more of them, then you ought to find him guilty; guilty of willful murder if you shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such shooting and killing of John Gambrell, or such aiding and assisting, was done with malice aforethought; or guilty of voluntary manslaughter, if you shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such shooting and killing of John Gambrell, or such aiding and assisting, was done in sudden heat and passion or in sudden affray and without previous malice.

"4. If you find the defendant guilty of willful murder, either under the second or third instructions, you will fix his punishment at death, or at confinement in the state penitentiary for life, in your discretion, according to the proof. If you find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, under either the second or third instructions, you will fix his punishment at confinement in the state penitentiary for a period of not less than 2 nor more than 21 years, in your discretion, according to the proof. If you find him not guilty, you will say so, and no more.

"5. If you shall believe from the evidence that no conspiracy existed as defined in instruction No. 2, but do believe that at the time the defendant shot and killed John Gambrell, if he did so, or at the time he aided, encouraged, advised, or commanded Nelson Gambrell, Silas Gambrell, Rice Gambrell, Thomas Gambrell, or any one or more of them, to shoot and kill the deceased, if he did so do, as defined in instruction 3, he believed, and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he or the other defendants above named, or any one or more of them, was then and there in danger of death or the infliction of some great bodily harm at the hands of the said John Gambrell, and that it was necessary, or was believed by the defendant in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary, to shoot and kill the deceased, or to aid, advise, encourage, or command the other defendants, or one of them, so to do in order to avert that danger, real or to the defendant apparent, then you ought to acquit the defendant upon the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity therefor or the defense of another and apparent necessity therefor.

"6. But, if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Allen Gambrell, first began the difficulty by shooting John Gambrell or making a demonstration to shoot him, then you ought not to excuse the defendant on the ground of self-defense or apparent necessity therefor, or the defense of another or apparent necessity therefor, as defined in instruction No. 4. Unless you believe from the evidence that he, or he and those acting with him, if any, abandoned such assault and difficulty in good faith, and then the deceased, seeing or knowing of such abandonment, continued to assault the defendant or either of the defendants, or to so menace them or any of them, or that it was necessary, or was believed by the defendant in the exercise of a reasonable judgment to be necessary to shoot the deceased, or to aid, encourage, advise, or command one of the other defendants to so shoot and kill the deceased in order to avert that danger, real or to the defendant apparent, in which event you ought to acquit the defendant on the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity therefor.

"7. You are further instructed that if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Allen Gambrell was a party to a conspiracy formed for the purpose of taking the life of John Gambrell, and that in pursuance of such conspiracy, and while it existed, Allen Gambrell and any one or more of the other conspirators went to the place where they knew or believed John Gambrell would be, for the purpose of killing him, and did then and there willfully kill him in execution of such conspiracy, or that Allen Gambrell, or any one or more of the conspirators, first commenced the difficulty by shooting or making a demonstration to shoot John Gambrell, you should not acquit Allen Gambrell on the ground of self-defense or apparent necessity, but should find him guilty of willful murder under instruction No. 2.

"8. If you shall have a reasonable doubt from the evidence of the defendant having been proven guilty, then you ought to find him not guilty; or if you shall believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant has been proven guilty, but shall have a reasonable doubt from the evidence as to whether his crime be willful murder as defined herein, or of the lower offense, voluntary manslaughter, as defined in these instructions, then you ought to find him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fix his punishment as provided therefor in instruction No. 4."

Wherefore, the whole court sitting, the judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial not inconsistent with this opinion.

be credited on the cost to defendant of condemning a switch track right of way, and adjudging that, to ascertain such cost defendant should have 60 days to prosecute condemnation proceedings, but that, before it should be required to do so, plaintiff must give bond in the sum of the balance due indemnifying defendant against costs, etc., incident to such proceedings.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Carter County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by C. S. Moreland against the Norton Iron Works. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Malin & Malin, for appellant. Henry L. Woods, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. The Norton Iron Works desired to purchase a tract of land of C. S. Moreland in Carter county for the purpose of mining on it limestone for use in its furnace. It agreed to pay her for the land $1,440, one half in cash, and the other half when she acquired a right of way for a railroad switch track across the lands of the Chesapeake Stone Company to the right of way of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company, so that the limestone might be moved away by rail. In the agreement she was to purchase the right of way, if she could, and, if she could not purchase it, she was to institute condemnation proceedings in the county court for that purpose. In pursuance to the agreement, she, being unable to buy the right of way, instituted condemnation proceedings in the Carter county court and secured a judgment for a private tram road, as provided in Acts 1904, p. 311, c. 126. On the day after the judgment was entered in the county court, a deed prepared by the Norton Iron Works was presented to her and her husband, and they signed it, supposing that the judgment in the county court covered all that she was required to do by the contract; but the contract that she had with the Norton Iron Works required her to secure a right of way for a railroad switch track, and she had in fact secured only a right of way for a tram road. The Norton Iron Works refused to pay her the balance of the money, telling her she had proceeded under the wrong statute. She then offered to pay all costs if the Norton Iron Works would institute a proceeding to secure the right of way which was wanted. This it refused to do, or to allow her to use its name in such a proceeding. The deed had been recorded, and so she had no title to the land and could not institute a proceeding in her own name. In this condition of things, when the Norton Iron Works refused to do anything, she brought this suit, asking that the deed be corrected to conform to the real contract and to enforce the lien for the balance of the purchase money, or to compel the Norton Iron Works to institute the proceeding to condemn the right of way. The deed which she had signed provided that the $720 was not to be paid until she secured the right of way for the railroad switch track and she had signed the deed, supposing that what had been secured was all that she was required to get. Issue was joined upon the petition, proof was taken, and on final hearing the circuit court entered a judgment in her favor against the Norton Iron Works for the sum of $720, to be credited by a sum equal to the amount it will cost the defendant to obtain by condemnation proceedings the right of way referred to, and, for the purpose of determining the probable amount of this cost, the cause was referred to a commissioner to take proof and report what the amount would be. He also adjudged that the defendant was given 60 days to institute and prosecute in good faith the necessary proceeding to acquire such right of way, and in this way to ascertain the actual cost; but, before it should be required to make this election, she was required to execute a bond to it with good security in the sum of $720 indemnifying it against all costs, damages, and expenses incident to such a proceeding. The court reserved other questions for further adjudication, and from this judgment the Norton Iron Works appeals.

It is insisted that the Carter circuit court had no jurisdiction, but the land lay in Carter county. The action sought to enforce a lien on the land, and the court, having jurisdiction for the purpose of enforcing the lien, could properly determine all other matters incidental to it. Dawkins v. Hough, 112 Ky. 855, 66 S. W. 1047, and cases cited.

The judgment entered by the court is in accord with the principles announced by the court in Stafford v. Big Sandy R. R. Co., 10 S. W. 389, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 154. The deed had been executed under a clear mistake of fact. Mrs. Moreland and her husband executed it supposing that the proper right of way had been obtained. They signed it under a misapprehension. The Norton Iron Works had paid $720, and, if some such relief as directed in the judgment could not be obtained, the time would never come for the payment of the balance of the purchase money. It could not keep the land without paying for it. A court of equity will always relieve against a mistake in granting such relief as the ends of justice require. When the Norton Iron Works has obtained the right of way, it will have all it bargained for, and the cost of doing this, under the judgment of the court, must come out of the money in its hands. It cannot lose anything in any event.

Judgment affirmed.

DENNIS et al. v. ALVES et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 13, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 349*)—
SALE OF REALTY — PRESUMPTION OF JURIS-DICTION.

The record, in proceedings by an executor to sell the estate, not affirmatively showing that infant defendants were not summoned and appeared before the court merely being silent on that question, it will be presumed on collateral proceedings that they were summoned, and that the court would not have rendered a judgment of sale unless they were properly before the court.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 349*)—
SALE FOR DEBTS—ORDER—JURISDICTION.

Where all the persons interested in the estate were made parties, the court had jurisdiction, so that a judgment, in proceedings by an executor to sell the estate for payment of debts, was not void, even though erroneous, and hence the purchaser at the sale would acquire good title.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Henderson County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by John S. Dennis and others against Walter Alves and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appealed. Affirmed.

Thos. E. Ward, for appellants. Montgomery Merritt, for appellees.

BARKER, J. The appellants instituted this action against Walter Alves and his co-appellees, alleging that they are the owners and entitled to the possession of a farm in Henderson county, Ky., called the "Point Place"; that the defendants are in the wrongful possession of this property, and unlawfully detaining it from the real owners, and they prayed for a judgment of the court that they were the owners and entitled to possession of the property. The defendants (appellees) answered, denying the title of the plaintiffs (appellants), and alleging ownership in themselves, and pleaded a judgment wherein the property was sold at judicial sale and purchased by their remote vendor, in bar of appellants' rights. They also pleaded the statute of limitations, and the issues were made up along these lines.

The first question in the case is whether or not the court had jurisdiction of the plaintiffs (appellants) in the action above referred to, wherein the property was sold at judicial sale. Without striving at absolute accuracy of detail it may be said that the grandfather of appellants, John H. Stanley, was in his life time the owner in fee simple of the "Point Place," a farm of about 200 acres. He was, in addition, the owner of a large estate, consisting mainly of real property. In 1878 he died, leaving a will which was duly and legally admitted to probate. By his will he devised the "Point Place" to his daughter, Lucy A. Dennis, the mother of appellants, for life, with remainder to her children. After the death of John H. Stanley, his son, James M. Stanley, qualified as executor of his will, and brought an action for the settlement of the estate of his testator, and for the payment of his debts and the distribution of his estate among his devisees. The estate was largely in debt, owing some $20,000. The personal property amounted to a good deal less, say something like $10,000. The petition alleged the insufficiency of the personal property to pay off the debts, and prayed for a sale of so much of the real property as was necessary to discharge the indebtedness. The appellants, who were infants of tender years, and were the remaindermen after the death of their mother, Lucy A. Dennis, were not made parties defendant to the original petition, but afterwards an amended petition was filed, alleging their interest, and that they were necessary parties to the litigation. Process was then awarded by the court, although the record does not show that summons was ever issued or served upon the infants. The record was necessarily large, and there were many other pleadings and cross-actions filed, setting up claims against the estate. Subsequently a judgment was rendered decreeing a sale of "Point Place" by the commissioner of the court, and in pursuance of this judgment it was sold along with some of the other real property, and was purchased by the executor, James M. Stanley, for the sum of $7,365, which was paid into court and used for the purpose of extinguishing the indebtedness of the testator, a part of which was a mortgage debt due Mrs. F. Stratman for $3,000, which was a lien upon the "Point Place." As Lucy A. Dennis and her children, to whom this farm was devised, in this proceeding lost the whole devise by the payment of the debts of the testator, she subsequently filed an answer and made it a cross-petition against the other devisees of her father, praying that the property unsold in the action be redistributed and that she be made equal with the other devisees as far as that was possible. This was done, and 131 acres of land was set apart to her and her children, upon the same condition as the original devise—to her for life, and remainder to her children, the appellants. This property was afterwards sold at the suit of the guardian of the children, in part for their maintenance, and in part to secure them a home in Henderson, Ky. One thousand six hundred dollars of the proceeds of the sale of the 131 acres was invested in the house and lot in Henderson, upon the same condition as the original devise to the mother for life, and remainder to the children. Four hundred dollars was paid over to each of the children in money. The balance was presumably expended in their education and maintenance. After the death of their mother, the life tenant, this action was instituted, as before stated, against the appellees, to recover the "Point Place." The appellees, it is admitted, have the same title to the property that was acquired by James M. Stanley, the purchaser at the judicial sale, from whom they have derived it by regular devolution of title.

So the question recurs: Was the judgment in the case by the executor to settle the estate of John M. Stanley void as to the infant defendants (appellants)? This question turns upon the presumption which will be indulged in favor of the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction when collaterally attacked. It is admitted that the record is silent as to whether or not process was ever issued on the cross-petition, or, if issued, whether served upon the infant defendants. For the appellees it is insisted that, although the record is silent upon this crucial point, every presumption will be indulged in favor of the validity of the judgment; and, unless it is affirmatively shown that the infant defendants were not properly before the court, their rights were concluded by the judgment had, and the purchaser at judicial sale acquired their title to the land. To decide this question it is only necessary to ascertain the correct principle of law governing it.

In the case of Segal v. Reisert, 107 S. W. 747, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 901, we had occasion to examine the principle involved here with great particularity, and to review at considerable length the authorities bearing upon it, and after this review it is said in the opinion: "It would seem from these authorities that, where a collateral attack is made upon a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, it is not sufficient to simply allege the absence of a jurisdictional fact; but it must be alleged that the record affirmatively shows the absence of the jurisdictional fact. This the answer in the case before us fails to do, and for aught that appears here the record in the case in which the property was sold may affirmatively show that the married women were privily examined as required by section 495, Civ. Code Prac.; and if it does, or it would seem even if it were silent upon the question, it must be conclusively presumed in favor of the judgment that the privy examination was had."

In the case of Maysville & B. S. R. R. Co. v. Ball, etc., 108 Ky. 241, 56 S. W. 188, a collateral attack was made on a judgment, upon the ground that it was void for want of service of process on the defendant. Upon this question the court said: "The attack on the judgment is not direct, but collateral. It is a well-settled rule that domestic judgments rendered in a court of general jurisdiction cannot be collaterally attacked unless the want of jurisdiction appears upon the record. Therefore no evidence is admissible except that which is furnished by the record of the action wherein the judgment was rendered. Of course the rule is otherwise when a direct attack is made upon a judgment. The answer that the defendant was not served with process, and did not appear in the action, etc., is insufficient, because it also should have alleged that the record shows such to be the case. In Van Fleet, on Collateral Attack (section 855) it is said: 'An answer to an action on a domestic judgment, where special pleading is required or attempted, must not only deny service and appearance, but must allege what the record shows, or fails to show, on these points. * * * Hence an answer to an action on the record of another court must allege that it does not show any service or appearance, and, if the record of that of a superior court, it must allege that it affirmatively shows a want of service.' Black, Judgments, § 271, announces the same doctrine, wherein it is said: 'When a party seeks in a collateral action to impeach a judgment or decree of a court of superior jurisdiction on the ground that he had no legal notice of the pendency of the action, it is necessary that he should allege in his pleading what, if anything, is shown by the record in relation to the issue and service of process, because, unless the record itself shows that the court never acquired jurisdiction of him, it will be conclusively presumed that the jurisdiction did attach.'

In the case of Jones, etc., v. Edwards, etc., 78 Ky. 6, the same question we have here arose, and it was said: "The mere absence of evidence in the record of Peter F. Smith's executor against his devisees, etc., that two of three of his devisees had been summoned in the action is not sufficient to enable the appellees to make a successful collateral attack upon that record and shut it out as evidence in this case; and that it cannot be done has been substantially decided in the following adjudged cases: (Authorities omitted.)"

In Freeman on Judgments, § 124, it is said that: "Nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which expressly appears to be so. Hence, though the existence of any jurisdictional fact may not be affirmed upon the record, it will be presumed, upon a collateral attack, that the court, if of general jurisdiction, has acted correctly and with due authority, and its judgment will be valid although every fact necessary to jurisdiction affirmatively appeared. The decisions to this effect are very numerous." To the same effect are Miller v. Farmers' Bank, etc., 75 S. W. 218, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 373; Northington v. Reed, 75 S. W. 206, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 354; Berry v. Foster, 58 S. W. 709, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 746.

The record in the case in which the judicial sale was had does not affirmatively show that the infant defendants (appellants) were not summoned and properly before the court, the record on this question being merely silent. Therefore, under the foregoing authority, we must presume that the court would not have rendered a judgment of sale foreclosing the right of the infants unless they were properly before the court; and, this being true, the judgment was not void, although it may have been erroneous.

It therefore follows that, so far as anything to the contrary appears in the case before us, the court had jurisdiction to make the sale of "Point Place," and that the purchaser acquired all the title in the land which the appellants then owned.

Judgment affirmed.

GALVIN v. SHAFER.

ELECTIONS (§ 305*)—CONTEST—ABATEMENT—DEATH PENDING APPEAL.

Appeal in an election contest abates on death of contestee pending his appeal; Ky. St. 1903, § 1596A, subsec. 12, providing for a contest and an appeal by either party, making no provision in case of death of either party, an election contest not being within the jurisdiction of the courts of common law, and therefore not surviving at common law, section 10 making certain enumerated actions survive, not embracing it, and though the estate of decedent, he being the unsuccessful party, is liable for the costs, an appeal not lying from a mere judgment for costs.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, First Division.

"To be officially reported."

Election contest by George E. Shafer against R. E. Galvin. From an adverse decree, contestee appeals. Dismissed.

W. J. O'Connor, for appellant. C. B. Blakey, for appellee.

O'REAR, C. J. Appellant and appellee were voted for for the office of school trustee in Jefferson county. Appellant was awarded the certificate by the board of canvassers. In due time appellee instituted a contest in the circuit court, resulting in a decree in his favor, adjudging that he had been elected to the office, and that appellant had not. Seasonably appellant prosecuted an appeal to this court, but before the case was submitted for hearing he died. The case is now being considered on the motion of appellee to dismiss the appeal. The ground of the motion is that, as appellant has died pending the appeal, there is no one who can prosecute it; that appellant's appeal died with him, and, that, as the Legislature has not provided for revivor of the appeal in such cases, no such right exists.

By the act of October 24, 1900 (Laws 1900, Ext. Sess. c. 5, p. 27), now appearing in Carroll's Kentucky Statutes (1903) as section 1596A, the circuit courts are given original jurisdiction of certain election contests, including the class of which the case at bar is one. By the same act it is provided (subsec. 12): "Either party may appeal from the judgment of the circuit court to the Court of Appeals by giving bond to the clerk of the circuit court, with good surety, conditioned for the payment of all costs and damages the other party may sustain by reason of the appeal and by filing the record in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals within thirty days after final judgment in the circuit court. And in the Court of Appeals the case shall be heard and determined as speedily as possible, and shall have precedence over all other cases. * * * The unsuccessful party shall pay all costs in both courts." Prior to that act the practice in such cases was regulated by statutes entirely different from the present law, and before nonjudicial tribunals. The present act, while requiring the practice in such cases to conform to the practice in equity actions in the particulars where same can be made applicable, creates a unique course of procedure in many particulars; but there is a complete omission to make any provision for the death of either of the parties to the contest at any stage of the case, either in the circuit court or in this court. If the contestant die before beginning the contest, no provision is made for a contest by any other person; or, if he died pending the contest in the circuit court, there is no provision for revivor, and no survivorship provided; or, if either party die pending the appeal, there is a like failure to provide for revivor. The actions which survive in this state are those which survived at the common law, and such others as are specifically named by statute. Section 10, Ky. St. 1903, enumerates certain actions which did not survive at the common law, but which by that section are made to survive. The courts did not have jurisdiction at the common law to try contests of elections. Hence there could be no survivorship of such an action at the common law. Nor does the statute, as has been already pointed out, make provision for such survivorship. A public office is not an inheritance. Neither the creditors nor heirs at law of the incumbent can have any title to or legal interest in his office. The administrator, not being entitled to it, could neither enter it without suit nor sue to recover it. He is nowise concerned in the litigation over its title.

It is suggested that, as the statute makes the unsuccessful litigant in the contest liable for the costs, appellant's estate is concerned in the judgment in this case, as that judgment includes the recovery of the costs against him, and, unless the judgment is reversed, the estate would be compelled to pay the costs. The case of Snibley v. Palmtag, 127 Cal. 31, 59 Pac. 200, is cited and relied on by appellant. That case was an election contest. The respondent died pending the appeal. On a motion to abate the appeal, the Supreme Court of California, denying the motion, said: "It is not correct to say that the estate of the deceased has no interest in the controversy. It is provided in section 1125 that if the proceeding be dismissed for want of prosecution, or if the election be affirmed, judgment must be rendered against the party contesting such election. Having commenced the proceeding and prosecuted it to judgment, by which the contestee is deprived of an office to which he had been declared elected, neither he nor his estate could escape the responsibility he has assumed. Appellant has a right to his appeal, and there is a chance that the judgment may be reversed, and that upon a retrial the election would be affirmed." It further appears from the opinion in that case that any elector could have contested the election. We are not satisfied with the reasoning of the court in that case. The opinion seems to be rested at last upon the idea that, because the estate of the decedent had become liable for the costs in the trial court by reason of the judgment, that liability gave it such an interest in the litigation as entitled it to prosecute the appeal to have the judgment reversed. An action for assault and battery does not survive. A judgment for costs against an unsuccessful plaintiff in such an action would have involved his estate in liability, notwithstanding his death; but could his administrator have prosecuted an appeal to have the judgment below reversed so that incidentally the estate might escape the costs?

But in this state there is no appeal from a mere judgment for costs, no matter how much they may amount to. Appellate jurisdiction here is made to depend upon other matters, always excluding the costs. Section 950, Ky. St. 1903. Costs cannot be considered as affecting the right of appeal. Boske v. Security T. & S. V. Co., 56 S. W. 524, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 181; Moore v. Boner, 7 Bush, 26; Rhodes v. Frankfort Chair Co., 79 S. W. 768, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 2042; Tandy v. Hatcher, 9 Ky. Law Rep. (abstract) 721. In King v. Tilford, 70 S. W. 1064, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1270, the appellants, as members of the board of aldermen of Louisville, had instituted proceedings to impeach appellees, as members of the board of public safety. An injunction was granted appellees restraining appellants proceeding with the impeachment. Appellants prosecuted an appeal to this court from the judgment perpetuating the injunction. Pending the appeal the terms of office of the parties expired. The appeal was dismissed, as "a reversal would accomplish nothing, and an affirmance would not benefit appellees." Of course, the matter of costs was present in that case, but the court held it to be a moot question notwithstanding. In contests of elections to seats in Congress, the death of a party abates the contest; but, under the provision of Constitution which makes the house judge of who may be entitled to hold seat in that body, it may, after the death of a contestant, determine whether the contest is legally entitled to his seat. Paine's Case, 1043, etc. In the contest of the election of Governor in 1900, the contestant died pending the contest. In a suit by the contesting Lieutenant Governor on same ticket, it was held by this court (Taylor v. Beckham, 108 Ky. 291, 56 S. W. 177, 4 R. A. 258, 94 Am. St. Rep. 357) that, if the contestant had been elected Governor, upon his death the one elected Lieutenant Governor on his ticket would have become entitled to the office, and that he "had the right to continue the contest to secure what the Constitution guaranteed to him." Whether or otherwise the right of continuing the hearing of the contest survived was not decided.

Inasmuch as the Legislature has not provided for the emergency of death of a party to the contest pending the hearing or appeal, and as independent of legislative enactment such right does not survive at the common law, we must hold that the appeal abates on the death of either party to it. The hardship of possible injustice in such a result cannot justify the courts making law to relieve it. If a contestant, although wrongfully deprived of the office to which he had been elected, and wrongfully denied the certificate, had died before filing his petition for a contest, the certificate would have been complete title of the holder, and no provision exists for its impeachment. That might have worked a hardship on the public. So held in the language of the statute (subsection § 1596A), "on the production of a copy of the final judgment, the successful party shall be permitted to qualify or be commissioned, and the legislative declaration of what the statute shall be. Whether hardships ensue is for legislative consideration, not ours.

The appeal is dismissed.

KELLY v. PETER & BURGHARD STONE CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 19, 1907.)
CONTRACTS (§ 68*)—CONSIDERATION.

Plaintiff having a claim against defendant for injuries sustained, it was agreed that defendant should pay plaintiff $150 in money for regular employment when he recovered from his injuries. Defendant paid money, but refused to furnish the employment. Held, that the compromise furnished a sufficient consideration for the agreement to employ and that plaintiff could recover damages thereon.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County; Common Pleas Branch, First Division.
"To be officially reported."

Action by J. W. Kelly against the Peter & Burghard Stone Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Popham & Webster, for appellant. Isaac T. Woodson, for appellee.

BARKER, J. The appellant instituted this action against the appellee to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract of employment. The cause of action is contained in the following excerpt from the petition: "He states: That plaintiff was in the employ of defendant in and around said establishment during the month of September, 1904, and, while plaintiff was engaged at said time and place in handling a huge stone, he was injured in his feet and upon his body, and thereafter made claim upon defendant for damages, claiming said injuries were received through its negligence; that shortly thereafter defendant, by and through its agents, effected a settlement of said claim with plaintiff on account of said injuries, by paying plaintiff the sum of $150 in cash, in addition to which defendant at the time of said settlement, in March, 1905, or thereabouts, contracted and agreed with this plaintiff that, as soon as he was able to resume work, the defendant would allow plaintiff to continue in its employ, and furnish him steady work during the times he was able to work." In addition to the foregoing, it is alleged: That the appellee afterwards refused to employ plaintiff or permit him to resume work pursuant to the agreement, although he was ready, able, and willing to work, and offered so to do; that, although he diligently sought other employment, plaintiff was unable to obtain it; and that by reason of the wrongful breach of the contract he had been damaged in the sum of $2,400, for which he prayed judgment. A general demurrer to this petition was filed by the defendant and overruled by the court. Afterwards the defendant answered, and, plaintiff having demurred to the second paragraph of the answer, the judge of the trial court changed his mind as to the merits of the petition, carried the demurrer back to the petition, and sustained it. Plaintiff declining to amend, the petition was dismissed. From this judgment he is here on appeal.

The trial court, in sustaining the demurrer to the petition, was of opinion that the contract set up by the plaintiff lacked mutuality, or, in other words, a consideration, and for that reason came within the principle enunciated in L. & N. R. Co. v. Offutt, 99 Ky. 427, 36 S. W. 181, 59 Am. St. Rep. 467. In this we think the court erred. The contract alleged in the petition did not lack a consideration. On the contrary, it is expressly alleged that the plaintiff had been hurt in the employment of the defendant company, and had a claim against it for damages, which he was asserting, and that in settlement of this claim the defendant company paid plaintiff $150 in cash, and in addition thereto contracted and agreed with him that, as soon as he was able to resume work, it would allow him to continue in its employment and furnish him steady work during the time he was able to work. The case of L. & N. R. Co. v. Offutt has no application to that at bar. There the contract alleged was merely one for employment, and, as it was not alleged that Offutt agreed or bound himself to work for the company, the contract was unilateral, and therefore without mutuality or consideration. Offutt had been regularly in the employ of the company before, but had been discharged for violating the rules of his employer. Afterwards, when there was a strike of the employes of the railroad company, he was given special employment as a detective, or agent, and was sent to Bowling Green; his pay being $5 per day and his expenses during the time he was specially employed. When the strike was settled and the special employment was at an end, Offutt was paid in full for his services. It was not alleged in the petition that in consideration of Offutt's accepting the special employment he was thereafter to be restored to his former regular employment and kept in it so long as he did faithful and honest work for the company. The opinion recites merely that the appellee claimed that, at the time he accepted the employment for the special services referred to, he asked that he might be restored to the position in the service of the company from which he had been discharged, and that it was then and there contracted with him that he should be restored to the position, and that he should keep it so long as he did faithful and honest work for the company; but, while it appears that the two contracts were simultaneously made, the one was not a consideration for the other. In other words, they were two separate contracts, and the agreement for regular employment alleged stood upon its own merits and its own consideration, and it was therefore held that this contract, lacking mutuality, was invalid and nonenforceable. The contract there was not the same in principle as that with which we are now confronted. Here the plaintiff had a claim for damages against his employer for personal injuries, and, in order to compromise and settle this claim, the employer paid the servant $150 in money and agreed that when he recovered from his injuries he would be furnished regular employment as long as he was able to do the work. The compromise of the tort was the consideration for the contract sued on. We know of no reason why such a contract is not enforceable. Indeed, it was expressly held in L. & N. R. Co. v. Offutt that such contracts were valid and binding. On this subject, it is said in the opinion: "We can conceive of no reason for holding that a contract of employment or of service, either for a fixed term or for an indefinite time, would not be legal or would be against public policy. In actual experience such contracts are constantly made, and on both principle and authority such contracts must be held not to be within the statute of frauds, and therefore may be made by parol."

The case of Yellow Poplar Lumber Co. v. Rule, 106 Ky. 455, 50 S. W. 685, is in all respects similar to that at bar. In that case, Rule was an employé in the sawmill of the appellant company, and upon having his thumb cut off, as he claimed, by the negligence of the company's agents, demanded damages for the injury. This claim was compromised by the company, as it was alleged, by an agreement that, if the employé would forego his suit for damages and surrender all claim therefor, it would give him employment at the rate of $2.50 per day so long as it was engaged in the sawmill business on the Ohio river. This proposition he accepted, but afterwards, when he was able to work, and when the mills of the company resumed operation, he was refused employment. In an action for a breach of the contract for employment, the employé obtained a verdict for $1,400, and upon appeal it was insisted by the company that the contract alleged lacked mutuality. In other words, it was said there, as here, that the company was bound to hire, but the employé was not bound to serve; he could work or not, as he chose, whereas, the company had obligated itself to give him employment at $2.50 per day as long as its mills were operated on the Ohio river. In response to the contention that the contract alleged lacked mutuality, it was said: "In our opinion, whilst these are the characteristics of the contract, it does not follow that the employé is without remedy. Except for the fact that courts do not, as a rule, so enforce these contracts of hiring, by reason of their personal nature, the agreement as alleged might be the basis of an action for specific performance, and, such an action not being maintainable by reason of the rule adverted to, we perceive no reason why the appellee might not purchase for a valuable consideration the right to obtain employment or option to work at appellant's mills so long as they engaged in running them at the place designated. Such a contract does not differ in substance from those known as optional contracts in the purchase of property, and which have often been upheld by this court where there is a consideration for them, even when there is only an agreement to sell, and no corresponding agreement to buy." It was further held that the contract was not invalid because for an indefinite length of time; nor was it within the statute of frauds.

It seems to us that the opinion in the case last above cited is conclusive of the question we have here. We see no reason why a company should be allowed to settle a proposed action against it for damages by promising to give permanent employment to its injured employé, and, when the time within which the employé could prosecute his claim for damages had expired, to refuse to carry out the contract. This would be exceedingly unjust and inequitable to the employé, and would tend to uphold the fraud and chicanery of dishonest employers. It seems to us much more rational to encourage the settlement of such claims as appellant alleges he originally had against appellee, by upholding the compromises by which they are effected, than to force the injured employé either to litigate his claim for personal injuries or afterwards be at the mercy of his employer.

Judgment reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the petition and for further procedure consistent herewith.

J. I. CASE THRESHING MACH. CO. v. HARP et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 20, 1903.)

SALES (§ 238*)—EXPRESS WARRANTY—BREACH—WAIVER.

Where an agricultural machine is sold with a warranty that it is made of good material, is durable, and will perform its work as represented, and provision that, if it fails to fill the warranty after 10 days' trial, notice, specifying the failure, shall be given the seller, who shall have a reasonable time to remedy defects, and, if the machine still fails to comply with the warranty, it shall be returned by the purchaser, and the seller shall have the right to substitute another, or rescind for the contract by returning the money or notes received for the machine, the purchaser has no right of action for damages, where he, after learning that the machine did not work satisfactorily, continued to use it for at least two seasons without any offer to return it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hardin County.
"Not be to officially reported."

Action by W. P. Harp and others against the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

L. A. Faurest, for appellant. H. L. James, for appellees.

SETTLE, J. The appellee, W. P. Harp, in 1903, purchased of appellant a husker-shredder complete, with canvass cover, for which he agreed to pay $580 in three annual installments. The contract was contained in one of the printed forms customarily used by appellant, and, in addition to the warranty that it was made of good material, durable, and would perform its work as represented, it provided that, should the shredder fail to fill the warranty, after 10 days' trial by the purchaser, notice in writing should be given the appellant at Racine, Wis.

and also the agent from whom the machine was received, stating in what parts and wherein it failed to fulfill the warranty; that appellant should then have a reasonable time in which to remedy the defects, and, if the shredder should still fail to comply with the warranty, the machine should be returned by the purchaser to the place where received, and appellant notified thereof, in which event it should have the option to substitute another or return the purchaser's notes or money received for the machine, and thereby rescind the contract without further liability. The shredder furnished Harp under this contract failing to do satisfactory work, a further agreement was on November 10, 1903, made between appellant and Harp, to the effect that payment of the latter's notes should be extended one year without interest and credited by $30, and to also extend the warranty "as if the shredder for which said notes were given was sold in 1904." December 14, 1903, Harp wrote appellant that the machine was still unsatisfactory and could not be repaired away from the factory. Accepting this ultimatum of Harp, appellant, in 1904, sent him another shredder in lieu of the first. Though objecting at first to the substitution, Harp consented to accept the last machine, and October 29, 1904, wrote appellant to send a man to start the shredder on the following Tuesday. Appellant complied with this request and sent its agent, Ray, to Harp's on the day indicated. Ray started the machine, and on November 5th went again to adjust some part of it upon complaint of Harp. At that time the machine was performing to Harp's satisfaction, and he then gave Ray the following testimonial: "J. I. Case T. M. Co., Louisville, Ky.—Gentlemen: The husker-shredder purchased of you is working all right and is giving me entire satisfaction so far and is working reasonably fast. W. P. Harp." Harp did not complain again that season of the shredder. After the delivery of the last machine, Harp made up a company of seven, including himself, to take the shredder off his hands, and in December following, which was after the close of the shredding season, appellant's agent, Ray, went to Glendale by its direction and at Harp's request, to accept the notes of the seven persons constituting the company for the last machine, in lieu of those of Harp. This was done. After these notes were executed, the shredder was used the seasons of 1905 and 1906. In 1905, an agent of the company worked on the machine once, and at the same time Ray put on it an improved part that he had promised the appellees, in December previously, he would get the company to furnish them. At the close of the season of 1906, it appears that the machine was left in the horse lot of a Mrs. Ash, exposed to the weather, and that it was probably not thereafter used. The notes that were given by Harp and his associates were transferred by appellant's agent to a third party and paid by the makers when due. Thereafter this suit was brought by Harp alone, setting up the written contract under which he had purchased the two machines from appellant, and seeking to recover damages of it upon the ground that there had been a breach of the warranty, in that the machine had failed to perform its work as represented by appellant and had proved worthless. Later an amended petition was filed, making the other members of the company coplaintiffs with Harp, to the action. The answer of appellant contained a traverse of the averments of the petition, alleged a failure of appellees to comply with their part of the contract, and that they were estopped to maintain the action because the machine, if unsatisfactory or worthless, as claimed by them, had never been returned to appellant, nor had appellees offered to return it. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellees for $275, and, a new trial having been refused appellant, it seeks by this appeal a reversal of the judgment.

Without going into the question of whether the court erred in overruling the demurrer that appellant filed to the petition, or considering other questions raised upon the pleadings, we deem it sufficient to decide the case upon the main question involved. It is not apparent from the evidence that appellees made any serious complaint to appellant of the machine after the last repairs were done upon it by appellant's agent in 1905, and it is not denied that it was used by appellees during the shredding season of the years 1904, 1905, and 1906. After having this long use of the machine, we think it is now too late for appellees to complain that it did not work satisfactorily, although it may not have done so. It is true they aver that a new warranty was made by appellant's agent, Ray, at the time appellees executed the note given in lieu of those of Harp; but if we concede that Ray was authorized to make such a warranty, and that it was made as claimed, it is manifest that the warranty was but a renewal of that contained in the written contract originally entered into by Harp with appellant. That warranty was conditioned and connected with certain things that were to be done by Harp or by him and his associates composing the company, and these conditions we think the testimony fairly shows he and they failed to perform. It is not claimed by appellees that Ray in making the alleged warranty relieved them of the performance of any of the conditions connected with it, as expressed in the original or written contract. Taking the testimony as a whole, we are satisfied that the alleged warranty made by Ray was but a renewal of the original warranty made by appellant. In other words, the original contract was continued in force after the execution of the note appel-lees delivered to Ray in lieu of those of Harp.

We think this case comes within the rule announced in the cases of Garr-Scott & Co. v. Hodges, 90 S. W. 580, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 889; Wisdom v. Nichols-Sheppard Co., 97 S. W. 18, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 1128; McCormick Harvesting Machine Co. v. Arnold, 116 Ky. 508, 76 S. W. 323. In the case first cited the court said: "The express warranty in this case not only states what is warranted, but shows the agreement of the parties as to what is to be the measure of recovery for its breach; that is, a return of the property and cancellation of the purchase-money notes, unless the seller furnishes other articles in lieu of that found deficient. When, therefore, appellee found that the machinery was below the quality warranted, and after having duly notified the seller of the fact, there were but two courses for him to pursue. One was to proceed upon the warranty, which was to return the articles and obtain a return of his notes. This would have been a complete defense to the notes. The other course was to waive the defect in the machinery. This he could do expressly or by implication, as where he kept and continually used the machinery as his own. Waiving the defect necessarily involved an abandonment of his right to claim under the warranty. Appellee had a reasonable time within which to make an election; that is, it was proper for him to have given the machinery such a reasonable test for such a reasonable length of time as to have demonstrated that it was not up to the warranty. Whenever that fact was settled, then it was not necessary that he should elect either to proceed upon his warranty or to keep the machinery notwithstanding the defects. His testimony leaves no doubt that he discovered early in the season that the machinery was deficient. He declared that it was wholly unsuitable and unsatisfactory, notwithstanding he persisted in using it actively and to its full capacity through the remainder of the season. What is here said about the rescission of the contract upon the failure of the articles to come up to the warranty is not based upon the general law of a breach of the warranty of a chattel, for generally the vendee may hold the property and sue to recover damages upon the breach of warranty. This, though, is where the parties have not provided by express stipulation for a particular measure of damages in case of a breach. It is to be presumed that, when parties contracting with reference to the sale of a chattel have entered into an express warranty concerning its quality and fitness for its particular purpose, and have agreed that, if it should not come up to the warranty upon a reasonable test, then the contract should be rescinded, and which is to be the only remedy. * * * The court will not supply a different warranty from the one that the parties have made, nor a different measure of damages for the one the parties have agreed should be applied to their case. Under the facts as shown by the evidence, appellee, the court should have sustained the appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the amount of the notes sued on."

As appellees, after ascertaining that the shredder purchased by them from appellant did not work satisfactorily, nevertheless continued to use it, for at least two seasons without an offer to return it, in order that they might have a rescission of the contract and a return of their note, they had no legal right to maintain this action for damages. Upon the facts of the case, the lower court should have peremptorily instructed the jury to find for appellant.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to grant appellant a new trial consistent with the opinion.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 39*) — WILLS — PROBATE — STATUTORY PROVISIONS — "ACTION."

Ky. St. 1903, § 2522, provides that an action for relief not otherwise provided for may only be commenced within 10 years from accrual. Section 469 defines "action" as used in the statutes to include all proceedings in a court of the commonwealth. Held that since there is no provision in the statutes expressly limiting the time within which wills either of residents or nonresidents may be probated, since the probating of a will, if not an action, is at least a proceeding to obtain relief, a proceeding to probate a nonresident's will is within section 2522, and must be commenced within 10 years after testator's death, regardless whether the will was previously probated in the state of testator's domicile or not.

3. WILLS (§ 434*) — PROBATE IN ANOTHER STATE—EFFECT ON LAND IN KENTUCKY.

The probate of a nonresident's will in the state of his domicile has no legal effect on title to his land in Kentucky, but in order to pass title thereto the will must be probated in Kentucky according to its laws.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hickman County.

"To be officially reported."

Proceeding by Frank Foster and others for the probate of the will of John McIntosh, a nonresident, under Ky. St. 1903, § 4854. From an order of the county court admitting the will to probate. Edwin S. Jordan and others, purchasers from an heir of testator, appealed to the circuit court, which refused probate, and the propounders appeal. Affirmed.

Thos. E. Mathews and Wheeler, Hughes & Berry, for appellants. Robbins & Thomas and Joe W. Bennett, for appellees.

NUNN, J. One John McIntosh died in the year 1859, testate, domiciled in Davidson county, Tenn. At the June term, 1859, of the Davidson county court, a court of probate jurisdiction, his will was duly probated. In this will the testator disposed of his estate in Tennessee, and then gave to one of his sons and to his daughter, Louisa E. Foster, for her life, with remainder over to her children, and to a grandchild, certain real estate located in Hickman county, Ky. About the year 1865 the grandchild of McIntosh, to whom he devised an interest in the Kentucky land, sold and conveyed his interest to one Utterback. Some time after that, Utterback, Frank McIntosh, and Louisa E. Foster instituted an action in the Hickman county court and had the land divided among them, and a conveyance was made to Louisa E. Foster in fee for her portion of the land. Soon after this she sold the part allotted to her to appellees. In the year 1907, the life estate of Louisa E. Foster was terminated by her death. In November, 1907, the remaindermen and the heirs of John McIntosh probated his will in the county court of Hickman county, Ky., under the provisions of section 4854 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, and from the order of the county court probating the will appellees herein appealed to the circuit court of Hickman county by petition. All formalities were waived by both sides, the issues were formed, and upon the hearing of the case by the court, a jury being waived, as the issues made were purely issues of law, it was determined by the court that the will was properly proven; but the right to probate the same was barred by the statutes of limitations, the will not having been offered for probate in Kentucky within 10, 20, or 30 years after the date of the testator's death. The court also held that appellees had such an interest in the matter in controversy as to give them the right to protest against the probate of the will; they having bought the interest of Louisa E. Foster, who conveyed the same as if she owned the fee, instead of a mere life estate.

The right of a purchaser from an heir of a testator to resist the probating of his will has been conclusively settled by this court. See the cases of Brooks v. Paine's Ex'r, 123 Ky. 271, 90 S. W. 600; Davies v. Leete, 111 Ky. 659, 64 S. W. 441, and the cases there cited. In the Davies-Leete Case, this court, in discussing this question, said: "The statutes use the words 'persons interested' (sections 4856, 4861, Ky. St. 1903) in defining who are proper or necessary parties to probate proceedings. We are of opinion that any person who claims title under any one an heir at law of the testator, as well, perhaps, as any creditor of such heir at law, if the heir be insolvent, may become a party to such proceedings under the above clause. This would not, of course, admit a stranger to testator's title, or one claiming under title hostile to his, to contest the will, in order that he might destroy a link in his adversary's chain of title (Johnson v. Bard [Ky.] 54 S. W. 721); nor would it admit any relation not an heir at law or such creditor."

The only other question to be determined is whether the statute of limitations interposed by appellee is a bar to the probating of the will at this time in this state.

Appellants' contention is, as the will was probated in Tennessee, within the proper time, and in the state of the residence of the testator, the statutes of limitations do not apply to the probating of the will in this state, but concedes that the probating of it would be barred if it had been made in this state, or if it had never been probated in the state of Tennessee, and referred to the cases of Allen v. Froman, 96 Ky. 313, 28 S. W. 497; Johnson v. Bard, 54 S. W. 721, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 999, and Morrison v. Fletcher, 119 Ky. 488, 84 S. W. 548, as supporting their contention. We do not so construe the authorities cited. In the Allen-Froman Case, there was an attempt to probate the will of George Coil, who died in the state of Alabama, the place of his domicile, and the statutes of limitations were pleaded against the probating of it in this state. The court, in considering the question, incidentally mentioned the fact that the will had never been probated in any court of Alabama, and determined that the 10-year statute of limitation applied and was a bar to the probating of the will in this state, but did not intimate that the rule would have been different if the will had been probated in the state of Alabama. In the case of Johnson v. Bard, supra, the opinion, delivered January 4, 1900, but not reported in the Kentucky Law Reporter until five years afterwards, was one where the probate of the will of David McCaleb, a resident of Mississippi, was considered. McCaleb's will was probated in Mississippi in the county of his late residence, on the 25th day of April, 1850. On the 18th day of December, 1897, his heirs and devisees probated the will in the county of Christian, Ky., where David McCaleb owned some real estate which he devised by his will. Appellant, Johnson, appeared in the county court and undertook to resist the probating of the will. This court determined only that Johnson was not an heir, devisee, or a creditor of the testator, and had no such legal interest as entitled him to be made a party thereto, or to resist by a plea of limitation the relief sought by appellees. The court did not determine what would have been the result if the plea of limitation had been interposed by some one who was interested in the probating of the will, as defined in the Davies and other cases referred to. The case of Morrison v. Fletcher, supra, was one where the question at issue was not involved. Mary M. Morrison made a will which was probated in the state of Arkansas, the place of her domicile, which was afterwards probated in Hardin county, Ky., where she owned a house and lot. The issue arose between the heirs of Mary M. Morrison and Fletcher. In the action Fletcher averred that the will of Morrison was void and had no binding force in Kentucky, for the reason that more than 10 years had elapsed from the death of Mary M. Morrison before it was probated in the county of Hardin, Ky. This court determined in that case that the judgment of the county court admitting the will to probate could not be attacked in a collateral action or proceeding. It did not determine what would have been the result if some one interested had appeared in the county court and pleaded the statutes of limitations, or had appealed from the order of probate, within the time fixed by the statutes, and pleaded the statutes of limitations, as was done in this case. It is true that in the Morrison-Fletcher Case, aside from the question before the court therein, this court made reference to the Johnson-Bard Case, supra, and apparently misconstrued what was decided in that case. These are the only cases cited, which were decided by this court, and we have been unable to find any others, where this court has given an intimation on the question now being considered; that is, whether there is any statute of limitations in this state applicable to the probating of a will which had been previously duly probated in another state, the place of the domicile of the testator.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The will in this case was probated in the Hickman county court under section 4854, Ky. St. 1903, which is as follows: "When a will of a nonresident relative to estate within this commonwealth has been proved without the same, an authenticated copy and the certificate of probate thereof may be offered for probate in this commonwealth. When such copy is so offered the court to which it is offered shall presume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the will was duly executed and admitted to probate as will of personalty in the state or county of the testator's domicile, and shall admit such copy to probate as a will of personalty in this commonwealth. And if it appears from such copy that the will was proved in the foreign court of probate to have been so executed as to be a valid will of lands in this commonwealth by the law thereof, such copy may be admitted to probate as a will of real estate." There is no provision in chapter 135, Ky. St. 1903, titled "Wills," nor in chapter 80, Ky. St. 1903, titled "Limitations of Actions," that in any terms fix the limit of time within which wills may be probated, whether the wills are made by residents of this or foreign states.

This court decided, in the Allen-Froman Case, that section 2522, Ky. St. 1903, which is as follows: "An action for relief not provided for in this or some other chapter, can only be commenced within ten years next after the cause of action accrued"—applied to the probating of wills made by persons domiciled in this state, and wills made by nonresidents when not probated in the state of the testator's residence. This case has been followed and approved by this court in the cases of Reid's Adm'r v. Bengel, 112 Ky. 810, 66 S. W. 997, 57 L. R. A. 253, 90 Am. St. Rep. 334, and Cleveland Orphan Institution, etc., v. Helm, etc., 74 S. W. 274, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2485. In the last case cited the court said: "We are of the opinion that the principles stated in the cases above referred to are sound and should be upheld, for the reason that the public have a great interest in having a known limit fixed by law for litigation for the quiet of the community, and that there may be a certain fixed period after which the possessor may know that his title and right cannot be called in question or harassed by stale demands after witnesses of the facts are dead." It is contended that section 2522, Ky. St. 1903, applies alone to actions for relief. It is true the word "action" only is used, but section 469, Ky. St. 1903, is as follows: "The term 'action,' when used in this revision, shall be construed to include all proceedings in any court of this commonwealth." And if the probating of a will is not an action, it is certainly a proceeding to obtain relief, for the devisees and remaindermen under the will of McIntosh could not be permitted to recover the land from appellee until the will of McIntosh had been probated in Kentucky. See section 4852, Ky. St. 1903.

The probation of the will of McIntosh in Tennessee had no legal effect whatever on his lands in Kentucky. By the probaton of the will in Tennessee his property in that state was affected, and the title thereto fixed. His real estate in Kentucky could not be affected by the will, except by probating it here. See the cases of Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 465, 22 Am. Dec. 41, and Cornellison v. Browning, 10 B. Mon. 425. In the last-named case the court said: "It is an acknowledged principle of law that the title and disposition of real property is exclusively subject to the laws of the country where it is situated, which alone can prescribe the mode by which it can pass from one to another, and no title to land passes by will unless it is executed, proved, and registered conformable to the laws of the place where the property is situated." In this opinion it is expressly decided that no title passes to real estate in this state until and unless such will is executed or probated in this state according to our laws. We cannot see any reason why the statutes of limitations might be interposed to prevent the probating of a will of a person domiciled in this state or domiciled in another state, when the will has not been probated there, and not making it apply to the will of a nonresident when the will is recorded at the late domicile of the testator. The purpose of probating a will where the land is situated is to give notice of the title that the purchaser may not be imposed upon, and the necessity is just as great in the one case as the other. In the case at bar it appears that the will was made and recorded in Davidson county, Tenn., in the year 1859, and appellants made no attempt to have it probated in Hickman county, Ky., until the year 1907, or 48 years after it was executed. There was nothing placed on the record of Hickman county giving notice that appellants claimed any interest in the land. Our limitation laws are statutes of repose, and were made especially to meet such cases as the one at bar. It is a well-established policy of this state to fix in every case a limit of time for bringing actions or proceedings for relief. Hoffert v. Miller, 86 Ky. 572, 6 S. W. 447.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

2. CHAMPERTY AND MAINTENANCE (§ 7*) — SALE OF LAND HELD ADVERSELY.

Where a person living on and actually cultivating a farm held by a trustee under a will was in possession under the will which created the trust and invested the trustee with power to sell, his possession was not adverse to the trustee, but he was her tenant, and a sale of the land by the trustee under a power in the will was not champertous.

3. TRUSTS (§ 61*)—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHT OF BENEFICIARIES TO TERMINATE — ACTIVE TRUSTS.

Where a testator gave land to a trustee with the sole right to sell at any time she chose, the proceeds to be invested for or used for the benefit of testator's children, the trust was an active executory one, demanding the constant attention of the trustee and not a simple or dry trust, and, there being no time fixed for the ending of the trust during the trustee's life, it could not be limited or ended at the desire of the beneficiaries after coming of age.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Metcalfe County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Eugene Nunn against J. N. Peak and others, to vacate a deed by a trustee under a will. The amended petition was dismissed in part, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Allen Sandidge, Porter & Sandidge, and J. R. Beauchamp, for appellant. Baird & Richardson, for appellees.

BARKER, J. On the 27th day of July, 1901, James R. Nunn died at his residence in Metcalfe county, Ky., leaving a last will and testament which was duly probated by the county court. The will is as follows:

"Whereas, I, James R. Nunn, of Metcalfe county, Kentucky, do hereby make and constitute this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills, which is in manner and form as follows, viz:

"First. I desire that after my death that my burial and funeral expenses be paid out of my personal estate or cash on hand.

"Second. I will and bequeath to my wife Esther Nunn the homestead tract that we now occupy, known as the Old J. W. Nunn Homestead Tract, and the same that was allotted to me in the division of my father's estate; also all other lands adjoining the homestead tract that I may own at my death, to use, occupy and control; also all my personal estate owned by me at my death shall be used and controlled by the said Esther Nunn as she sees fit so long as she remains my widow, and in the event she should marry again and cease to be my widow, then she is to vacate said homestead and give it up to my children to be used and occupied by them and for their use and benefit, and in the event she should marry again she shall retain out of the personal property one horse and cow and a reasonable portion of the household property and turn the remainder over to my children to be used by them for their benefit.

"Third. I will and devise that all the balance of the real estate owned by me at my death be sold by my wife Esther Nunn at any time she may choose if she sees proper to do so by giving her the sole right to convey the same and also empower her to reinvest the proceeds of the sale of said lands in other lands adjoining the homestead now occupied by us, or to invest the proceeds in United States bonds, or deposit the same in bank, or to loan the same at interest that will be a safe investment for the benefit of my children, and shall not use the proceeds of the sale of said land in any way for any purpose except as above stated except what may be necessary to be used for the education and of the raising of the children, and in the event there is no sale made of the above mentioned land, my wife Esther Nunn is to have full power to control and rent the same publicly or privately as she may see fit until a sale is effected.

"It is further understood that the said Esther Nunn will have the power to sell a part of the whole of said lands or to sell each tract separately as she may see fit.

"Fourth. I will and desire that the Administrator of my father's estate, also the executor of my mother's estate, will also pay over to my said wife my entire interest that may be coming to me from her estate, both of said interests to be held by my wife, Esther Nunn, for the benefit of my children and the amount to be put at interest in some safe investment as my wife may see proper to do so.

"Fifth. And lastly I hereby appoint my wife, Esther Nunn, my sole Executrix of this my last will and testament, and that she be allowed to administer my estate under this will without being required to give bond.

"Given under my hand this the 2nd day of March, 1891.

"[Signed] James R. Nunn."

The land involved in this litigation is a part of the trust fund established by the third paragraph of the foregoing will. Just prior to the institution of this action in 1907 the trustee under the will, Mrs. Esther Nunn, sold the land in dispute to J. N. Peak for the sum of $5,000, and executed and delivered to him a conveyance therefor. Thereupon the appellant, Eugene Nunn, instituted this action to vacate the deed by which the land was conveyed by the trustee to appellee Peak. In the petition, as amended, there are many things alleged with reference to the trustee's management of the trust fund which have no bearing upon the issues before us. Much of this consists of allegations of the mismanagement of the trust fund, as well as misapplication of it. The allegations with which appellee Peak is concerned are, first, that the trustee sold him a farm for $5,000, when in reality it was worth $7,000; second, that the appellant who was one of the cestui que trust under the will, was in the possession of the farm, residing upon it as a home, and that prior to the conveyance he had informed Peak that he opposed the sale of the farm to him. These allegations we will notice in the order named. First, so much of them as tend to connect the appellee Peak with the fraudulent misapplication of the trust fund. This fraud is not charged upon him directly and we are of opinion that the language used in the petition does not charge him with any moral or legal turpitude whatever. There is no participation on the part of Peak in the wrongdoing of the trustee charged. Certainly the purchaser was under no obligation to give the seller more than he demanded for the thing to be bought. The trustee and the purchaser dealt at arm's length, unless there was some fraudulent conspiracy or collusion between them. Unless this be shown the sale must be upheld so far as this ground is concerned. Nor is this phase of the position of appellant aided by the fact that he alleges in his petition as amended, that Peak knew all of the facts set out against the trustee. Unless the purchaser was a participant in the wrongdoing, his knowledge of it in no wise affects his relation to the purchase of the farm. He had no duty connected with the trust, either to prevent its dissipation or to aid in it being made remunerative. So far as the petition shows, he came in contact with the trust fund merely as a proposed purchaser of a part of it. He had a right to buy as cheap as he could, unless the disproportion between the actual value and the price paid was so great as to raise the presumption of fraud, which does not occur in the case before us.

The other allegations of the petition with which the purchaser is concerned are those which seek to invoke the statute against champerty. We do not think the contention of appellant as to this ground for vacating the deed is sound. His was not an adverse possession to the trustee. On the contrary he held under the instrument which created the trust and invested the trustee with a her power with reference to the land. He was her tenant, and his possession was her possession. Therefore the statute against champertous sales has no application to that by the trustee under the power given by the will of J. R. Nunn, although the appellant was living upon the farm and actually cultivating it at the time. There is nothing alleged in the petition which is antagonistic to the idea that the appellant was holding the land and using and occupying it by the permission and consent of the trustee. The fact that the cestui que trust lived in the long interval elapsing between 1891 when the trust was created, and 1907, when the trustee undertook to sell the land to Peak, have become of age, does not destroy or put an end to the trust. A mere reading of the will, which we have copied in this opinion, will show that the trust fund was created for the benefit of the children of the settlor; that his wife, who is the grandmother of appellant, was made trustee and given unlimited power to sell or rent the real estate of the trust; that there is no time fixed when the trust will end during the life of the trustee, and, as said before, the fact that the cestuis que trustent have become of age does not of itself end the trust established for their benefit. The settlor evidently had unlimited confidence in the trustee. He appointed her as his executrix without bond, and gave her unlimited power, as said before, to manage the trust for the benefit of her children and grandchildren. She therefore had power to sell the land in question to the appellee Peak, and her deed to him conveyed the fee-simple title thereto. The purchaser was not bound to look to the reinvestment of the purchase money; nor could the appellant limit his grandmother's power of sale by his opposition or refusal to consent to any sale she might see fit to make. The will of his grandfather will be scanned in vain for any grant to him of a veto power on his grandmother's discretion in reference to the sale of the trust property. The confidence of the settlor was in the trustee—not in the beneficiaries. They were to be provided for, and the mere fact of the establishment of the trust without limitation as to the time negatives the idea that the settlor had confidence in the judgment of the cestuis que trustent. This is not a simple or dry trust, which may be brought to an end upon the demand of the beneficiary; on the contrary, it is an active, executory trust, demanding the management and control and attention of the trustee constantly, and therefore it cannot be limited or ended by the desire of the beneficiary. Carpenter v. Carpenter's Trustee, 119 Ky. 582, 84 S. W. 737, 68 L. R. A. 637, 115 Am. St. Rep. 275. The long time elapsing since the creation of the trust does not weaken or limit the power of the trustee to sell the trust property whenever, in her wisdom, it is for the benefit of the beneficiaries so to do. Jones v. Breed's Ex'x, 13 S. W. 366, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 896. Of course, we do not mean to be understood as holding that the trustee may fraudulently waste or dissipate the trust fund. She is accountable to the cestuis que trustent for the faithful performance of her duty under her husband's will. All of the appellant's complaint which looks in this direction is still in the court below, and can be tried out there. The circuit judge only dismissed the petition as amended in so far as it affected the purchase by Peak.

While the suit brought by appellant was pending, the purchaser, Peak, instituted an action in ejectment against him, claiming title to, and right of possession of, the farm, and alleging that appellant was wrongfully withholding it from him. As Peak only claimed title through the deed from the trustee to him, the issue arising in his suit of necessity must be tried out in this. This was evidently the opinion of all the parties to the two suits, as they were consolidated by an agreed order, and the court seems to have so treated them thereafter. It is therefore not necessary to speak further of the action in ejectment. The rights of the appellant here were settled by the demurrer to his petition as amended, and in our opinion settled correctly.

Therefore the judgment is affirmed.

CINCINNATI, N. O. & T. P. RY. CO. et al. v. RAINE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 271*) — TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS — DESTINATION OF CARRIAGE — CARRIER'S DUTY—PERFORMANCE.

When a carrier's servants know that a passenger is in the wrong car, and that he must go into another car to reach his destination, they may simply tell him what to do, and ordinarily leave him to follow their directions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 414*) — TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—SLEEPING CAR COMPANIES.

Where a passenger had ordered reservation in a sleeping car which was to be attached to the train at a junction and was permitted to sit in another sleeper until the junction was reached, she was not a passenger of the sleeping car company while so doing, and it was not responsible for the failure of its conductor to see that she got into the correct sleeper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 414.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 271*) — TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—DESIGNATION OF VEHICLE.

Plaintiff, having purchased a ticket over three railroads to Atlanta, ordered reservation in a sleeping car which she expected would be on the train she boarded. She was informed by the Pullman conductor in the train conductor's presence that that car would be incorporated into the train at a junction point, and was permitted to remain in the sleeper where she was then located until the junction was reached. After the train had left the junction point, she was informed that the Atlanta sleeper had been placed in a prior section of the train, and she was compelled to return to the point from which she started. Held, that the Pullman conductor in failing to transfer plaintiff, and in permitting her to ride in the wrong car, acted as the agent of the railroad company over whose line the train was operated to the junction point, and that it alone was liable for the damages sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—INJURY TO PASSENGERS.

When a passenger was required to alight at night at an intermediate station because she had not been placed on the right train, she appeared to be in good health. She went to a hotel, took a room, and, after a while, ordered a fire, remaining there without sleep all night, when she returned to the place from whence she started. She contracted a violent cold which seriously affected her. Held, that such physical condition was not the proximate result of the carrier's default, and that her measure of damages was the expense incurred and the value of the time lost by the delay.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boyle County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by Minnie Raine against the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

C. R. McDowell and Humphrey & Humphrey, for appellant Southern Ry. in Kentucky. C. H. Rodes, C. R. McDowell, and Kohn, Baird, Sloss & Kohn, for appellant Pullman Co. John Galvin and C. H. Rodes, for appellant Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. Robt. Harding, J. F. Vanarsdall, E. M. Hardin, and E. V. Puryear, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. Mrs. Minnie Raine lived in Atlanta, Ga. Her father lived at Harrodsburg, Ky., and she made trips about three times a year from her home to her father's. In January, 1906, she was at her father's and desired to go home on Sunday, January 7th. That morning her father called up the station agent of the Southern Railway in Kentucky at Harrodsburg by telephone, and told him that he wanted a reservation for his daughter in the sleeper for Atlanta on the train that night. The agent said he would wire Louisville and get it. That afternoon he called up the station agent, and was told by some one at the station that the reservation had been secured. The train from Louisville reached Harrodsburg about 10:35 p. m. Mrs. Raine bought a through railroad ticket to Atlanta, and with this got on the train at the day coach. She passed back, walking through two sleepers, where she found the sleeping car conductor. She asked him for the Atlanta sleeper, saying that she had a reservation in there. He told her there was no Atlanta sleeper on the train, but that there would be an Atlanta sleeper which would come from Cincinnati on the train which they would meet at Danville. Danville is 10 miles from Harrodsburg. The Southern train runs from Louisville to Danville, and there connects with the train running from Cincinnati to Atlanta. While she was talking to the Pullman conductor, the passenger conductor also came in. They told her there was a Chattanooga sleeper on that train, and she could go into it and get a reservation at once, advising her to do so as the other train was frequently late, and she might have to sit up some time if she waited for the Atlanta sleeper. She had her little boy, about six years old, with her, and, when she learned that she would have to get up about 6 o'clock in the morning if she did this, she decided not to take the Chattanooga sleeper. They then advised her to sit in the Chattanooga sleeper until she got to Danville, telling her that, when they reached Danville, that sleeper would be put next to the Atlanta sleeper, and she would only have to walk from one car to the other, while the Knoxville sleeper, in which she was then, would be put at some distance from the Chattanooga sleeper. She said that she would stay in the Knoxville sleeper with some friends, and they agreed for her to do so. When they reached Danville, the train from Cincinnati was forty minutes late. When she saw it come in, she went to the Pullman conductor, and asked him if he would not go and get her reservation for her. He answered that he was not allowed to leave his sleeper while it was standing at the station; that, as soon as they were out of Danville, he would see about it; that there would be plenty of time. When her car was attached to the other train, she again made the same request of him, and he made in effect the same answer. When the train pulled out of Danville, she and the Pullman conductor went forward and learned there was no Atlanta sleeper on that train; that the Cincinnati train had on that night been divided into two sections, the Atlanta sleeper being in the first section, and the Knoxville sleeper, in which she had been sitting, having been put in the second section. The first section was 10 miles ahead of them. She then said to the Pullman conductor: "Now, see what you have done by not attending to my reservation in Danville." He said: "Madam, I am not to blame. My clothes are on that section too." The train had only been running to Danville a month, and this Pullman conductor had never known the Cincinnati train before to run in two sections, although it happened from time to time when travel was heavy. The Chattanooga sleeper had been put in the first section, and if Mrs. Raine had taken a seat in that sleeper, instead of staying with her friends, there would have been no trouble. The section which she was in went to Knoxville. She talked the matter over with the conductor of the train. He told her that he would wire to Somerset, which was about 50 miles below, and ask that the first section be held there for her. At the next stop, at Junction City, he held his train 10 minutes and did wire to Somerset, but was unable to get an answer. When he was unable to get an answer, he came in and told Mrs. Raine the facts, and they then consulted as to what she had better do. The Pullman conductor had in his pockets the tickets of all the passengers in the Chattanooga sleeper. The Knoxville train would turn off from the main line at Oakdale, a station about half way between Somerset and Chattanooga. Mrs. Raine did not want to sit up all night, and finally concluded that she would get off there and go back to Harrodsburg, and wait there for the next train. The conductor she says advised her to do this. The conductor says she proposed it; but, however this may be, she got off voluntarily at the station, and went over to a hotel about 66 feet from the station. It was then about 1 o'clock in the morning. She was assigned to a room by the clerk, but declined at first to have a fire made. Afterwards she had a fire made, but did not go to bed. At 4 o'clock she took the train for Harrodsburg, and went back to her father's, and that evening took the train for Atlanta, and went through without trouble. But she had taken a violent cold, and this cold produced a very bad nervous condition approaching hysteria. The bad nervous condition may have been due also in part to the excitement incident to her leaving the train and sitting up all night. After she got home, she was sick for two months, and at the trial, a year or more later, her health was still infirm. She brought this suit to recover damages against the Pullman Car Company, the Southern Railway in Kentucky, and the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company. On a trial of the case a judgment was rendered in her favor against all the defendants for the sum of $4,000, and they appeal.

The only questions we deem it necessary to consider on the appeal are, first, should the jury have been instructed peremptorily to find for the defendants; second, if not, what is the proper measure of damages?

1. When Mrs. Raine came upon the sleeper, she had nothing but a railroad ticket. She had no sleeping car ticket, and she had nothing to show that she had any reservation in any sleeper. She remained in the Knoxville sleeper entirely by the courtesy of the conductor. She paid nothing for her seat in that sleeper, and it is evident that he allowed her to remain because she had her little boy with her, and she decided to stay there and talk to her friends until she got to Danville. When the servants of a carrier know that a passenger is in the wrong car and that he must go into another car, they may simply tell him what to do, and ordinarily leave him to follow their directions; but, when they tell him to keep his seat, and that they will at the proper time transfer him to the other car, and fail to do so, the company which they represent is liable. Mrs. Raine was not a passenger of the Pullman Car Company, for she had not been received as a passenger. She had simply been allowed to sit in the sleeper with her friends, and the Pullman Car Company is not answerable to her because its conductor failed to get her in the right car; for he did not represent the company as to the Atlanta sleeper and she had made no contract with the Pullman Car Company, and it owed her no duty. But, while this is so, the Pullman conductor in dealing with Mrs. Raine, who had a railroad ticket, was discharging a duty which the railroad company owed her. The train conductor was with him, and assented to what the Pullman conductor said. In undertaking to transfer Mrs. Raine at Danville to the proper sleeper, and in telling her that she might remain in the Knoxville sleeper until he so transferred her, the Pullman conductor was discharging a duty which devolved upon the Southern Railroad Company. While he might have told Mrs. Raine what to do and left her to follow his directions, a very different state of case is presented when he told her that he would transfer her to the other sleeper, and for her to sit where she was, that there was plenty of time, and he would attend to it. The passenger conductor was present when the arrangement was made, and he left her in the care of the Pullman conductor. It was incumbent on these men under the circumstances to see that the lady was transferred to the proper train. The servants of a carrier cannot mislead a passenger, to his prejudice. It is proper that a passenger should obey the instructions which he receives from them; and when they tell a passenger to keep his seat, and they will at the proper time transfer him, he has the right to trust implicitly their directions. If Mrs. Raine had not been told to keep her seat, that there was plenty of time, she might have protected herself from the consequences that followed.

We therefore conclude that the jury should have been instructed peremptorily to find for the Pullman Car Company, but that the motion for a peremptory instruction as to the Southern Railway in Kentucky was properly refused. It remains to consider whether any liability was shown on the part of the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company. Mrs. Raine did not see the conductor of this train until after it had pulled out of Danville. He did not take up her ticket, and evidently did all in his power to rectify the mistake that had occurred, for which he was in no wise responsible. She had remained in the Knoxville sleeper with the consent of the conductor of the Southern Railway, and she had come into the custody of the second line when that sleeper was attached to its train. Junction City was a proper place for her to alight, and, as said, she got off there voluntarily. We therefore conclude that there was no liability on the part of the second line; for it had perfect right to run its train in two sections and to attach the sleepers which came to it from the other line to that section, which best suited its convenience. It had no notice of Mrs. Raine's situation until she saw the conductor after the train pulled out from Danville.

2. It remains to consider what is the measure of damages as against the Southern Railway Company. Mrs. Raine by its negligence missed her train, and was delayed 24 hours in returning home. In Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Head, 119 Ky. 812, 84 S. W. 752, this court said: "The evidence presents simply a case where the railroad company agreed to furnish transportation, and failed to do so promptly, if Rupert Head was not guilty of contributory negligence in going to the wrong place for his ticket, and of this the jury must judge. But, if the railroad company was negligent in furnishing the transportation, the measures of damages is simply a reasonable compensation for the time lost by Rupert Head and any expenses he incurred by reason thereof." Mrs. Raine testifies that nobody was on the platform when she got off and that she made her way to the hotel alone, but she did not request the conductor to go with her or to furnish anybody to accompany her, or make any objection to his leaving her. The hotel was near by, and it is evident that she went directly to it. The trouble with her was not that she did not go to the hotel without difficulty, but that after she got there she went into a cold room, and stayed there for some time without a fire. Her nervousness was perhaps largely due to the fact that she remained up all night. But neither one of these things was the proximate result of the negligence of the Southern Railway in Kentucky in failing to transfer her to her train. She no doubt acted as she did without realizing the danger; but her remaining in the cold room was not due to the act of the railroad company, and all of the consequences which followed would seem to be due primarily to the violent cold which she took afterwards settling upon her stomach and impairing her digestion. A passenger who, by the negligence of a railroad company, fails to make a connection, cannot hold the railroad company responsible for consequences which a person of ordinary prudence might not reasonably anticipate as the result. A person of ordinary prudence might reasonably anticipate that one who missed his connection would have to pay a hotel bill and would have to wait until the next train, but, a well-regulated hotel being right at hand, other consequences such as these proved here should not be anticipated. Under all the circumstances, we conclude that the proper measure of damages is such expense as Mrs. Raine incurred and the value of the time which she lost by reason of her not being transferred to the Atlanta sleeper. The rule for the measure of damages in such cases is the same for both men and women; and, if this had been a man, manifestly no other damages would be allowed. There was nothing in Mrs. Raine's condition or appearance to show that she was not capable of taking care of herself, or to apprise a person of ordinary prudence that it was not safe to leave her at Junction City within a few feet of a well-regulated hotel. No recovery can be had for vexation or personal inconvenience by reason of the delay. Robinson v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 68 S. W. 24 Ky. Law Rep. 452, 57 L. R. A. 611. Mrs. Raine was treated with courtesy and kindness by all the conductors. The mistake was due to a misapprehension, the Pullman conductor not being allowed to leave his car and the railroad conductor assuming that the Pullman conductor would get her to the proper sleeper at Danville. The mistake would not have occurred had the Cincinnati train run in one section as it usually did, if the Pullman conductor had known it was liable to run in two sections. There is no fault in the case to take it out of the general rule as to the measure of damages for delay on a journey.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County. "To be officially reported."

Action by C. W. Kelley and others against J. W. Stark. From a judgment for plaintiff defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wright & McElroy and Lindsay & Edel for appellant. Sims, Du Bose & Rodas and Jno. B. Grider, for appellees.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Index.

HOBSON, J. J. C. Kelley died testate in December, 1906, a resident of Warren county. His will was duly admitted to probate, and J. W. Stark, the executor named in the will, qualified. Stark claimed that the testator had given him in his lifetime $8,000 worth of notes, and these notes he did not list in the appraisement of the estate. This suit was brought by the devisees seeking to charge him with the notes. The chancellor entered judgment in their favor, and Stark appeals.

The testator was a bachelor 78 years old at his death. He had no own brothers and sisters, but four half-brothers and a sister, the children of his father by a second marriage. By his will, which he made in the year 1892, he devised his whole estate to these brothers and the sister. He had at his death an estate consisting of land worth about $10,000, and notes and personal property, including the $8,000 in controversy, amounting to $10,000 or $11,000.

The proof for Stark is briefly as follows: D. W. Wright, who was his attorney and had written his will, testified that in February or March, 1906, Kelley was talking to him about his estate, and asked him whether he could make a gift of his notes, and whether the delivery of his notes to a person he wanted to have them would be good. Wright told him that it would be. Dr. A. C. Wright, who was his physician and old friend, testified that in March, 1906, he received a message through J. W. Stark that Kelley wanted to see him; and he and Stark went to Kelley's house in a buggy. After they had taken dinner, Kelley went to his desk, got his pocket-book, sat down between them, and commenced taking out some notes, and handing them to Stark to read and approximate the interest. Stark would take up a note and examine it, and Kelley would take another. They kept on in that way until the notes in the pocket-book were exhausted. Mr. Stark then said: "All right, Jim, I will take care of them and put them in the bank; and, when you are ready for them, they will be forthcoming." Kelley replied: "No; they are yours. I don't want them. I don't want to have anything more to do with them. They are yours absolutely. I sent for you for that, and they are yours." All the notes claimed by Stark were not handed to him in March at the time referred to by Dr. Wright, but Dr. Wright testified that he and Stark were there in May, that at the visit in March, Kelley said there were some other notes which he would hunt up and hand over to him, and that, when they were there in May, Kelley handed Stark some notes saying: "Here are those notes." Dr. Wright also testified that Kelley gave Stark his bank passbook at the time he gave him these notes. J. E. Potter testified that Stark was a first cousin of Kelley, and that they were very close and intimate friends, and had been for years, and so did several other witnesses, who also testified that Kelley spoke of John Stark and his father being the best friends that he ever had; that when he had nothing they helped him; that he had about paid them back now, but would remember them for their kindness. The kindness consisted in their lending him money without security when he had been forced into bankruptcy, by means of which he had accumulated the property he then had. W. D. Hays, who had given some notes to Kelley, testified that Kelley said to him shortly before his death that he need not be uneasy about the notes; that he had given them to Stark, the person who had done more for him than anybody else; and that, if he needed any more money, Mr. Stark might let him have it. Robert Bunch, who lived on the place with Kelley, testified that he heard Kelley say that he had given his notes to Mr. Stark; but, on cross-examination, this witness leaves it uncertain whether the notes were given for collection or as a gift.

The proof for the devisee is briefly as follows: On May 29th Stark's son borrowed of Kelley $3,000, and J. W. Stark signed the note as his surety. This $3,000 was checked out of bank by J. C. Kelley. The note was payable 12 months after date, and is one of the notes now claimed by Stark. On August 20, 1906, Stark collected from E. D. Thomas the amount of one of the notes handed to him by Kelley, and made this indorsement on it: "Paid to me for J. C. Kelley and deposited to his credit." He made a similar indorsement on the same day upon a note executed by Crit Smith. Another of the notes claimed by Stark is one for $1,400, dated February 29, 1904, given by his son with Stark as surety. On the back of this note is this indorsement: "Paid in check $84.60 this March 26, 1906." On June 6, 1906, Stark collected on one of the notes handed to him $219.50 in a check which he wrote himself, and which was made payable to J. C. Kelley. Another note included in those handed to him when Dr. Wright was present was collected by Stark the following summer, and the money was handed by him to Kelley, who in his presence paid it over to Dr. Wright on his doctor's bill. The other sums collected by Stark on the notes were all deposited to Kelley's account in the bank, and Kelley continued to draw checks upon the account as long as he lived, leaving a moderate balance to his credit at his death. When Stark did not include these notes in his appraisement, there was a hearing before the county court, and on that hearing Stark was asked to explain why, if these notes had been given to him, he deposited all the money he collected on them to Kelley's credit, and Kelley checked it out of the bank. His answer was in these words: "It was done because I understood the gift from other conversations that had occurred between Kelley and me to be complete at his death. I construed it that way myself." A negro man named John Lelley and his two sisters were old family servants. J. C. Kelley, shortly before his death, wished to make them a present of $500 each. He gave them a check for $500, and gave a note for $1,000 due December 1st, which Stark signed as his surety. After this had been done, John Kelley wanted to sell J. C. Kelley a piece of land for $200, and the latter said that he did not have any more money in bank. Stark then said: "Buy it, Jim; and Willie will advance that much, $200, on what he owes you." J. C. Kelley then said that he would take the land, and instructed John Kelley to have the deed made. On another occasion a neighbor who wanted to pay a note went over to pay it. Kelley said that Stark had his note, and that he would get it. In a day or two the neighbor came back. Kelley had the note, collected the money, and used it.

We have no doubt of the truthfulness of Dr. Wright's testimony, and we are satisfied that every fact he states occurred as he states it. We are also satisfied that J. C. Kelley intended that Stark should have the notes or so much of them as were left at his death; but the evidence leaves no room for doubt that Kelley actually controlled the funds as long as he lived. While what occurred in Dr. Wright's presence would be sufficient to show a gift if it stood alone, that conversation must be taken in connection with other conversations between the two parties and their subsequent conduct when we come to determine its legal effect. While it would seem that Kelley was willing to give this property to Stark, Stark did not accept the gift, but held the notes for Kelley, acting no doubt upon what he considered to be his old friend's real purpose. In other words, he did not consider that Kelley meant to strip himself then of a large part of his estate, but he understood that he meant that he was to have this property when Kelley died; and this is manifestly shown by Kelley's subsequent conduct. It is evident that the $1,000 that was given to the two old servants, as well as the $200 to be paid for the land, was to come out of the $3,000 note which Stark's son had executed with his father as surety.

To constitute a gift inter vivos, the property must be delivered absolutely, and the gift must go into immediate effect. Where future control over the property remains in the donor until his death, there is no valid gift inter vivos. 20 Cyc. 1211; 14 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 1015; 4 Words and Phrases, 3092. In Duncan v. Duncan, 5 Litt. 12, this court said: "It is perfectly clear that the court below was mistaken in supposing that the transaction in this case amounted to a valid gift inter vivos. To the validity of such a gift it is essential that there should be a delivery to the donee, and that the property of the thing given should immediately pass and be irrevocable by the donor." In Knott's Adm'r v. Hogan, 4 Metc. 100, the court again said: "In relation to the various requisites of a valid gift, a vast amount of obstruse learning is to be found in the decisions of the courts, English and American, upon this subject. And, conflicting as those opinions are upon most other points, it seems to be agreed, on all hands, that it is essential to every gift of this class that it should be irrevocable by the donor.

But it is insisted that the gift may be sustained as a gift causa mortis. A gift causa mortis exists where property is given by the donor in his last sickness, or in other imminent peril. It takes effect only in the event of his death by the existing disorder or peril. The answer in this case does not plead any facts to show a gift causa mortis. In a gift causa mortis the gift becomes absolute at the death of the donor, and not before. It is revocable by him at any time during life. The answer alleges simply that the decedent several months prior to his death gave the notes to the defendant, and then and there delivered them into his hands as an absolute gift which he then and there accepted. The allegations of the pleading exclude the idea of a gift causa mortis. Not only so, but the proof is insufficient to show a gift causa mortis. When Dr. Wright and Stark were there in March, Kelley was up and going about the house. He had no physician. He did not need Dr. Wright as a physician. His mind was as clear as a bell. In April he had an attack of pneumonia, but after he recovered from that in May he went off to the springs, and during the summer and fall after his return from the springs he attended to his business as usual. In the case of Duncan v. Duncan above referred to the court, after showing that the transaction then before the court could not be sustained as a gift causa mortis, said: "The transaction has, however, a still greater analogy to a nuncupative will than it has to either a gift inter vivos or a donatio mortis causa. It was undoubtedly the intention of the intestate that the property of the bonds in question should at his death be vested in the defendants, and this intention seems never to have been revoked in his lifetime. As a nuncupative will, the transaction might, therefore, have taken effect, we apprehend according to the principles of the common law. But, by the statute of this country concerning wills, certain requisites are made essential to the validity of a nuncupative will, no one of which has been complied with in this instance, and the transaction, as a nuncupative will, is therefore void." We think that this applies equally to the case before us. The testator did not relinquish control over the property in his lifetime. He made a verbal arrangement which was intended to take effect at his death, and to sustain such a transaction would be practically to enforce a nuncupative will.

The conclusion we have reached on the merits of the controversy makes it unnecessary for us to consider what notes were handed by the testator to Stark, or to pass on the question whether Dr. Wright's testimony, taken as a whole, is sufficient to show that all the notes in controversy were handed to Stark by the testator. The testimony on Stark's behalf would warrant a judgment in his favor, but for his own frank admission that he held the notes for the testator because of other conversations between them when Dr. Wright was not present.

Judgment affirmed.

MOREHEAD v. CITIZENS' DEPOSIT BANK.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 423*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—PARTIES TO NOTE—NATURE OF LIABILITY.

In determining whether one occupied the relation of surety on a note, the court may, as between the original parties, consider parol testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1964; Dec. Dig. § 423.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 519*)—LIABILITIES OF PARTIES—SURETY—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that one was a surety on a note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 519.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 122*) — ACCOMMODATION PAPER—LIABILITY OF MAKER.

As between himself and the party accommodated, the maker of accommodation paper is a surety, and his right to recourse against the party accommodated is that of a surety against his principal, and as to other holders of the paper his liability is in general that of a similar party, maker, acceptor, or indorser, who receives value, but he is so far a surety, as to holders with notice of his accommodation character, that he is discharged by arrangements made to his prejudice with the principal debtor without his knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 255, 259; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 122*) — ACCOMMODATION PAPER—LIABILITY OF MAKER.

A person who executed a collateral note simply as accommodation paper, with a distinct understanding with the payee that he was a surety only for a third person executing a note to the payee, is released under circumstances that will release any other surety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

5. PLEDGES (§ 25*)—ACCOMMODATION PAPER—LIABILITY OF MAKER.

The general doctrine is that the renewal of a note secured by collateral security does not release the collateral.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pledges, Cent. Dig. § 60; Dec. Dig. § 25; Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 857.]

6. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 105*)—ACCOMMODATION PAPER—LIABILITY OF MAKER.

A payee who accepts from the maker a renewal note in consideration of the payment of interest in advance cannot sue the maker until the maturity of the renewal note, and a surety of the maker, having no knowledge of the renewal note, is therefore released from liability, especially where the maker at the time of the renewal was solvent and has since become a bankrupt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 191; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

7. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 129*)—LIABILITY OF SURETY—ESTOPPEL.

Evidence held not to estop the surety on a note from relying on his release from liability because of the payee's acceptance from the maker of a renewal note in consideration of the payment of interest in advance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

8. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 129*) — LIABILITY OF SURETY—ESTOPPEL.

The fact that an attorney of a surety on a note offered to pay the note under the mistaken belief that the surety was liable, when, as a matter of fact, he had been released, did not estop the surety from defending on the ground that he had been released.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McLean County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Citizens' Deposit Bank against J. T. Morehead. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wm. B. Noe and J. W. Boston, for appellant. Ben D. Ringo and Joe H. Miller, for appellee.

CLAY, C. J. W. Morehead, a son of appellant, was indebted to the Citizens' Deposit Bank in the sum of $750. The bank agreed that, if he would execute a note for this sum and secure the note by proper collateral, he could have further time within which to pay his debt. He then went to his father, J. T. Morehead, and brought him to the bank. There the president of the bank explained to him that it was necessary to have a surety for the note executed by his son, and appellant, after some hesitation, acquiesced in the arrangement. For the purpose of carrying out the arrangement, he executed a note payable one day after date for the sum of $750 to J. T. Morehead Company, the firm name under which J. W. Morehead was doing business. This note was then indorsed by J. W. Morehead for the firm, and delivered to the bank. The note of J. W. Morehead was not paid at maturity, but was renewed some three or four times thereafter, and the interest paid thereon. After all these renewals were made, and after the expiration of about two years and a half, the bank sued J. T. Morehead on the collateral note held by it. He defended on the ground that he was in effect a surety for his son, J. W. Morehead, on the original note of $750 executed by him to the bank; that after J. W. Morehead's note became due it was renewed three or four times, and the interest paid thereon; that this was done without his knowledge or consent; that such renewals operated to his prejudice, and served to release him from his liability as surety. The court rendered judgment for plaintiff below, and the defendant appeals.

The first question is: Did J. T. Morehead

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes occupy the relation of surety on the note of J. W. Morehead? For the purpose of determining this question, we are not confined solely to the instrument executed, but may consider parol evidence. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 343. According to the testimony of appellant, he signed the note as collateral security for the note executed by his son. The president of the Citizens' Deposit Bank testified as follows: "J. W. Morehead at that time was indebted to the bank in the sum of $750, which amount was then due. I requested of him that said note or debt herein be paid or secured in some manner; if he desired to get any extension of time on it, it must be secured. Some time after I had informed him of that fact he and his father came to the bank—it was not in my office—and he proposed the execution of this note at that time by his father, J. T. Morehead, to be given as collateral security to be executed by his father, J. T. Morehead, to him, and which note he assigned to the bank as collateral security, at the same time executing his note with which this was filed as collateral security for $750, and he was given four months' time from that date by the execution of those notes. Q. What conversation did you have with Mr. J. T. Morehead at that time about this transaction? A. They came in, and it is a fact that when the nature of the case was stated that we required a surety for the execution of this note Mr. J. T. Morehead did have some hesitancy in signing the note, and eventually he said he would sign it as it was his boy, and he wanted to help him out, and he was willing to do that much for him." It is manifest from the foregoing that J. T. Morehead regarded himself in the light of a surety upon the $750 note of his son, and that the president of the bank regarded him in the same light and accepted the collateral note with full knowledge of the relation which J. T. Morehead sustained to the note of his son. We think the rule is now well established that, as between himself and the party accommodated, the accommodation party is in effect a surety, and his right to recourse against the party accommodated is that of a surety against the principal debtor. As to other holders of the paper, his liability is in general that of a similar party (maker, acceptor, or indorser) who receives value, but he is so far a surety as to holders with notice of his accommodation character that he will be discharged by arrangements made to his prejudice with the principal debtor without his knowledge. 7 Cyc. 725; Guild v. Butler, 127 Mass. 386; Price County Bank v. McKenzie, 91 Wis. 658, 65 N. W. 507. Applying this principle to the case under consideration, we find that the collateral note was simply an accommodation paper; that it was executed with the distinct understanding with the bank that J. T. Morehead was in effect a surety on the $750 note executed by his son to the bank. This arrangement was effected, not only with the knowledge of the bank, but by agreement with

Counsel for appellee insist, however, that the rule is that the renewal of a note secured by collateral security does not have the effect to release any of the collateral pledged to secure it. There can be no doubt that this is the general doctrine and is recognized in this court in Bank of America v. McNeill, 10 Bush, 54, and Koehler v. Hussey, 57 S. W. 241, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 317; but the facts in those cases bear no similarity to the case now under consideration. The note in this case was not merely collateral deposited to secure the payment of a debt from J. W. Morehead to the bank, but was a note executed and secured by virtue of an arrangement with the bank whereby it was agreed that J. T. Morehead was a surety upon the note of his son. We therefore conclude that he should be released under the same circumstances and conditions that any other surety should be released.

The record in this case shows that the original note was renewed some three or four times. The last renewal which is filed with the petition in this case, is for the sum of only $750, with interest from the date of maturity. This indicates, not only that the interest on the note was paid, but that it was paid in advance. The acceptance of the interest thus paid was sufficient consideration for the renewal of the note. By accepting the new note under such circumstances, the bank put it out of its power to sue the principal debtor until the renewed note became due. This was true in the case of each of the renewals. Therefore, during each period of renewal, appellant could not have paid off the indebtedness of his son and taken steps to protect himself. We therefore conclude that he was prejudiced by the renewals made without his knowledge or consent, and that such action on the part of the bank released him from liability on the collateral note sued on in this action. Stegman v. Jackson, Sr., 102 S. W. 329, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 434; Post v. Losey, 111 Ind. 74, 12 N. E. 121, 60 Am. Rep. 677; Perley v. Lowe, 17 U. C. Q. B. 279; Alley v. Hopkins, 98 K. 668, 34 S. W. 13, 56 Am. St. Rep. 382. Especially should we hold this in view of the further fact that there is proof tending to show that J. W. Morehead was solvent at the time of the first renewal, and appellant might, if the bank had not made such renewals, take steps to protect himself.

But appellee insists that a note, amounting to $1,000, was filed against the estate of J. W. Morehead, who was adjudged a bankrupt, in favor of appellant, and that a note of $200 was also filed in favor of his attorney, which notes were filed for the purpose of securing appellant in the payment of the collateral note of $750 sued on in this action; that such action was a recognition by appellant of his liability to appellee, and constitutes an act of estoppel. Appellant an-his son both swear that the latter was indebted to the former in the sum of $1,200 to $1,400. Opposed to this testimony is that of certain statements made by the son to the effect that he owed his father nothing. There is also the circumstance that, when appellant's attorney collected appellant's pro rata on the notes filed in the bankruptcy proceedings, he went to the bank and deposited the proceeds with it, to be applied on the note of $750. A few minutes thereafter, however, he returned to the bank and agreed to pay the money on the note of $750 executed by appellant, provided the bank would release appellant from further liability thereon. He claims that he reconsidered his action because he realized the fact that, in paying the money absolutely in the first instance, he was acting without authority. We do not think these facts are sufficient to estop appellant from setting up the defense made to the note sued on. The preponderance of evidence is to the effect that the son did owe the father. Even if appellant's attorney, under the mistaken belief that he was still liable as surety, had offered to make a payment on the note, this fact alone would not estop him from defending on the ground that he had been released, when, as a matter of fact, he had been released. Brandt on Suretyship, § 160; Robinson v. Offutt, etc., 7 T. B. Mon. 540.

Being of the opinion that the collateral note sued on is simply accommodation paper, that it was accepted by the bank with the full knowledge and understanding that appellant was a mere surety on the note executed by his son, that the bank, without the knowledge or consent of appellant and for a valuable consideration, renewed the son's note on three or four occasions, and that appellee has shown no facts which would estop appellant from setting up the defense relied on, we therefore conclude that appellant has been released from all liability.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

WILLIAMS, KOHLER & BARRIER v. YATES.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 303*)—BREACH.

Where plaintiff agreed to set piling for new railroad construction to be furnished on the ground by defendants, who failed to furnish them as needed, so that plaintiff was delayed and finally refused to work until the piles were put on the ground, which was not done within the time specified in the contract, plaintiff was entitled to recover the damages sustained.

2. DAMAGES (§ 124*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—PROFITS—DELAY.

Defendants failed to furnish the material promptly, so that plaintiff was delayed in setting the piles on a portion of the road and was prevented altogether from setting them on another portion. Held, that plaintiff could recover his loss of profits on the work he was prevented from doing, measured by the difference between the reasonable cost of the work and the contract price and the necessary loss and any expense necessarily incurred on the work he actually did.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ohio County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by J. A. Yates against Williams, Kohler & Barrier. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Heavrin & Woodward, for appellants. H. P. Taylor, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. Williams, Kohler & Barrier, as contractors, undertook the building of a part of the Madisonville, Hartford & Eastern Railroad. J. A. Yates was a subcontractor under them by a written contract with them by which he agreed to drive all the piles, and they were to furnish the material on the ground; he undertaking to have the work finished by the 10th day of November, 1907. On February 20, 1908, he brought this suit against them, alleging that he had entered upon the work, but that they had failed to furnish him the material on the ground, and had thus delayed him and his men, and kept them idle for many days, and that they had finally refused to allow him to prosecute the contract, and had discharged him in violation of the contract. They filed an answer, controverting the allegations of the petition, and charging, in substance, that he had abandoned the contract and refused to complete it. A trial was had before a jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $400, on which judgment was entered, and the defendants appeal.

The evidence was very conflicting. That for the plaintiff tended to show that he was greatly delayed in the work by the failure of the defendants to furnish him the piles as they were needed, that he finally refused to work until the piles were put on the ground, and that this was not done within the time stipulated by the contract. His testimony also tended to show that, if the material had been furnished him, he could have done the work in the time limited. On the other hand, the proof for the defendants tended to show that he did his work unskillfully, that he lost money on what he did, and that the defendants lost money by his not doing the work, as they had to pay more to have it done than they would have paid him. But we think the evidence does show that the piles were not furnished as provided by the contract, and that Yates was, in fact, delayed by the failure of the defendants to furnish him the piles. The court instructed the jury in substance as follows:

(1) If the defendants failed to place the piling on the right of way, and as a consequence the plaintiff was delayed in the work, they should find for the plaintiff the damages he sustained.

(2) If they refused to comply with the contract, and as a consequence the plaintiff was unreasonably delayed in the work beyond the contract limit, or if the defendants let the contract to another, or refused to permit him to further prosecute it, they should find for him the damages he thereby sustained.

(3) If they found for the plaintiff under No. 1, the measure of damages would be the fair value of actual time lost or expense incurred by reason of the defendant's failure to place the piles on the ground in the proper time.

(4) If they found for the plaintiff under No. 2, the measure of their finding would be the difference between the cost of doing the work and the sum to be realized under the contract for it when completed.

If the material had been placed on the right of way in time, all that Yates could have made out of the contract would have been the profit on the work. It is insisted that he was not entitled to both the profit on the work and the value of the time lost while he was waiting for the piles. In Blood v. Herring, 61 S. W. 278, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1725, the plaintiff sued for damages for being deprived of his contract to saw a large quantity of lumber, alleging that he would have realized a large profit therefrom, and also alleging that his teams and mules remained idle by reason of his not being able to do the sawing. He sought judgment both for the profit he would have made on the sawing and damages for his teams and mules being idle. The court held that the latter claim could not be considered; and all that could be recovered was the reasonable profit on the contract. That is not this case. Here Yates did a part of the work, and then quit. If he was delayed in doing the work he did, he may recover a reasonable compensation for any time that he necessarily lost or any expenses he had necessarily incurred by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish him the material on the right of way as specified in the contract. And, if he was prevented from performing the remainder of the contract by the failure of the defendants to furnish him the material as required by the contract, he may recover on so much of the work as he did not perform, the profit which he thus lost, the measure of recovery being the difference between the reasonable cost of doing the work and the contract price. The proof shows that Yates put in the piles east of Green river, but that he put in none on that part of the railroad which was west of Green river. He was delayed in doing the work east of Green river by the piles not being furnished in time, and for the delay thus caused he was permitted to recover under instructions 1 and 3. He was prevented from doing any of the work west of Green river, and for his loss of profits on this work he was allowed to recover under instructions 2 and 4. He was not allowed to recover for his loss of time and loss of profits on the same work, but he was allowed to recover only for his loss of time on the work he did and his loss of profits on the work he was prevented from doing. Manifestly, if he suffered a loss on the work he did east of Green river from the defendants failing to furnish him the material in time, his right to recover for this loss cannot be affected by their subsequent conduct preventing him from doing the work west of that river.

The court gave the jury the instructions which the defendants asked, and, when these instructions are read in connection with those above referred to, the whole law of the case was fairly presented to the jury. While the evidence might well have justified a different verdict, we cannot say the verdict is so against the evidence as to warrant us in disturbing it.

Judgment affirmed.

NUNN, J. In the year 1846 one Enoch Stone was in possession of between 4,000 and 5,000 acres of land on Quicksand creek, then in Breathitt county, Ky., now Knott county, claiming to a well-defined and marked boundary extending to the tops of the ridges on each side of the creek. In that year he conveyed this boundary of land to John Conley, Sr., who took possession of and resided on it, claiming it as his own to the outer boundary, until the year 1898. It appears that between the years 1850 and 1858 Conley became doubtful about his title, not being able to find any title to Stone, and obtained eight or ten small patents, several for 200 acres and several for 50 acres each. These patents included his dwelling and inclosures, but he still continued to claim to the boundary called for in his deed from Stone. In the year 1872 there was granted unto one Stephen G. Reid a patent from the commonwealth for 154,000 acres of land, lying and being in what was then Breathitt county, Ky. In this patent the following words were used: "This survey contains 25,800 acres of patented and otherwise appropriated land, which is deducted from the calculation." It is agreed by all the parties to this action that the land in controversy, to wit, the John Conley, Sr., survey, as purchased from Stone, is situated within the Stephen G. Reid patent boundary. In the year 1886, while Conley was confined to his bed with sickness, he caused all his children, ten in number, to be assembled in his home, and while lying on his bed he took a pencil and drew upon a slate a division of this survey of land among nine of his children, and executed a title bond to each of them for their respective portion. He gave the bonds to his wife, and directed her to place them in a tin box in her trunk. After Conley recovered from that sickness, and during that year or the next, he sold this survey of land to one J. M. Bailey at the price of $2 per acre, and executed to Bailey a bond for title upon the payment of the purchase money. In the year 1888 it appears that John Conley's sons, to wit, John M. Conley, Reuben Conley, and Robert Conley, each obtained patents from the commonwealth for 200 acres of land, each of which covered land lying with the survey sold by their father to Bailey, and also covered their father's home and inclosures. After this, and about the year 1890, their father, John Conley, Sr., sued Bailey for the purchase price which he had agreed to pay Conley for the land. Bailey made defense, stating that various persons claimed considerable parts of the survey which he had bought, and that their claims were situated on the outside boundary of the survey. During the pendency of that action Bailey and Conley compromised, Bailey agreeing to pay Conley $5,000, and Conley was to make him a perfect title to the land. Bailey then sold about 3,700 timber trees from the land, Conley agreeing to it upon the condition that he was to be paid $1 for each tree so sold and delivered. This agreement was performed, and Bailey paid him the balance of the purchase price in money, as was adjudged by the circuit court in another action brought by Conley against Bailey for the purchase price. In this second action Bailey was contending that his vendor, John Conley, Sr., was not able to make him a good title to this land, for the reason that his three sons, above named, had patented 200 acres each of it. There was then filed in this second action a deed purporting to have been executed and acknowledged by these boys and all the children of John Conley, Sr., by which they released to their father all interest and claims they had in the survey of land. The court then adjudged that Conley's title was perfect, and directed the court's commissioner to execute to Bailey a deed to this survey of land. The commissioner complied with this order, describing the land as described in the deed from Enoch Stone to John Conley, Sr. Within a year or two after this John Conley, Sr., and one or two of his sons, were in possession of the land, and Bailey instituted an action in ejectment against them, and obtained a judgment by default. Then John Conley, Sr., with such of his children as resided with him, moved off of the land over on to Salt Lick creek, where he resided until his death in 1905. In the year 1903 Bailey sold and conveyed the land to one F. W. Fletcher, who afterwards sold and conveyed to appellee.

The record before us contains the papers in three actions. One of them is the record of the action of the Conley children, whose names appear to the deed to John Conley, Sr., releasing and conveying all their interest of every kind they owned or claimed in the survey of land described, and which deed was filed in the second action of John Conley, Sr., against Bailey and which was sought to be canceled in an action by the children against their father and Bailey, for the reason, as they alleged, their names were forged to it. The second action was brought by the children of John Conley, Sr., against J. M. Bailey, by which they sought to have set aside the default judgment in ejectment, the suit referred to in which Bailey recovered from John Conley, Sr., and his children the tract of land in controversy. The reason for setting aside the judgment, as alleged, was because it was obtained by the fraud of Bailey. The third action is the one of appellee against one of the children, Reuben Conley, of John Conley, Sr., and a son-in-law of his, Ira Howard, and two others, Wiley Howard and Jasper Mann. That action was brought in ejectment, and the defendants answered. Reuben Conley claimed only a small part of the land, to wit, the boundary of his patent dated in 1888. The other defendants stated that they were tenants of the other children of Conley, Sr. Robert Conley and John M. Conley, Jr., filed their petition in the action and asked to be made a party defendant, and alleged that they were the owners of all the boundary of land conveyed by Stone to their father. They claimed under a conveyance made by their father to them of date the 25th day of May, 1908. Several courts passed, and they filed an amended answer by which they set up claim to a portion of the Stone boundary covered by their patents of 200 acres each issued to them by the commonwealth in 1888. By this amendment they apparently abandoned their claim to the whole of the land under the deed from their father. Several more terms of court elapsed and they filed another amended answer, in which they were joined by seven other brothers and sisters, by which they claimed all the boundary of land, conveyed by Stone to their father under the title bonds executed by their father to them in the year 1886. These bonds were never recorded. They alleged that Bailey knew the fact that these bonds had been executed by their father when he purchased the land. Appellee filed a reply, alleging that the bonds were a forgery, and that, if executed by their father, they were never delivered in his lifetime, and denied that Bailey had any knowledge of them at the time he purchased the land from their father. There was much proof taken in the three cases. The testimony taken in the action to cancel the deed from the children to their father for the alleged reason that it was a forgery, and in the action to vacate the default judgment in the case of J. M. Bailey against two or three of the children and their father, was very conflicting, much of it conducing to show that the deed was forged and that the judgment was obtained by fraud. But it is unnecessary for us to pass upon these questions, having arrived at the conclusion that they do not affect the real question in the case.

As stated before, the judgment of 1898, in the action between Conley and Bailey, adjudged that John Conley, Sr., had a good title to this survey of land, and directed the court's commissioner to convey it to J. M. Bailey. On the next day after the judgment was rendered, to wit, November 9th, 1898, the commissioner, George Clark, presented in open court a deed executed by himself, as commissioner, to J. M. Bailey in accordance with the judgment rendered on the previous day. On this deed the following indorsement appears: "Acknowledged by George Clark, Commissioner. Examined and approved in open court, this 19th day of November, 1898. A. J. Auxler, Judge." By this deed J. M. Bailey became possessed of all the title John Conley, Sr., had to the survey of land. Appellants contend that the lower court erred in allowing this deed to be read as evidence of title in Bailey, for the reason that no copy of the order of court approving the deed was presented as evidence. Under the authority of the case of Helton v. Belcher, 114 Ky. 17, 70 S. W. 295, this was not required. In this case the court said: "But when, under the statute, the approval of the court is indorsed on the deed, this evidences the authority of the commissioner to make it. There is a presumption in favor of the regularity of judicial proceedings, and the deed so indorsed is therefore prima facie regular. The production of the judgment would show nothing more than the indorsement of the court's approval on the deed shows. This indorsement entitles the deed to be recorded, and a copy of this record is prima facie evidence under the statute." In this case there was filed as evidence a copy of the judgment authorizing and directing the commissioner to make the conveyance and the deed to Bailey with the approval and indorsement thereon made by the judge of the court. Therefore the court properly allowed it to be read as evidence.

John M. Conley, Jr., and Reuben Conley obtained no interest in this land by reason of the conveyances from their father to them of date 1908, for the reason that whatever interest their father had in the land passed from him at the date of the commissioner's deed, to wit, November 19, 1898, and therefore he had no title to pass to his sons, Reuben and John. We are of the opinion, also, that at the date of the commissioner's deed John Conley, Sr., had a good title to this land; for he had been in possession of it claiming it as his own to a well-marked and defined boundary, under the Stone deed from the year 1846, for a period of more than 50 years. The patents of 200 acres each, originally issued to John Conley, Jr., one to Reuben Conley and one to E. L. Conley in the year 1888, are void, for the reason that the commonwealth had prior to that date, to wit, 1872, issued a patent to Reid covering every foot of the land their patents contained.

With reference to the claims of the children of John Conley, Sr., under the bonds for title executed by John Conley, Sr., we feel that it is unnecessary to consider the evidence in detail. It is sufficient to say, after a careful examination of the evidence, that we are of the opinion that the bonds were never delivered in the lifetime of John Conley, Sr., to his children; and, if delivered, they were never recorded, and the evidence is equivoquant upon the question as to whether Bailey had actual notice of the existence of the bonds when he purchased the land from Conley. E. L. Conley, one of the children, testified that Bailey did know of them, and Bailey swears that he did not. We are therefore of the opinion that the claims of the children under these title bonds cannot affect the title of Bailey, his vendee, or the appellee, Breathitt Coal, Iron & Lumber Company.

Appellants also plead the champerty statute, claiming that the defendants to the Breathitt Coal, Iron & Lumber Company's action were in possession of the land claiming it adversely when Bailey sold it to Fletcher, and also when Fletcher sold it to appellee. The proof upon this question is also conflicting. The preponderance of it, however, shows that the Howards and Mann were each on the land as tenants of Bailey, that Reuben Conley left the land about the time his father did, and returned to it about the time, or just after appellee instituted this action.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SCHWEIRMAN v. TOWN OF HIGHLAND PARK et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 19, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 12*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—POPULATION OF TOWNS.

Under Const. § 156, providing that towns with a population of less than 1,000 shall be assigned to the sixth class, the court will take judicial notice that the population of a town of that class does not exceed 1,000.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 69*)—LICENSES—DISCRETION—STATUTES.

Ky. St. 1903, § 3704, provides that, in any town of the sixth class having voted for the sale of liquor, the board of trustees shall have no right to refuse licenses until another election is held and a vote returned against such sale. Held, that the board of trustees of a town of the sixth class, which had voted to permit the sale of liquor, still had discretion as to the number of licenses to be granted, and, having already granted four licenses, properly refused to grant a fifth application, though there was no objection against the applicant or his proposed place of business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 73; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 69*)—NATURE OF LICENSE.

A liquor license is not a right or privilege that any citizen may demand, but is in the nature of a favor that may or may not be granted according to the discretion of those in authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 73; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division. "To be officially reported."

Mandamus by J. F. Schweirman against the board of trustees of the town of Highland Park and others. From an order dismissing the writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur B. Bessinger and Wm. Perry, for appellant. A. W. Dorsey, W. T. McNally, and T. A. McDonald, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. The appellant Schweirman sought in this proceeding to compel by mandamus the board of trustees of Highland Park, a town of the sixth class, to grant him a license to sell by retail intoxicating liquors. The judge before whom the application was made refused to grant the relief sought, and as a result this appeal was prosecuted. In September, 1906, the town of Highland Park, at an election held for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the people as to whether or not they wished spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors sold, voted in favor of the sale. Ky. St. 1903, § 3704, subd. 4, provides in part that:

"No licenses for any business or to any person shall be granted for a longer time than one year, and the granting of licenses shall be under the exclusive control of the board of trustees who may refuse to grant licenses in its discretion, provided: that in any town of the sixth class in which the question as to whether or not spirituous, vinous and malt liquors might or should be sold has been since September first, one thousand, eight hundred and ninety two, or shall hereafter be submitted to the voters thereof, and a majority of the votes cast thereat were or shall be in favor of the sale of such liquors therein, then the said board of trustees of such town shall have no right, power, privilege or discretion to refuse to grant licenses to sell such liquors therein until another election is held therein as provided by general laws and a majority of the voters in said town have voted against the sale of such liquors."

It is the contention of appellant that under this statute the board of trustees have no discretion to exercise in the matter of whether or not licenses shall be granted if the application is made in the proper way, the applicant a person of good moral character, and the place at which he desires to establish his business is suitable for the purpose, but must grant the license.

The argument for appellee is that, although the applicant may be a person of good moral character, and his application be presented at the proper time and place, and there be no substantial objection to the locality in which it is proposed to carry on the business, yet the board of trustees for other reasons, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, may refuse to grant a license. For the purposes of what we desire to say, it may be conceded that the record shows that the applicant possessed the necessary qualifications to entitle him to a license, that he applied for the license in the manner provided by law, and that the place where he desired to carry on and conduct his business was not objectionable. So that it narrows down to the question whether or not, in a state of case like this, the board of trustees have any discretion.

At the time the application for license was made there were four saloons in the town at which intoxicating liquors were sold by retail. The record does not disclose the population of the place, but in view of the fact that it is a sixth-class town we may take judicial notice of the fact that the population does not exceed 1,000. The Constitution, § 156, provides that towns with a population of less than 1,000 shall be assigned to the sixth class, and towns with a population of 1,000 or more, and less than 3,000, to the fifth class. But, if the board of trustees have no discretion at all in the matter, the number of existing saloons would not give them the right to deny a license to any person or persons possessing the necessary qualifications who made application in the proper manner to sell at a suitable place. We do not, however, think that it was intended by the statute to limit the right of the board of trustees to refuse licenses only to such persons as do not possess the necessary personal qualifications, or who do not apply in the regular way, or who desire to set up in business at a place to which substantial objection might be made. The board, on the one hand, is not authorized, under the statute, to arbitrarily or capriciously refuse to grant a license, nor, on the other hand, is it deprived of all discretion. The trustees have not the power of prohibition, but, in our opinion, have the right to decide how many saloons are required for the convenience and needs of the town, whose people have said they wanted them.

In Riley v. Rowe, 112 Ky. 817, 66 S. W. 999, the court had under consideration a case similar to this, and in the course of the opinion it was said: "The language, 'then the said board of trustees of said town shall have no right, power, privilege or discretion to refuse to grant licenses to sell such liquors therein until another election is held,' does not aptly convey the idea that the trustees are to have no discretion as to what applicant shall be licensed. The terms used simply deny them power to refuse to grant licenses. * * * It has long been the settled legislative policy in the state to regulate the sale of spirituous liquors and to grant licenses only to persons of good moral character, at such places as were reasonably suitable, in such numbers as the public service probably required. Experience has shown that the selling of whisky by persons of bad character is especially injurious to the community, and most likely to bring about fraud and imposition on those who drink. It has also been shown by experience that the multiplication of saloons beyond the demands of the community also leads to bad results. * * * The vote in favor of the sale does not have the effect to invest in every party the right to open and run a saloon who will pay the license fee, regardless of his fitness, or the judgment of the trustees as to the necessity of the saloon or the wishes of the neighborhood. The vote only settles the question that they must issue licenses. They have no discretion to refuse to grant licenses—that is, to license nobody. But neither the language used, nor the context, requires the construction that they were to license all applicants without regard to their character, the needs of the community, or the wishes of the neighborhood in which the saloon was to be located."

The principles announced in this case were reaffirmed in George v. Winchester, 118 Ky. 428, 80 S. W. 1158; Conlee v. Clay City, 102 S. W. 862, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 533.

The board of trustees in these towns are elected by the people for the purpose of managing and controlling the affairs of the town within statutory limits. It is to be presumed that they will perform faithfully their duties by carrying out the reasonable will and wish of the people in respect to municipal affairs. It was not intended by the statute to take from these boards the exercise of all discretion, and to compel them, although it might be manifestly detrimental to the growth and prosperity of the town, hurtful to its morals, and injurious to its business, to issue licenses to every applicant who possesses the statutory qualifications and complied with the other requisites. But, as well said in Riley v. Rowe, supra, the object of the statute was to deny these boards the right to refuse to grant licenses to any person, thereby defeating the will of the people after they had declared in favor of the sale of liquor at an election held for that purpose. Of course, it is difficult to say how many saloons shall do business in a town, or what number of licenses the board may be compelled to grant, or at what point the mandatory requirements of the statute shall be satisfied, so that each case must be adjudged by the facts and circumstances applicable to it. But manifestly there is a point in respect to numbers alone beyond which the statute does not enjoin upon the trustees the imperative duty of issuing licenses. There is a place at which in this particular their discretion begins, and this discretion the courts will not interfere with or seek to control unless it is clearly abused. Although the board in cases like this cannot refuse to grant any licenses, we hold that they may exercise a reasonable discretion in determining how many saloons are necessary to afford the citizens of the town the privilege they obtained by voting in favor of the sale of liquor. It is also well to keep in mind that it is the interest of the town and its people, and not the interest of the applicant or the particular citizen, not only in respect to liquor licenses but concerning municipal affairs generally, that the board of trustees is charged with the duty of looking after. When the people in Highland Park voted in favor of the sale of whisky, they simply meant to assert that they were in favor of licensed saloons and the sale of liquor thereat; not that they wished to fix the number of saloons or designate the persons who should obtain licenses. Nor does the statute undertake to declare how many persons shall be licensed, but only that licenses must be granted to some person. If the board of trustees of a little town in which there are four licensed saloons have no discretion to refuse licenses to other applicants, then every person possessing the proper qualifications who is willing to pay the license fee must upon proper application be granted a license, without regard to the convenience, necessities, or demands of the people, and although the number might greatly exceed the needs of the community and be a positive disadvantage to all persons engaged in the business, to say nothing of the inhabitants generally, or some applicant must be discriminated against. Along this line the argument is made that if the trustees have the authority to limit the number of licenses, and the persons to whom they may be granted, it will result in favoritism—that licenses will only be granted to those who have the ear of the board. This may in some instances be true, but we know of no scheme that has ever been devised that will prevent this sort of inequality. In every case in which boards or bodies of men are vested with the discretion to appoint persons to office or place or give them privileges not enjoyed by the body of the people, there is an occasional abuse of discretion, but this is not an argument against the power. It is merely a manifestation of one of the infirmities of government that cannot be remedied or cured. If there are a number of applicants for a place or privilege, and all cannot be satisfied, one or more of them in the very necessity of things must be refused; and this, everything else being equal, amounts to discrimination. And so in the granting of liquor licenses, except that in respect of these, the discrimination cannot be so pronounced as in other cases, because such a license is not a privilege or right that any citizen may demand or have for the asking. It is rather in the nature of a favor that may or may not be granted by those in authority. There is no disagreement among the authorities on this point. Hence we have little difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the argument in respect to discrimination and favoritism that might be urged with great force as to other harmless employments or pursuits, is weakened when it is attempted to be extended to a business that has always been the subject of police regulation and is generally regarded as a tolerable evil. This idea is well illustrated by the fact that it is always competent to inquire into the character of the applicant for license to retail liquor, and to refuse license if his reputation is immoral or objectionable. And so in respect to the locality at which it is proposed to conduct the business. Here, a reasonable discretion may be exercised and license refused if it would not be proper to have a saloon at the proposed place. There are localities in every town in which it would be offensive to the common sense of all good people to have saloons, as, for instance, near by or adjacent to schools or churches or in residence neighborhoods; and boards in the exercise of a discretion may refuse to license a grogshop next door to a schoolhouse, in front of a church, or in the center of a street set apart for residential purposes. Following out this theory, we see no reason why this discretion may not be extended to numbers as well as to persons and localities. When it is agreed upon all hands that the business of retailing liquor is of such a nature as to authorize license boards to exercise discretion as to persons and places, it would seem logically to follow that they should also have some discretion as to numbers. If it is needful to the welfare of the community to place the traffic in the hands of proper persons located at suitable places, why is it not equally essential that some control should be exercised as to the number of persons who may be granted the privilege? If discrimination can be lawfully exercised in selecting persons and localities, why may not there be a reasonable discretion, although it involves discrimination, as to the number of saloons. The retail liquor business has always been placed in a class by itself, and dealt with by special laws; so that the reasons that might deny the boards the right to discriminate between persons applying for licenses to engage in any other legitimate occupation and pursuit regulated and controlled by general laws have little or no application to this business. Although, recognized legitimate and under the protection of the law, it stands apart from other lawful occupations, and must be treated in a class by itself.

We are unwilling to hold that the action of the board of trustees in the case before us was arbitrary or capricious, or that it was beyond their authority. On the contrary, we should say that they acted well within the limits of a reasonable discretion in refusing under the circumstances to grant appellant a license, and the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

ROGERS v. SLATON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS ($5*)—COMPENSATION.

A county attorney is not entitled to compensation, in addition to his salary, for services in the state courts, in suits to collect taxes due the county, but he should be credited with such sums as he actually pays to associate counsel, and such further sums as were expended by him in looking after the tax collections in courts in counties other than his own, and for his personal services in suits in the federal courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see District and Prosecuting Attorneys, Cent. Dig. §§ 18-25; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS (§ 5*)—COMPENSATION.

The fiscal court made an order authorizing the county attorney to institute proceedings to collect back taxes on property not listed or assessed for taxation, and directed that he be allowed a sum equal to 25 per cent. of the amount he collected. The county attorney was in the receipt of a salary of $500 a year, and continued to receive this amount during the term of his office, and for a subsequent term to which he was elected. Held, that by this order the court attempted to increase the compensation of the county attorney who was then in office, and did not attempt to fix the annual compensation of the county attorney who should thereafter be elected.

3. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS (§ 5*)—COMPENSATION.

Where the fiscal court by an invalid order attempts to allow the county attorney a percentage of all back taxes collected, that the attorney accepted from the fiscal court a sum less than that to which, under the contract, he was entitled constitutes no defense in an action to recover the amount paid him.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Muhlenberg County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by T. J. Slaton against J. L. Rogers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Thos. W. Thomas, Lewis Nuckols, and T. L. Edelen, for appellant. Willis & Meredith and Hazelrigg, Chenault & Hazelrigg, for appellee.

LASSING, J. J. L. Rogers was the county attorney of Muhlenberg county. On October 10, 1900, the fiscal court of said county made the following order: "Ordered that county attorney, J. L. Rogers, be and he is hereby authorized to institute any legal proceedings he may deem proper to collect back taxes upon property not heretofore listed, certified or assessed for taxation, and that he be allowed a sum equal to 25 per cent. of the amount he may cause to be collected for the county by any motion, suit, proceeding or otherwise, heretofore or hereafter begun." Under this authority he collected a large sum of money for the county, and for said services under his contract he was paid the sum of $4,801.22. Thereafter appellee, T. J. Slaton, a taxpayer, suing in his own behalf and in behalf of all other taxpayers of the county, filed suit against said county attorney and the members of the fiscal court, in which he recited the fact that at the time this contract was entered into the said Rogers was the regularly elected and qualified county attorney for Muhlenberg county, and that during each year that he held the office he was paid an annual salary out of the general expense fund of said county, and that the annual salary so paid to him was a reasonable salary for the services which he rendered, that he had no right to receive the additional compensation, and that the orders making the employment and paying for same were illegal and void. He prayed judgment against the county attorney for the amount which he had received under said orders, with interest from the date of its payment. The defendant, Rogers, demurred to the petition and, pending the demurrer, filed an answer in three paragraphs. In the first paragraph he pleaded that the annual salary of $500 which he received was intended to be his compensation for the discharge of the ordinary duties pertaining to his office as county attorney, and was not intended to be a general compensation for the performance of the services mentioned in the petition. That, taking these services into consideration, the annual compensation was not at all adequate or reasonable. That at the time the contract was made with the county it was understood he would associate other counsel with him in his effort to collect these taxes, and it was agreed between himself and the fiscal court that W. O. Davis should be such counsel, but by mistake and oversight on the part of the draftsman this part of the understanding and agreement of the fiscal court was omitted from the order. That later, however, the orders of the fiscal court in dealing with this matter recognized that said Davis had been so employed, and was assisting the county attorney in his efforts to collect this tax, that the services were reasonably worth more than the price which the fiscal court paid to himself and Davis; that a large part of the money received by him was paid to Mr. Davis for his services; that in addition to this he was compelled to and did expend large sums of money in going to courts, state and federal, in other counties, in his efforts to collect the tax referred to in the order under which he was acting. He denied that the orders were void, or that any money had been wrongfully paid to him. In the second paragraph he recited that he had collected for the county $24,405, and that under the contract he should have received $6,601.22, but that by agreement between himself and associate counsel and the fiscal court he had accepted the sum of $4,801.22 in satisfaction of their claim for services, and he pleaded this settlement in bar to plaintiff's right to recover. In the third paragraph he pleaded that on October 10, 1900, when the contract was entered into, he had not been elected to office for the second term, and that the contract for the contingent compensation was made prior to his election for the second term in 1902, that therefore he entered upon his second term of office in 1902 with this contingent contract in full force and effect, that a large part of the services rendered in his efforts to collect this money were rendered during the second term of office; and that the entire amount collected for the county was actually collected during that term, and the amount paid to him was paid during that term. To this answer a general demurrer was filed. The case was submitted upon the demurrers to the petition and the answer, and the demurrer to the petition was overruled and sustained as to the answer. The defendant, the county attorney, having declined to plead further, judgment was entered against him for the full amount of the claim sued for, and he appeals.

Questions similar to these have recently been before the court in the cases of Terrell v. Trimble County, 108 S. W. 848, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 364, and Spalding v. Thornbury, 108 S. W. 906, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 362. In these cases, after full consideration, it was held that the county attorney was entitled to no extra compensation whatever for services which he rendered in person in the state courts, in his efforts to collect taxes due the county, as this was clearly a part of his official duty, but that he should be credited with such sum as he actually paid to associate counsel, and such further sums as were expended by him in looking after the collection of this tax in courts in counties other than his own. He is also entitled to pay for his personal services in looking after litigation in the federal courts. The first paragraph of the answer, therefore, presented a defense to at least a part of plaintiff's claim, and the county attorney should have been permitted to show what sums he paid to Davis, his associate counsel, and what expenses he incurred in attending courts in counties other than his own in his efforts to collect this tax. No defense is presented in either the second or third paragraph of the answer.

On October 10th, when the contract under which this special service was rendered, was entered into, appellant was in office discharging the duties of county attorney, under a salary that had theretofore been fixed at $500 per annum. If any additional compensation whatever could be allowed him for this service, it would have to be under this contract of date October 10th. It cannot be said that in making this order the fiscal court of Muhlenberg county was attempting to fix the annual compensation of the county attorney who should thereafter be elected and inducted into office. On the contrary, it is plain that the attention of the members of the fiscal court having been called to the fact that certain corporations had not been paying to the county taxes to which she was entitled, they were willing to pay to the county attorney an additional compensation for his efforts to collect this tax, and this additional sum agreed upon, as evidenced by the order, was one-fourth of what he might recover. The best evidence that neither the county attorney nor the fiscal court looked upon this order of October 10th as in no wise changing the order which had theretofore been made, fixing the compensation of the county attorney is found in the fact that they continued to pay him and he continued to receive the same annual salary as had heretofore been paid him. This order must be construed as an attempt, on the part of the fiscal court, to pay to the county attorney an extra compensation for the collection of this tax. Both appellant and the fiscal court regarded the effort of the county attorney to collect this money as a special service for which they attempted to give him extra compensation. That such was the understanding between the parties at the time the contract was made and the order entered there can be no doubt. This being true, it cannot now be claimed that the order was in fact intended to enlarge the compensation of the county attorney who should be elected in 1902, and we are of opinion that the court did not err in holding that this paragraph of the answer presented no defense. The fact that appellant accepted from the fiscal court a sum less than that to which, under the contract, he was entitled, affords him no protection, for the order itself was, so far as he was concerned, void.

He is permitted to take credit for the sums paid to associate counsel and incurred as expenses, not under the contract, but because, as the representative of the county, he expended these sums in his efforts to collect the tax, and for this reason they should properly be allowed to him. As county attorney, he owed to the county his best services in his efforts to collect this tax, but it was in no wise incumbent upon him to pay his own expenses in going into other counties to look after the collection of same, nor was he called upon to employ counsel to assist him. Hence these items of expense are proper charges against the county, and the trial court erred in requiring him to pay back to the county the full amount he had received in attempting to collect this tax. If he was called upon to appear in the federal court, he should be allowed to show the reasonable value of such service, and for this he is entitled to pay, for under his duty to the county he was only required to look after the interests of the county in litigation in the state courts. The court should have required him to pay only so much of the full amount received as remained after deducting the fee which he paid to associate counsel, and the legitimate expenses which he had incurred in looking after the litigation in counties other than his own, and a reasonable fee for his services, if any, in the federal court.

For the reasons indicated the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

SHOTWELL v. CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 20, 1908.)

JUDGMENT (§ 654*)—BAR OF CAUSES OF ACTION—JUDGMENT ON DISCONTINUANCE.

The dismissal of an action either on motion of plaintiff or on motion of defendant for want of prosecution, after its removal from a state circuit court to a federal circuit court, is not a bar to a subsequent action for the same cause begun in the state circuit court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by Joseph Shotwell against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Frederich W. Schmitz, for appellant. E. J. Tracy and Galvin & Galvin, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. In March, 1905, Joseph Shotwell brought a suit against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to recover for personal injuries in the Kenton circuit court. On April 3d, the railroad company filed its petition, and on its motion the cause was removed to the Circuit Court of the United States. The plaintiff appeared in that court and entered a motion to dismiss his action without prejudice. Without any disposition of this motion, the defendant, on October 30th, moved the court to dismiss the petition for want of prosecution. The motion was sustained, and a judgment was entered dismissing the petition for want of prosecution. Shotwell after this, on January 17, 1906, brought this suit against the railroad company to recover for the same injuries. The defendant pleaded the judgment entered in the Circuit Court of the United States dismissing the former action for want of prosecution in bar of this action. The court sustained the plea and dismissed the action. The plaintiff appeals.

In Freeman on Judgments, § 261, the rule is thus stated: "Judgments of nonsuit, of non prosecutur, of nolle prosequi, of dismissal, and of discontinuance are exceptions to the general rule that, when the pleadings, the court, and the parties are such as to permit of a trial on the merits, the judgment will be considered as final and conclusive of all matters which could have been so tried. A nonsuit is but like the blowing out of a candle, which a man at his own pleasure may light again. Under no circumstances will such a judgment be deemed final, whether entered before or at the trial."

In 23 Cyc. 1138, the rule is thus stated: "A judgment of non prosecutur has no greater effect as an estoppel than a judgment of nonsuit, and does not bar another action for the same cause." See also 2 Black on Judgments, § 702; 24 Am. & Eng. Encyc. 803.

We have found no contrary authority. That the plaintiff may dismiss his action after it has been removed to the federal court and bring a second suit in the state court has been held in a number of cases. See Adams Express Company v. Schofield, 1 Ky. 832, 64 S. W. 903; Stevenson's Adm'r I. C. R. R. Co., 117 Ky. 859, 79 S. W. 76; Dana v. Blackburn, 121 Ky. 706, 90 S. W. 237, and cases cited.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Johnson County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by the Union Manufacturing Company against Howes & Howes. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, with instructions to dismiss without prejudice.

Vaughn, Howes & Howes, for appellant. C. B. Wheeler, for appellee.

LASSING, J. Appellants, Howes & Howes purchased of the appellee, the Union Manufacturing Company, a bill of goods amounting to $462.25. By the terms of the sale, as appears from the invoice, these goods were to be paid for "May 1st, 2 per cent., or July net." The goods were shipped, and on May 17th following appellee filed suit in the Johnson circuit court to recover the value of the goods. Howes & Howes answered, denying any indebtedness whatever to the plaintiff and pleading affirmatively that the account sued on was not due, and was not to become due, until July 1st thereafter. The reply traversed the affirmative matter in the answer, and completed the issue. A jury trial was waived, and upon hearing the evidence the court rendered a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amount sued for. Defendants filed a motion and grounds for new trial, which were overruled, and they appeal.

It appears from the evidence that, at the time the appellants purchased the goods from appellee, they were delivered a duplicate of the order, and this duplicate states the terms of the sale as to payment as follows: "Terms, May 1st, 2 per cent., or July net." For appellee it is insisted that the account became due May 1st, and it filed with its petition what purports to be the original statement of this account, and from it there are omitted the words "or July net," and it is urged for appellee that these words were added to the copy which appellants filed. An examination of what purports to be the original and the copy discloses the fact that the one is in no sense a duplicate of the other. The account filed with the petition is a mere statement of account, and does not show who took the order, how the goods were to be shipped, or when to be shipped, whereas the carbon-copy duplicate filed by appellants has all the earmarks of an order, which it purports to be, for the bill of goods sued for. It is dated November 25, 1906, and signed "Union Manufacturing Company, Knoxville, Tenn., per O. M. Carnahan, London, Ky." The exhibit filed with the petition is a mere statement of account, whereas the carbon copy filed by appellants evidences the real contract which was made by appellee, through its agent, with appellants, at the time they ordered the goods.

Appellants contend that, under the terms of their contract, they had until July 1st to pay this bill; that if they paid it on or before May 1st, they were entitled to a discount of 2 per cent., but if paid after May 1st, then they had to pay the full face of the claim. This construction of the contract was disputed by appellee, and appellants offered to introduce merchants familiar with the terms of the trade, by whom, if they had been permitted to testify, appellants claim they would have shown that the terms regulating the payment for this bill of goods, as used in the order, were well understood by the trade, and that the purchaser had the option to pay on or before May 1st, and take the benefit of a 2 per cent. discount; or, failing to do this, he had in any event until July 1st to pay the bill; and that the bill was not due, except at the option of the purchaser, before July 1st. The court below refused to permit this testimony to be introduced, and of its action in so doing appellants complain, for they insist that, had the court permitted this evidence to be introduced, he could not have avoided giving to the contract that construction which the appellants themselves gave to it, and which they insist is the only construction of which it is susceptible. After July 1, 1907, but before the case was submitted for judgment, appellee asked to have an order entered, in which it was suggested that the entire debt had become due after the commencement of the action. The court, upon objection being made by appellants, refused to permit this order to be made.

The whole case turns upon the construction that is to be placed upon the words, "May 1st, 2 per cent., or July net." If, as appellants insist, they had until July 1st to pay this bill, with the right to take advantage of a 2 per cent. discount if they desired to pay it sooner, then at the institution of this action their debt was not due, and appellee had no cause of action. If, on the other hand, the proper construction to be placed on these words is that suggested by appellee, that the entire debt was due May 1st, then the suit was not prematurely brought, and the court did not err in entering the judgment as he did. If the bill was due, as appellee insists, on May 1st, the addition of the words "or July net" was superfluous, and the words were meaningless. The testimony which appellants offered bearing upon the construction which merchants place upon terms of this character in contracts of purchase and sale was clearly competent, and the avowals show that these terms have a fixed and definite meaning; that they mean that the purchaser has the option, if he desires to exercise it, of paying the bill on or before the first date named, and saving the discount; but, if he does not desire to exercise this right under this option of paying the bill on or before the first date named, then by losing the discount he would have the advantage of the additional time within which to meet the bill, and in any event the bill is not due until the expiration of the time limit fixed in the order, which in this case was July 1st.

The bill not being due at the time of the institution of the suit, and it being an ordinary action, the court should have, upon this showing, dismissed the suit without prejudice (Butler v. Butler, 4 Litt. 202), and the judgment is reversed, with instructions so to do.

Popham & Webster and Morton K. Yonts, for appellant. Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh, Kohn, Baird, Sloss & Kohn, Howard B. Lee, and Greene & Van Winkle, for appellee.

NUNN, J. This is the second appeal of this case; the plaintiff in the court below being the appellant on each appeal. Appellant claimed in his petition that, on July 18, 1906, while he was a passenger on one of the cars of appellee, he was wilfully and maliciously assaulted by the conductor; was seized by the back of the neck, and thrown from the car while it was in motion; that because of this act he was severely and permanently injured. The answer filed by appellee contained two paragraphs, the first being a traverse, and the second a plea of justification, by stating, in substance, that appellant was hoisterous, and its conductor stopped the car and put him off without violence or injury to him. In our opinion the answer of appellee should only be considered as an affirmative denial of the allegations of the petition. If not, appellant was entitled to a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for him the damages he had sustained. We are of the opinion, however, that the answer, with the first paragraph stricken, operated as an affirmative denial of the petition. Consequently, the burden of proof rested upon him, and he had the right to close the argument. There is no bill of exceptions filed on this appeal showing the evidence heard upon the trial, nor are the instructions given by the lower court a part of the record. The only error complained of on this appeal is that the court erred in giving the burden of proof to appellee, and allowing it the closing argument. This question was not presented by appellant as error to this court on the first appeal, although on the first trial the lower court made a similar ruling over objection of appellant, and allowed appellee the burden of proof and the concluding argument. This appears on the first page of transcript of the first trial. The transcript begins with the following statement: "The case coming on to be heard before his honor Walter P. Lincoln, special judge, and a jury the jury being duly impaneled and sworn, and the case stated by counsel for respective parties, the defendant moved the court to award it the burden of proof and closing argument, to which the plaintiff objected, the court overruled the objection, and awarded to the defendant the burden of proof at the closing argument, to which plaintiff excepted."

The transcript further shows that the testimony of appellee was introduced first, that it assumed the burden of proof, and that the court had so ruled over the objection of appellant, and that appellant assigned to the court as error in his ground filed for a new trial. The verdict resulted in favor of appellee on the first trial, and an appeal was then taken, but the question of burden of proof was presented to this court, and the court did pass upon it. However, it could have been raised, and it is too late now for him to contend that the lower court erred in its ruling on the question of burden of proof. This court has invariably held that when an error occurs in the progress of a case, and the case goes to the Court of Appeals, this error is not presented for its consideration, then the party who is claiming an error cannot take advantage of such error on a subsequent appeal. It is his duty to present to the court on the first appeal all errors in the record occurring prior to the taking of the appeal, and if advantage is taken of this fact, and the alleged error not presented to this court, and the court fails to pass upon the question, all parties who claim to have been injured thereby are estopped from presenting the alleged error on any subsequent consideration of the case in this court. See the case of Davis, etc., 14 Bush, 746, and also the case of Mason v. Mason, 5 Bush, 187. In the latter mentioned case this court said: "Many of the cases assigned for review and rehearing may be disposed of by a general statement that all the errors and irregularities appearing in the original record, and which could have been corrected by the appeal, must now be regarded as settled and adjudicated, and can afford neither a cause for a review, or a rehearing in the court below, nor for correction now in this court. If they were then discovered and presented by appellants and their counsel, and escaped the attention of this court, it only shows the wisdom of the law in precluding a subsequent investigation, by way of repose to litigants, and per-ty for laches in not presenting, in proper time and manner, errors then existing and apparent in the record." See, also, the case of Boone v. Gleason, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 1001.

For these reasons the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SLEET v. FARMERS' MUT. FIRE INS. CO. OF BOONE COUNTY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 13, 1908.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 423*)—CAUSE OF LOSS—LOSS BY LIGHTNING.

A policy provided for the insurance of plaintiff against fire, and her barn having thereafter been knocked down by lightning, but not burned, she sued on the policy, and alleged that it had been defendant's custom for years to pay for damage caused by lightning in such cases as well as by fire, and the custom was known to defendant and formed a part of the contract, and that since the execution of the contract defendant had levied assessments for similar losses by lightning, of which assessments plaintiff had paid her part. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the damage to the property by lightning, and the alleged custom was immaterial.

2. PLEADING (§ 214*)—DEMURRER—EFFECT— ADMISSION.

In an action on an insurance policy, allegations that the company by uniform custom had paid damage caused by lightning, though the policy covered only loss or damage by fire, were admitted by a demurrer to the petition.

3. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 16*)—INCORPORATION IN CONTRACT—VALIDITY.

A prior uniform custom of an insurance company of paying damage caused by lightning which did not burn the property, though the policy covered only loss or damage by fire, did not constitute a custom of the business or of the community which was binding on the company, but only showed that it had theretofore paid invalid claims.

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 312*)—OFFICERS—LIABILITIES AS TO CORPORATION—MISAPPROPRIATION OF CORPORATE FUNDS.

A policy insuring against loss or damage by fire not covering a loss caused by lightning which did not burn the building, payment of the policy by the officers for such loss would have been a misapplication of the corporation's money.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County.

Action by B. A. Sleet against the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Boone County, Ky. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

J. G. Tomlin and J. L. Vest, for appellant.
Sidney Gaines and Clore, Dickerson & Clayton, for appellee.

BARKER, J. On the 5th day of February, 1906, the appellee, the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company, issued a policy of insurance to the appellant, Mrs. B. A. Sleet, the material parts of which are as follows: "By this policy of insurance, and for and in consideration of four and ⁷²/₁₀₀ dollars, and a premium note of ninety-four and ⁴⁰/₁₀₀ dollars, by said company received, do insure Mrs. B. A. Sleet, of Boone county, Kentucky, against loss or damage by fire to the amount of two thousand three hundred and sixty dollars on the following property, as described in application and survey No. 5053, as follows, to-wit: * * * "The amount of the insurance is then distributed over the dwelling house and the various barns and sheds and other buildings upon the farm, among which was a barn 60 by 40 by 18, which was insured for $500. As this was the only building destroyed, it is not necessary to set forth the particular distribution of the remainder. The covenant of the company is as follows: "And the said company do promise and agree, to and with the insured, to make unto her, her executors, administrators and assigns, all such loss or damage, not exceeding in amount the sum insured, as shall happen by fire to the property above specified during the term of five years from the 2d day of March, one thousand nine hundred and six at 12 o'clock (noon) unto the 2d day of March, one thousand nine hundred and eleven at 12 o'clock (noon)." Prior to the institution of this action, and during the insurance contract period, the barn in question was struck by lightning, and knocked down, but not burned. Thereupon the appellant demanded payment from the company of the sum of $500, and, upon its refusal to pay her, she instituted this action.

The plaintiff in her petition sets forth the insurance contract as hereinbefore stated, the destruction of the barn by lightning, the demand of payment and refusal, and alleges that at the time of the execution and delivery of the policy of insurance it was and had been for many years the uniform practice and custom of the defendant, the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company, to pay for all losses or damage done to buildings insured in the company when insured or destroyed by lightning, the same as though injured or destroyed by fire; that this custom was well known to the defendant at the time of the execution of the policy of insurance, and had been practiced and observed by it at all times before and since the execution of the policy; that the custom on the part of the defendant insurance company entered into and formed a part of the contract of insurance herein sued on, and since the execution and delivery of the policy the defendant company had made assessments on all losses by lightning, and plaintiff has paid all assessments when called upon by the company, and contributed to the payment of all losses by lightning which were insured by the defendant company and occurred since the issue of the policy. Afterwards she amended her petition, and alleged that the defendant is a mutual company, and all of the losses and other expenses that are now or ever have been paid by it are paid from funds derived by assessments on the several policy holders insured by it according to the amounts of their respective policies. A general demurrer was interposed by the defendant to the petition as amended, and sustained by the court, and, the plaintiff declining to plead further, her petition was dismissed. The trial court was clearly right in sustaining the demurrer. The policy is filed as an exhibit, and its essential parts are copied above. The covenant of the defendant with the plaintiff was to indemnify her against loss occasioned by fire. She was not entitled to recover for loss by lightning which did not burn, but merely knocked down, the barn, any more than she would have been entitled to recover under the policy if it had been blown down by a windstorm. If the officers of the company had paid the plaintiff, it would have been a misappropriation of the money of the corporation. The plaintiff's position is not aided by the allegation that other losses occasioned by lightning had been paid under contracts similar to that sued on. If this be true—and the demurrer, for the purpose of testing the petition, admits it—it would only show that the officers in charge of the corporate funds had been guilty of the payment of erroneous claims. The prior errors of the defendant company do not constitute a custom of the trade or of the community. The plaintiff's right must stand or fall by the written contract; and this clearly shows that the loss accruing to her was not occasioned by fire, and therefore not within the terms of the contract of indemnity purchased by her.

Judgment affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 429*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—LAND SUBJECT TO.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 467*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—SPOILIATION—DETERMINATION.

Whether a street improvement assessment amounts to spoliation depends, not upon the value of the lot alone, but upon the value of the lot and improvements thereon after construction of the street improvement; and, if the assessment of the improvement does not equal the Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, First Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Barber Asphalt Paving Company against George Haller. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Burnett & Burnett, for appellant. Furlong Woodbury & Furlong, for appellee.

CLAY, C. The plaintiff, Barber Asphalt Paving Company, brought this action to enforce an apportionment lien, amounting to $688.16, against the property of the defendant, George Haller, for the improvement of Twenty-Sixth street from Dumesnil to Cane Run Road. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Appellant's lot lies on the northwest corner of the intersection of Twenty-Sixth street with Cane Run Road. It has a frontage of 50 feet on Twenty-Sixth street, but widens until it reaches an alley, where its width is 175 feet. The southeast line of the property borders on the northwest line of Cane Run Road. The only defense made to the action was that the amount of the apportionment warrant was equal to or exceeded the value of the property, and to enforce the same would amount to spoliation. It is the contention of appellant that a portion of the lot does not lie within the taxing district, and, in determining whether or not the enforcement of the lien would amount to spoliation, the value of the lot alone is to be taken into consideration. There is nothing in the record showing that the rear end of the lot extends beyond the taxing district, but, even conceding that it does to the extent of some 7 or 8 feet, as claimed by appellant, we do not think this would materially affect the value of the lot. The lot itself lies on the corner and within the quarter square. We, therefore, conclude that the entire lot is within the taxing district, and not merely that portion of it lying between parallel lines, extending back at right angles to Twenty-Sixth street, and 50 feet apart.

Furthermore, the question of spoliation does not depend upon the value of the lot alone, but upon the value of the lot with the improvements thereon after the construction of the street, as required by ordinance. Appellant's testimony is to the effect that the lot, prior to the improvement, taken by itself, was not worth the amount of the apportionment warrant. For this purpose he had the witnesses testify to the value of the 50 feet extending back at right angles, and then the value of the triangle bordering on Cane Run Road; also to the value of the small strip bordering on the alley, which it was contended was not embraced in the taxing district. Measured in this way, the value of the lot was fixed by several witnesses at $500 or $600; but, as said before, this is not the proper way to determine the question of spoliation. It depends, not upon the value of the lot by itself, but upon the value of the property, including the improvements. Considered from this standpoint, appellant himself fixed the value of the property at $1,500; others placed it much in excess of that. The rule established in this state in regard to spoliation is that it is only where the cost of the improvement equals the value of the property sought to be taxed that the enforcement of the lien for the improvement amounts to spoliation. If the cost of the improvement does not equal the value of the property sought to be taxed, the courts will uphold the assessment, and enforce its collection. Otter v. Barber Asphalt Paving Company, 96 S. W. 862, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 1157.

As the value of the property after the improvement of the street is far in excess of the cost of such improvement, we are of the opinion that the circuit court properly held that the cost of the improvement did not amount to spoliation.

Judgment affirmed.

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 63*) — CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—PUBLIC NUISANCES.

An indictment for maintaining a public nuisance which charges defendant with the offense of permitting a public nuisance charges a mere conclusion of law, and must be supported by allegations of fact showing how the offense charged was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 185; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. NUISANCE (§ 91*) — PUBLIC NUISANCES — CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—INDICTMENT.

In a prosecution of a railroad company for maintaining a public nuisance, the indictment charged that the company had failed to keep in repair a public bridge extending over its track, but there was no allegation of fact showing that it was the duty of the railroad company to repair the bridge, except a recitation that the defendant did "suffer and permit its said bridge to become and remain out of repair and dangerous." Held, that the indictment did not sufficiently charge a duty to keep the bridge in repair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, McLean County.

"To be officially reported."

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company was convicted of maintaining a public nuisance, and appeals. Reversed, with directions to dismiss the indictment.

Benjamin D. Warfield, Wilbur F. Browder, and R. A. Miller, for appellant. Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., Chas. H. Morris, T. B. McGregor, and Ben D. Ringo, for the Commonwealth.

BARKER, J. The grand jury of McLean county returned the following indictment against the appellant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company: "The grand jury of McLean county, in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky, accuse defendant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, of the offense of willfully suffering, permitting, and keeping on premises in their occupation and under their control a common public nuisance, committed in manner and form as follows: Said defendant is, and was at all times and dates hereinafter mentioned, an incorporated railroad company engaged in operating a railroad in and through this county over which many trains are run, and was incorporated by and exists under the laws of the state of Kentucky, and at a point on its right of way, in the county aforesaid, in or near the village of Island, there was many years ago a bridge erected over, above, and across the track, on which the cars and trains of defendant are run, and said bridge is sufficiently high above the defendant's track at that point to permit the trains and cars of defendant to pass below and under said bridge. This bridge is on and makes a part of the Hartford and Sacramento Road, which is a public and a much used road and thoroughfare in McLean county at that point, and is, and has been for many years and more than fifteen years, used for public travel by a large number of the good people of the county and state who pass and repass and have the right to pass upon and over said bridge of defendant, and heretofore, on the ——— day of ———, 190—, and continuously for twelve months last past, and during all of said time the said defendant did, in the county aforesaid and at the point aforesaid suffer and permit its said bridge to become and remain out of repair and dangerous to the safety of all the good people of the commonwealth then and there passing upon and over said bridge, and having the right to then and there pass and repass upon and over same, and has suffered the floor, supports, sides, ends, approaches, timbers, railings, and foundations of said bridge to be and become and remain insecure and out of repair and dangerous to those passing upon and over same, and such unsafe and dangerous condition has been by defendant suffered and permitted to continue for a long and unreasonable length of time, and during the whole of the twelve months next before the finding of this indictment, to the common public nuisance of all the good people in the neighborhood residing, passing and being, and especially of those passing upon and over said bridge and having the right then and there to pass and repass, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Kentucky." A general demurrer was filed by the defendant to this indictment and overruled by the court, whereupon a trial was had by a jury, with the result that the defendant was found guilty as charged, and a fine of $200 inflicted as a punishment for permitting the nuisance complained of.

On appeal the railroad company complains of the following errors: First, that the court erred in overruling its demurrer to the indictment; second, that its motion for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find it not guilty should have been sustained; third, that the court erred in instructing the jury as to the law of the case.

The first question with which we are confronted is the sufficiency of the indictment. The accusatory part of it charges the defendant with the offense of suffering and permitting a common nuisance; but this is a mere conclusion of law, and must be supported by allegations of fact showing how the offense charged was committed. The pleading in no way connects the defendant with the bridge alleged to have been allowed to become unsafe, except the recitation that the defendant did "suffer and permit its said bridge to become and remain out of repair and dangerous," etc. No duty on the part of the defendant to repair or maintain the bridge for the benefit of the public is charged; nor are there any allegations of fact from which such a duty would necessarily flow. The indictment alleges that the bridge constitutes a part of a public highway, over which the travelling public has a right to pass and repass at will. From this it must be concluded that the public right is equal, if not superior, to that of the appellant in the use of the structure. For aught that appears to the contrary, the defendant may have many years ago built this bridge for its own private purposes, and the county afterwards constructed the highway which runs across the right of way of the defendant and over its bridge. The right of way may have been condemned by the county or granted by the railroad; but surely the public may not take a corporation's bridge and wear it out, and then require the owner to repair it. Suppose the bridge should be blown down by a storm, or washed away by a freshet, would the railroad, in the absence of a contract or a statute requiring it so to do, be under any duty to rebuild it? In order to view the problem from a different angle, suppose a farmer has a deep ravine across his farm; that for his own purposes he has constructed a substantial bridge over the ravine; that afterwards the county should construct a public highway across the farm, and over the bridge either condemning the right of way or obtaining a grant of it from the owner—what face might the public, under the facts, require the farmer to keep the bridge in repair simply because he owned the ultimate property or reversionary right in the timbers of the structure? And yet that is the very proposition presented by the indictment under discussion. The title of the bridge is alleged to be in the defendant. The use of it as a part of the public highway is alleged to be in the public. In the absence of any allegation showing a duty on the part of the defendant corporation to repair it must be presumed that this duty rests on the county. This being true, it follows that the indictment fails to state an offense on the part of appellant, and its general demurrer should have been sustained. The conclusion makes it unnecessary to examine or decide the other questions presented by the assignment of errors.

Judgment reversed, with directions to dismiss the indictment.

MILLER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 20, 1907.)

1. NUISANCE (§ 91*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—INDICTMENT.

An indictment charging defendant with maintaining a common nuisance on the 1st day of May, 1907, and up to and including the date of the finding of the indictment, sufficient to charge a continuing offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 210; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 213*)—LIQUOR—NUISANCE—INDICTMENT.

An indictment for maintaining a common nuisance in a certain house, which charges that defendant suffered persons to congregate there and become boisterous and disorderly, and suffered the sale of spirituous, vinous, and mallicuous there contrary to the statute, is not defective for failing to charge that the disorder was such as to disturb the peace of the neighborhood.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 256; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 223*)—LIQUOR—NUISANCE—EVIDENCE.

On a trial of an indictment for maintaining a public nuisance in a certain house by suffering persons to congregate there and become boisterous and disorderly, and by suffering the sale of liquor there contrary to the statute, evidence of a sale of liquor about two years before the trial, but within one year preceding the date at which the indictment was returned, is admissible, but evidence of a sale of liquor three years before the trial is inadmissible.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 400*)—BEST EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for maintaining a common nuisance in a certain house by suffering persons to congregate there and become disorderly and suffering the sale of liquor, evidence by a police judge that defendant was convicted before him within a year before the finding of the indictment ment, on the charge of having liquors in his possession for the purpose of selling them, is inadmissible, as the conviction should have been proved by the record.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1119*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Complaint, made of a statement by the attorney for the commonwealth in arguing a case to the jury, which is not shown by the bill of exceptions, will not be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Rockcastle County.

"Not to be officially reported."

John Miller was convicted of maintaining a common nuisance, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. C. Williams, for appellant. Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., and Tom B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

HOBSON, J. John Miller was indicted in the Rockcastle circuit court for maintaining a common nuisance. He was found guilty, and his punishment fixed at a fine of $50 and 60 days' confinement in the county jail at labor, and he appeals.

The indictment charges that Miller committed the offense by maintaining a common nuisance on the 1st day of May, 1907, before the finding of the indictment, and up to and including the day of the finding of the indictment. This was a sufficient charge of a continuing offense. Ashbrook v. Commonwealth, 1 Bush. 139, 89 Am. Dec. 616; Roberson, Criminal Law, § 629. The local option law is in effect in Rockcastle county. It was charged in the indictment that Miller maintained a common nuisance in a certain house which he held, by suffering persons to congregate there and become boisterous and disorderly, and by suffering the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors there contrary to the statute. It is not essential that there be such disorder as to disturb the peace of the neighborhood. It is a disorderly house when the acts done there, from time to time, are contrary to law. 2 Roberson on Criminal Law, § 639; Walker v. Commonwealth, 117 Ky. 727, 79 S. W. 191.

The court allowed James Johnson to testify that he bought a quart of whisky from Miller about two years before the trial, which was held at the June term, 1908. This evidence was admissible, as the indictment was returned at the April term, 1907, and the two years would not go back as far as one year before the finding of the indictment. Charley Johnson was allowed to state that he purchased some whisky from Miller, he thought, about three years ago. This evidence should have been excluded, as this was not within one year before the finding of the indictment. J. T. Adams, the police judge, was allowed to testify that Miller was convicted before him, within a year before the finding of the indictment, on the charge of having spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in his possession for the purpose of selling them. This evidence should have been excluded. The conviction should have been proved by the record, and not by parol, and the evidence was incompetent in any event, unless it was shown that he had the spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors referred to in the house named in the indictment within one year before it was found, and there was no proof of this.

There was some evidence to the effect that Miller allowed persons to congregate in his house, and to be there drinking and drunk, and that he was in the habit of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors there contrary to the local option law. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury; but, on account of the improper evidence that was admitted over the defendant's objection above set out, a new trial must be granted. Complaint is made of a statement made by the commonwealth attorney in arguing the case to the jury, but this is not shown by the bill of exceptions. The only way in which a matter of this sort can be presented to this court is by the bill of exceptions. Stagg v. Brightwell, 92 S. W. 8, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 1220.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

CARRIERS (§ 228*)—LIVE STOCK—UNEXPLAINED DEATH—LIABILITY.

A carrier is not liable for the death of stock several days after its arrival, where it does not appear whether the death was caused by disease contracted before or after carriage or from injury in transit.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hardin County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by R. E. McDowell against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. James, for appellant. L. A. Faurest, Benjamin D. Warfield, and C. H. Moorman, for appellee.

LASSING, J. Appellant, R. E. McDowell, shipped a car load of mules from Elizabethtown to Columbia, Tenn. When the mules were unloaded at Columbia, one of them lagged behind the others and had to be whipped to make it keep up with them. It refused to eat or drink that evening. The next day it appeared to be better and was sold as a sound mule; it being the opinion of those conducting the sale that its jaded appearance was due to the fatigue brought on by being shipped some 200 or 300 miles. It was sold two or three times within two days after its arrival at Columbia, and was taken some 16 miles into the country, and when it was again sold the last purchaser discovered, upon attempting to take the mule home, that it was not well, and he attempted to treat it, but without success, and it died in three or four days. Having been sold under a guaranty, appellant, McDowell, refunded to the purchaser the cost price of the mule and instituted suit against the railroad company to recover its value, alleging that its death was the result of injuries received while in transit between Elizabethtown and Columbia. The company answered, traversing the allegations of the petition. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, the court instructed the jury to find for the defendant, and of his ruling in so doing the plaintiff complains and prosecutes this appeal.

It appears from the evidence that appellant lived about 9½ miles from Elizabethtown, that he was a handler of mules, and that in September, 1906, he put this mule, along with others, in a shed adjoining his barn, for the purpose of fattening them. They remained in this inclosure until early in March of 1907, when they were taken out and driven to Elizabethtown, for the purpose of shipment. At that time the mule in suit was fat and had had no exercise for six months. It appears that it showed no signs of being sick before it was shipped. When taken from the car at Columbia, it bore no marks evidencing any injury that it had received while in transit. It did appear sluggish when taken from the car, but it was the opinion of all the witnesses who testified upon this point that this condition was brought about by fatigue incident to the journey. There is no proof whatever that at the points between Elizabethtown and Columbia the car in which these mules were shipped was not handled in a proper manner. All of the other mules included in the shipment were in first-class condition. It is shown that at the time the mules were shipped the weather was unusually warm for the season, and it is in evidence that the mule's death may have been produced by a disease brought on by being overheated while being driven from appellant's place of residence at Elizabethtown, or from Columbia to the home of his third purchaser, some 16 miles into the country.

Inasmuch as it was not developed by the testimony what caused the death of the mule—whether it resulted from a disease contracted before it was shipped, or after it reached Columbia, or whether it was the result of an injury received while being shipped—the jury had nothing upon which to base a verdict, and it has repeatedly been held by this court that in such cases the jury will not be permitted to speculate as to the cause of the injury. Louisville Gas Company v. Kaufman, Straus & Co., 105 Ky. 13, 48 S. W. 434; Hurt v. L. & N. R. R. Company, 116 Ky. 545, 76 S. W. 502; L. & N. R. R. Company v. Wathen, 49 S. W. 185, Ky. Law Rep. 82; L. & N. R. R. Company v. Warfield, 98 S. W. 313, 80 Ky. Law Rep. 352.

Under the facts proven, we are of opinion that the court did not err in taking the case from the jury, and the judgment is affirmed.

SNYDER et al. v. BAIRD INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DIST.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—ISSUE OF BONDS.

Where a tax levied by a school district was illegal because, in excess of 20 cents on $100 of taxable values, bonds proposed to be issued upon such illegal levy will be enjoined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 225; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 861*)—CASE CERTIFIED—REVIEW.

Where a case is certified by a Court of Civil Appeals to the Supreme Court, the latter court will not decide questions not presented by the certificate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 8447, 3448; Dec. Dig. § 861.*]

On motion for rehearing. Motion overruled.

For former opinion, see 111 S. W. 723.

BROWN, J. An amended certificate was filed in this case, by which the honorable Court of Civil Appeals added to their former certificate that the majority of the court held "that such districts are without authority to issue bonds based upon a greater annual tax rate and levy than 20 cents on the $100 of taxable valuation." There is nothing in the record to show that bonds which had been previously issued by the Baird independent school district were in question in this case, but it appears that the issue was whether or not that district should issue bonds based upon the levy greater than 20 cents on the $100 of taxable values. We adhere to our former ruling and hold that the majority of the Court of Civil Appeals were right in holding that the Baird independent school district had not authority to levy a tax exceeding 20 cents on the $100 valuation of property within the district. We now hold that the majority of the court correctly held that the bonds proposed to be issued based upon the illegal levy should not be issued, and that the injunction should be made perpetual as against the issue of those bonds.

The certificate does not present to this court the question of the power of the Baird independent school district, nor of any other district, to levy a tax of 20 cents on the $100, and we have never decided that question with reference to the Baird district, or any other district. The certificate does not present the question of the validity of any bonds which have been issued by any school district in the state and, this court has not decided that such bonds would be invalid, or to what extent they might be held valid. Neither of the questions suggested have been brought within the jurisdiction of this court. Therefore neither has been, nor can either be, decided by this court in the present proceeding.

The motion for rehearing is therefore overruled.

1. COURTS (§ 247*)—TEXAS SUPREME COURT—APPELLATE JURISDICTION—DETERMINATION.

In determining whether a decision of the Court of Civil Appeals overrules other appellate decisions, so as to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction of the case, the decision must be considered as a whole.

2. COURTS (§ 247*)—JURISDICTION—TEXAS APPELLATE COURTS—CONFLICTING DECISIONS.

A conflict between a decision of the Court of Civil Appeals reversing and remanding and other appellate decisions, which have been overruled, does not give the Supreme Court jurisdiction of the cause in which such decision is made.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. V. Herring against the Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Railway Company. From a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (108 S. W. 977) reversing a judgment for defendant, defendant brings error. Dismissed.

Baker, Botta, Parker & Garwood, Jno. C. Box, De Montel & Fly, and W. B. Teagarden, for plaintiff in error. V. H. Blocker, L. J. Brucks, H. C. Carter, P. J. Lewis, and Geo. Powell, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. In the Court of Civil Appeals the judgment of the district court was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Jurisdiction of this court to grant the writ of error is invoked upon the ground that the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals upon questions of law overrules decisions of this court and other decisions of the Courts of Civil Appeals.

The first reason for which the Court of Civil Appeals reversed the judgment was that the charge of the trial court imposed upon plaintiff the burden of showing that he was not guilty of contributory negligence and had not assumed the risk. The application for writ of error takes the position that the charge was improperly construed, and that in this the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals overrules those of this court in the cases of Brown v. Sullivan, 71 Tex. 478, 10 S. W. 288, and G. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Hill, 95 Tex. 629, 69 S. W. 136. In the present case the court gave the following instruction: "If you believe from the evidence that on or about the 29th day of August, 1906, while plaintiff was a passenger riding on the caboose of one of defendant's freight trains, said train and caboose came to a stop at a point on defendant's road near the station of Glidden, in Colorado county, and if you further believe from the evidence that, while said caboose was standing still, an engine and cars operated by defendant struck said caboose and cars with unusual force and violence, and if you further find from the evidence that plaintiff was not warned or notified that said caboose and cars would be struck, if you find they were, and if you further find from the evidence that by reason of said cars or engine striking said caboose and cars, if you find they did so, the plaintiff was thrown down and injured as alleged in his petition, and if you further find from the evidence that it was negligence on the part of the defendant to permit the said caboose and cars attached thereto to be struck with unusual force and violence, if you find they were struck with unusual force and violence, and that such negligence directly caused plaintiff's injuries, if any, and if you further find from the evidence that plaintiff was not guilty of any contributory negligence which contributed to his injuries, if any, and if he did not assume the risk, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff." And, further, that "the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to establish his case by a preponderance of evidence." And the court gave no other instruction concerning the burden of proof. The Court of Civil Appeals, in the opinion, argues that the first instruction alone put the burden of proof as to contributory negligence and assumed risk upon the plaintiff, but also bases its decision partly upon the combined effect of the two instructions. We must take the decision as a whole, and, when so considered, it is a construction of charges in this case which are materially different from those held to present no reversible error in the cases cited, as will plainly appear from a comparison.

It is also urged that the question of contributory negligence arose out of and depended upon plaintiff's own testimony, and that it was such as to impose upon him the burden of rebutting a conclusion of contributory negligence which would arise from the facts stated by him if left unexplained, and that the charge, if construed as the Court of Civil Appeals construed it, was correct in its application to this case, and that the decision that it was incorrect overrules those in such cases as T. & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Crowder, 63 Tex. 503; G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Riordan (Tex. Civ. App.) 22 S. W. 522; Murray v. Railway Co., 73 Tex. 2, 11 S. W. 125. If all that is said in these cases tending to the proposition that the burden of proof is ever on plaintiff on the question of contributory negligence remained unaffected by later decisions of this court, it still could not be maintained that the conclusion of the Court of Civil Appeals in this case overrules them. They were based upon facts there under consideration bearing no resemblance to those before the court in this case, and were not overruled or passed upon by the Court of Civil Appeals. The latter holding is that plaintiff's testimony in this case did not raise such question as to his contributory negligence as to put the burden of proof on him to show that he was not guilty of it. Certainly this cannot be held to overrule decisions announcing different conclusions based on different facts, but the expressions on the subject in the cases relied on have been explained and the rule as to the burden of proof otherwise settled in later decisions of this court, and if a conflict existed between those expressions and the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals, this would not be sufficient to give jurisdiction to this court in a cause reversed and remanded by the Court of Civil Appeals. G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 130, 30 S. W. 902, 28 L. R. A. 538; Sullivan Insurance Co., 89 Tex. 665, 36 S. W. 73.

Another particular wherein it is claimed that the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals overrules other decisions is in that part of the opinion which holds that there was no question in the case of plaintiff having assumed the risk of the defendant's negligence in the management of the train, if there was such negligence. This holding conflicts with no decision relied on. The only risks which plaintiff in error contends the plaintiff believed to assume were those inseparable from the mode of transportation by freight train. The opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals admits this contention throughout its opinion, but holds that this assumption did not include risks resulting from the negligent management of the train, a holding which does not overrule any case. The part of the charge of the trial court upon this subject held by the Court of Civil Appeals to be erroneous is not the one on which the third specification of error is based. What the court held was that the charge puts upon the plaintiff the assumption of the risk "of the ordinary and usual movements of said train," which the court held to mean the particular train on which plaintiff was riding. This is a mere construction of the charge which overrules no case cited.

The other grounds of error are based upon mere language in different parts of the opinion under consideration concerning the degree of care required of carriers of passengers on freight trains. The court concludes its discussion by a statement of the rule by which it expresses the care required, and its holding upon the subject is thus shown. If the rule stated differs otherwise than in form from the expression from that contended for by plaintiff in error, we are unable to discern the difference. Certainly this part of the opinion does not overrule any case relied on by plaintiff in error.

Finding nothing upon which the jurisdiction of this court can rest, the question as to the correctness of the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals is not before us, and the writ of error must be dismissed.

Writ of error dismissed.

CREWS v. CORTEZ et ux.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 331*)—RENTAL ON SHARES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

A contract for the rental of a farm on shares so far partakes of the nature of contracts for personal service as to make it just to take into consideration the principles by which damages for breaches of contracts for personal service are ascertained, and where, by the breach by the landlord of a contract, the tenant and those to whose services he is entitled are thrown into enforced idleness, only such sums as the tenant, and those to whose services he is entitled, may by reasonable diligence subsequently earn, can be deducted from the value of the tenant's share of crop growing at the time of the breach.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 1361; Dec. Dig. § 331.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 331*)—RENTAL ON SHARES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

A tenant of a farm on shares, wrongfully forced by the landlord to abandon the premises while a crop was growing, was entitled to recover the value of his share, less the sums he, and those to whose services he was entitled, could subsequently earn by reasonable diligence, together with all other expenses, including those for hired labor which he would have incurred in performing his contract; but the expense incurred by the landlord for labor in maturing and harvesting the crop could not be deducted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 1361; Dec. Dig. § 331.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 331*)—RENTAL ON SHARES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

The expenses incurred by a landlord in maturing and harvesting a crop growing at the time he wrongfully evicted the tenant on shares may be taken as evidence of the expense which the tenant would have incurred, provided there is no discernible difference in the results of the management of the landlord and tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 331.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 331*)—RENTAL ON SHARES—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

The doctrine applicable to the ascertainment of damages, when property of one is wrongfully converted by another, is not the rule for the measurement of damages for the wrongful eviction by a landlord of his tenant of a farm on shares; the rights of the parties being founded on contract.

Certified Question from Court of Civil Appeals of Third Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Ramon Cortez and wife against Cullen Crews. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals, and the Court of Civil Appeals certifies a question to the Supreme Court. Question answered.

A. B. Storey and M. C. Jeffrey, for appellant. McNeal & Ellis, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. Certified question from the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third District as follows:

"Preliminary to certifying the hereinafter stated question, we certify that the above styled and numbered cause is now pending in this court, and that it is a suit brought by the appellee, Ramon Cortez, and his wife, Amanda Cortez, against the appellant, Cullen Crews, to recover damages to the extent of one-half the value of a crop planted and raised on about 400 acres of land rented by appellee Ramon Cortez from the appellant, Cullen Crews, for the year 1905; also, an additional sum of $100 salary, claimed by plaintiff, about which no other statement is necessary, as the question certified has no relation to it. The case was tried in the court below before a jury, and verdict and judgment resulted in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $1,500, from which the appellant has perfected this appeal.

"The case made by the plaintiff's petition is substantially as follows: Plaintiff alleged that he rented from the appellant, Crews, 400 acres of farm land with the necessary rent houses. He was to take possession of the premises and cultivate the land for one-half of the crop to be raised thereon; the appellant agreeing to furnish the necessary tools, teams, and feed for the same for the cultivation of the land, and also to furnish necessary seed to plant the same. This contract was alleged to have been made on or about the 1st day of January, 1905, and the plaintiff alleges that he went into possession of the farm, planted and cultivated the same in a proper manner, that on or about the 5th day of June of that year the defendant, through his agent, whose conduct he consented to and ratified, by threats and violence deprived the appellees of possession of the premises and the growing crops, and that they were forced to abandon the same. It is then substantially alleged that the appellant appropriated the crop and converted the same to his own use, and that the total value of the plaintiff's interest in the crop so gathered by the appellant and appropriated was the sum of $3,230, for which amount he sues as actual damages in addition to the $100 before stated. He further alleges that, since the breach of the contract, he (plaintiff), who was a farmer, was not able to procure work of the same kind except to the value of $25 per month, which he admits he is willing to have deducted from the actual damages that he might be entitled to recover. The suit was brought on October 10, 1906. The defendant by answer generally denied the averments of the plaintiff's petition, and denied that he employed the plaintiff to oversee the premises, or gave him control or management of the same, but that he had employed one Flores to attend to his business, including the supervision of the farm which the plaintiff was to cultivate, that plaintiff voluntarily abandoned the premises and the crops, that one of the reasons why he did so was that the merchant who was furnishing supplies refused to further continue to do so, and that he had become liable and bound for an amount of supplies which would consume his interest in the crops to be raised, that, after plaintiff had abandoned the premises and crops, the defendant took possession and cultivated, gathered, and marketed the same at the reasonable expenditure of $2,712, which amount he pleaded as an offset to plaintiff's demand, on the theory that the plaintiff would only be entitled to a one-half interest in the crop, less his proportionate share of the costs and expenses necessarily incurred by the defendant after he took possession. Other facts are stated in the answer, which it is unnecessary to repeat.

"In deference to the verdict of the jury, and in view of the fact that there is evidence to support it, we find the following facts, although there is upon some of the material questions a conflict of evidence: We find that the appellant and appellee did enter into the contract substantially as pleaded by the plaintiff; that the plaintiff took possession of the farming lands, planted the crops, and properly cultivated the same, which consisted principally of corn and cotton, and which was in a fair state of cultivation and in a fairly prosperous condition on or about the 5th day of June, 1905, when the defendant, through his agent and manager, Flores, and with the knowledge and subsequent ratification of the conduct of Flores, by threats and violence forced the plaintiff and his family and his hired hands to abandon the premises and the crops, and by such unlawful and wrongful means the defendant then and thereafter took possession of the premises and crops and caused the crops to be cultivated and gathered, and appropriated to his own use the proceeds. There is evidence which tends to show that the value thereof was about the amount alleged by the plaintiff, which was a sum more than that awarded to him by the verdict of the jury. On the other hand, we find that there is some evidence in the record on behalf of the defendant tending to show that the plaintiff did not abandon and leave the premises and crops on account of the fact that in safety to himself and family he was forced so to do, but that he voluntarily abandoned the same, and the defendant's evidence shows that the entire value of the crop so produced on the premises amounted to about $2,498, and that in order to properly cultivate, gather, and market the crop after it was abandoned by the plaintiff, it was necessary for the defendant to expend a considerable sum of money, near the amount alleged by him in his answer, and there is some evidence from which the conclusion can be reached that such amount so expended was necessary and reasonable. These are all the facts and evidence we find it necessary to state in order to understand and properly give answer to the question certified.

"The trial court, on the measure of damages, and in accordance with the measure pleaded by the plaintiff, instructed the jury that if the plaintiff was, on the grounds alleged, forced to abandon the premises and crops, and thereby the defendant wrongfully deprived him of possession of the same, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover one-half of the value of the entire crop cultivated, matured, and raised upon the premises, less such a sum as the jury might believe from the evidence the plaintiff and family could have earned during the period they were deprived of the possession of the same. The court also instructed the jury that, if they believed that the plaintiff voluntarily abandoned the premises and crops and was not forced to do so, then the court should return a verdict in favor of the defendant.

"The defendant in the court below requested a charge substantially to the effect that, although the plaintiff was driven from the leased premises, as alleged, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the defendant would be entitled to recover on his cross action or offset against the plaintiff the reasonable amount expended for the cultivation, gathering, and marketing of the crop at the time the defendant took possession. This charge was refused. By proper assignment of error the defendant complains of the action of the court in refusing this charge. It has also by assignments, complained of the action of the court on the measure of damages, as stated, on the ground that the plaintiff is only entitled to compensation for the value of his part of the crop, less the reasonable cost and amount expended by the defendant in cultivating, gathering, and marketing the same.

"In deciding similar questions in cases of this character, there is an apparent conflict between the decisions of the Courts of Civil Appeals upon this subject. This conflict is illustrated, on the one hand, by the case Fagan v. Vogt, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 528, 80 S. W. 665, and, on the other, by the case Waggoner v. Moore & Stephens, 101 S. W. 1058, 18 Tex. Ct. Rep. 491, the first case mentioned decided by the Court of Civil Appeals of the First District, and the second case mentioned decided by the Court of Civil Appeals of the Second District, and, in this connection, we desire to call the court's attention to another line of cases which may have some bearing upon this question: M. K. T. Ry. Co. v. Starr, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 313, 8 S. W. 393; Brown v. Pope, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 225, 65 S. W. 42; Cummings v. Masters (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 508.

"We do not intend to certify the conflict of decision, but we propound to the Supreme Court the following question: In view of facts as found by us as sustaining the verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the ground that he was illegally and wrongfully deprived of possession of the premises and the crops produced thereon, did the trial court in its charge submit the correct measure of damages? Or, in other words, would the defendant in such a case be entitled to charge against the plaintiff any part of the reasonable cost and expense of cultivating, gathering, and marketing the crop after the time that the defendant wrongfully and illegally took possession of the same and forced the plaintiff to abandon the same?"

In the case of Rogers v. McGuffey, 96 Tex. 563, 74 S. W. 753, the question as to the measure of damages for the breach of such a contract as that now in question was discussed, and we said: "But contracts like the one in question have additional elements. The parties entering into them stipulate for shares in the crops to be produced as the benefit to be derived from them. The owner of the land expects the share reserved to himself as a return for the cultivation of his land and his other outlay. The benefits expected by the other party are employment and the stipulated return for his labor, and, sometimes, a home for the time. To deprive him of these benefits is to deprive him of that which, in the very contract, both parties to it contemplate he shall receive. It would seem to follow necessarily that his damages should be compensation for what he thus lost. In such a contract the parties enter into a joint business enterprise and stipulate what shall be the advantages to each. When one wrongfully deprives the other of those advantages, he should be required to compensate him for that which the contract stipulated he should have. The objects of the contract have a close analogy to those of a partnership, and, in so far as employment for the labor of one of the parties is one of the purposes, to the contract for personal service." Further in that opinion it is said: "It is true that the plaintiff is not necessarily entitled to recover as fully as if the contract had been performed; it often being necessary to make proper deductions in order to ascertain the true amount of his damages. But it is still true that the probable results of the contract, if executed, its 'value,' as Judge Wheeler calls it in Hassell v. Nutt, 14 Tex. 260, are to be the basis of the inquiry. Hearne v. Garrett, 49 Tex. 626. What deductions should be made must, as indicated by the opinion in the case last cited, depend upon the facts of particular cases." The views thus expressed are sustained by the following authorities: Taylor v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129, 100 Am. Dec. 415; Depew v. Ketchum, 75 Hun, 227, 27 N. Y. Supp. 8; Jewett v. Brooks, 134 Mass. 505; Bowers v. Graves, 8 S. D. 385, 66 N. W. 931.

In Rogers v. McGuffey, and in Waggoner v. Moore & Stephens, 101 S. W. 1038, 18 Tex. Ct. Rep. 491, the contracts were broken before any crops had been brought into existence, and therein they differ from Fagan v. Vogt, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 528, 80 S. W. 665, and Tignor v. Toney, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 518, 35 S. W. 881, in which the decisions were based on the doctrine of wrongful and intentional conversion of personal property, as expressed in the cases last cited in the present certificate. That doctrine is fully stated in Wooden Ware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 432, 1 Sup. Ct. 398, 27 L. Ed. 230, and in the cases there cited. For reasons to be given further on, we are of the opinion that it does not apply to this case. The damages which the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover on facts such as are found by the jury and by the Court of Civil Appeals are to be ascertained, as indicated in Rogers v. McGuffey, by finding the value of the contract to him, or, in other words, of the pecuniary benefits which would have accrued to him had he been allowed to perform it fully. The claim asserted seems to be for the value of the stipulated share of the matured crops, and we shall assume that it would have constituted the entire compensation to plaintiff for fully performing the contract had it been received as the result of such performance. He was thus to receive all the return contemplated for the labor and expense of making and harvesting the crops. The question arises: Is he to receive the value of all of it, when he was relieved of part of the labor and, perhaps, of other expense that would have been necessary to full performance? As was said in Rogers v. McGuffey, such contracts sometimes are intended to furnish employment for the labor of the tenant or cropper. The profit to be realized out of the crops over and above the value of the labor and other outlays expended in making them is therefore not all that is contemplated in such contracts. Employment for the tenant or cropper when so secured is valuable, whether a profit over and above such labor and other expenses is realized or not, and this may be true as to the labor of members of his family which he can control and utilize without extra expense.

By the breaking of the contract he and others whose services he is thus entitled to may be thrown into enforced idleness, and thus he may be denied one of the benefits contemplated in the making of the contract. Such contracts so far partake of the nature of those for personal service as to make it just to take into consideration the principles by which the damages for breaches of those contracts are ascertained, and, in cases where such results as we have just indicated have flowed from the breach, to deduct, not the entire value of the labor that was necessary to the making of the crop, but only such sums as those so thrown out of employment could by reasonable diligence have earned thereafter; but all other expenses, including those for hired labor, which the cropper would have incurred in performing his part of the contract, should be deducted from the value of his share of such crops as he would have made, for the reason that he would have realized from the matured crops only the difference between the value of his share and the cost of their production. Whether or not other deductions should have been required besides that mentioned in the charge we cannot definitely determine, for the reason that the certificate does not state what the evidence was upon the subject.

The plaintiff did not have the right to recover the entire value of the stipulated share of the crops he would have made, if, in order to make them, further expenditures, such as we have indicated, would have been necessary on his part; but he had only the right to recover the difference between such value and the amount of such further outlays, added to the deductions to be made as for such earnings in other employment as are above indicated. Expenses incurred by defendant for labor, or other things, in maturing and harvesting the crops, are not to be deducted in estimating plaintiff's damages. The plaintiff, if the facts be as found, is not chargeable with expenses incurred by the defendant. Burwell v. Brodie, 134 N. C. 540, 47 S. E. 47; Jefcoat v. Gunter, 73 Miss. 539, 19 South. 94; Foley v. S. W. Land Co., 94 Wis. 329, 68 N. W. 994. The crops, as we gather from the certificate, were to be made by the labor of plaintiff and of others employed by him. The expenses he would have incurred might have been more or less than those incurred by defendant, and the crops he would have raised might have been better or worse than those the defendant raised. Of course, in supposable cases there might be no discernible differences in the results of their management, in which case those obtained by the defendant might be taken as evidence of those which the plaintiff would have obtained; but at last the plaintiff's rights are to be judged by that which would have been the result of his performance of the contract.

It may be that the trial court proceeded upon the theory laid down in the cases of Tignor v. Toney and Fagan v. Vogt, supra. We have not found any other authority for the application of that doctrine to such cases as this, where the wrong committed was the breach of an executory contract for the raising of crops; the breach occurring when the crops were immature. The authorities cited above from other states lay down substantially the measure of damages as we have defined it, applied in cases where the crops were growing as well as in those in which they had not been sown when the breaches occurred.

The doctrine applicable where the property of one is taken and converted by another by a willful trespass and without bona fide claim of right does not furnish the rule for cases like this, where the wrong done consists in the breach of a contract under which the crops are to be produced. The rights of the parties are founded on the contract, and the wrong done is compensated for when the injured party is allowed the full value which he would have produced, less the expense which he has been relieved. That difficulty exists in applying this measure of damages recognized by all, but it is the logical and just one, and the trouble encountered is not insuperable.

We have endeavored to so state the law as to answer the question certified substantially, without being able, for lack of full information as to the facts, to determine whether or not the charge given was correct. That question must depend upon whether or not the law as we state it to was properly applied to the evidence.

Certified Questions from Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. P. Atteberry, administrator of O. W. Spradling, deceased, against Mrs. A. G. Burnett and others. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals, and the Court of Civil Appeals certify questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

Certified questions from the Court of Civil Appeals of the Fifth Supreme Judicial District, as follows:

"Atteberry, as an administrator of the estate of O. W. Spradling, deceased, institutes this suit against the appellees, Mrs. A. G.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Burnett, W. F. Jones, and F. M. Newton, on the 19th day of January, 1907. The original petition, omitting its formal parts, is as follows:

"That on or about the 1st day of August, 1905, O. W. Spradling departed this life, and that thereafter, to wit, on the 7th day of September, 1906, letters of administration on the estate of said O. W. Spradling were duly granted to J. P. Atteberry, plaintiff, by the county court of Hunt county, Tex., and that thereupon plaintiff duly qualified as such administrator. That administration of the estate of said O. W. Spradling is still open and pending, and that plaintiff and defendants all reside in Hunt county, Tex. That heretofore, to wit, on the 10th day of February, 1898, the defendant Mrs. A. G. Burnett executed and delivered to C. A. Langford and A. Cameron her certain promissory note for $1,025, payable at Greenville, Tex., both principal and interest. Said note was due on or before the 1st day of January, 1899, with interest from its date until paid at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, the interest payable annually as it accrues, for value received. This note was given as part payment for a certain lot or parcel of land, situated in the city of Greenville, Hunt county, Tex., and being a part of the Epps Gibbons survey, and being the east half of a tract of land deeded by T. A. Ball to W. A. Mowery January 6, 1887, deed recorded in Book Q, p. 354, Hunt County Deed Records, and bounded as follows: Beginning at the southeast corner of said tract deeded by T. A. Ball to W. A. Mowery; thence north with E. B. line of same, 86 vrs.; thence east, 37½ vrs., to beginning. And it was agreed that if this note is placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, or if collected by suit, that said A. G. Burnett is to pay 10 per cent. additional as attorney's fees, both on principal and interest. That this note was given for a part of the purchase money of the above-described premises, and to secure the payment of the said note a vendor's lien was expressly retained on said land as shown in deed of conveyance, bearing even date of said note, from C. A. Langford and wife, E. C. Langford, and said A. Cameron to said Mrs. A. G. Burnett. That said note was, before maturity, transferred and delivered to said O. W. Spradling for a valuable consideration, whereby said O. W. Spradling became the legal owner and holder of said note. After the transfer of said note as aforesaid, said A. Cameron and C. A. Langford departed this life; said A. Cameron leaving all interest he held in the above-described land to his surviving widow, P. A. Cameron, and said C. A. Langford leaving as his only heirs J. D. Langford and his surviving widow, E. C. Langford, both of whom were 21 years of age on the 12th day of January, 1907, and long prior thereto. On the last date above mentioned there was no administration pending, nor any necessity for one on the estate of either said A. Cameron or said C. A. Langford. That on January 12, 1907, said J. D. Langford, Mrs. E. C. Langford, and Mrs. P. A. Cameron executed a deed to J. P. Atteberry, administrator, plaintiff, conveying all their right, title, and interest to said J. P. Atteberry, administrator, in the above-described premises. That when said note was executed said F. M. Newton indorsed the above-described note, thereby becoming responsible for the payment of the same. That defendants, though often requested, have never paid said note, but a part thereof, as follows: On January 2, 1899, $558.05; April 12, 1901, $75; June 17, 1901, $107.50; October 24, 1901, $100. But the balance of remainder of said note remains still due and unpaid, to plaintiff's damage $725, and defendants still refuse and fail to pay said balance. That said W. F. Jones is setting up some kind of a claim to the above-described land, which is a cloud on the title to plaintiff. Wherefore he prays that defendants be cited to answer this petition, that he have judgment for his debt, interest, and costs of suit, and 10 per cent. additional as attorney's fees, and for the foreclosure of his lien, on the above-described premises, and that they be decreed to be sold according to law, and that the sheriff or other officer executing said order of sale shall place the purchaser of the property sold under the same in possession thereof, within 30 days after the date of sale, and for general and equitable relief. But if the court should hold that plaintiff's note is barred by limitation, then plaintiff prays in the alternative for rescission of said sale and to recover said land from said defendants, and that all rights and title of said defendants be divested out of them and be vested in this plaintiff, and that all cloud be removed from plaintiff's title, and for such other and further relief as the court may deem right in law and equity."

"The defendant Mrs. Burnett answered by a general demurrer, general denial, and plea of the statute of limitation of four years in bar of the note sued on. The defendant Newton answered, confessing liability on said note. The defendant Jones pleaded a general demurrer, general denial, not guilty, and, among other things, that he became the owner, in fee simple, of the title to the land described in the plaintiff's petition March 30, 1899, and had held peaceable and adverse possession, etc., of the same under a deed duly recorded for more than five years, next before the commencement of this suit. He prayed that plaintiff take nothing, and that he be quieted in his title to the land. By supplemental petition appellant, after several special exceptions to appellee Jones' answer, pleaded: That in his capacity as administrator, as aforesaid, he was on, to wit, the — day of April, 1899, lawfully seised and possessed of the land in his original pe-tion described, holding the same in fee simple; that on the day and year last aforesaid, the defendants entered upon said premises and ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and unlawfully withheld the possession thereof from this plaintiff, to his damage in the sum of $100. Wherefore, he prays as in his original petition, and that, in the event the court should sustain the defendant Mrs. Burnett's pleas of limitation as to said note, he prays for cancellation and rescission of the contract of sale, and for restitution of said premises, for costs of suit, and all other relief, both general and special, to which he may be entitled in the premises. A trial by the court without a jury resulted as follows: Judgment in favor of plaintiff against F. M. Newton for the sum of $748.97, and in favor of Mrs. Burnett and Jones, that plaintiff take nothing as against them on the note sued on, and that they recover their costs. The general demurrers of Mrs. Burnett and W. F. Jones to that portion of the plaintiff's petition seeking to rescind the sale of the land and to recover the same were sustained, and, plaintiff refusing to amend, it was held that Jones was the owner of the land, and judgment was rendered divesting all title out of plaintiff, Atteberry, as administrator of the estate of Spradling, deceased, and investing the same in Jones. From the judgment thus rendered appellant has appealed to this court and assigns the following errors: First, that 'the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer of defendant W. F. Jones to plaintiff's petition, filed herein.' Second, 'that the court erred in holding that the superior title to the land in controversy held by C. A. Langford and A. Cameron did not descend to their heirs at their death, and that the same could not by said heirs be transferred to plaintiff.'

"This court at a former day of the present term reversed and remanded this cause for trial, and it is again before us on motion for a rehearing. Our opinion appears to be in conflict with the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals for the Sixth Supreme Judicial District in the case of Bledsoe et al. v. Fitts, 105 S. W. 1142. Hence the necessity or advisability of certifying the question involved for the decision of the Supreme Court:

"Question 1. Did the trial court err in sustaining the general demurrer of W. F. Jones to that portion of the plaintiff's petition seeking to recover the land?

"Question 2. Does the superior title, which remains in the vendor of land where the vendor's lien is expressly reserved in the deed to secure the purchase-money note given therefor, and which note has been assigned to a third party, descend, upon the death of the vendor (he not having conveyed such title before his death) to his heirs, and will it, when conveyed by them to the assignee of such note after it is barred by the statute of limitation, support an action of trespass to try title by him to recover the land?"

Yates & Carpenter and Atteberry & Perry for appellant. Neyland & Neyland, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The two questions submit to the same proposition of law, to which we answer that, upon the death of C. A. Langford and A. Cameron, the legal title to the land in question descended to and vested in the heirs in trust for the holder of the vendor's lien note, and the conveyance made by the heirs of the said Langford and Cameron to J. P. Atteberry, administrator of Spradling, vested in the latter the legal title to the land for the benefit of the estate he represented.

The decision of the Court of Civil Appeals in the present case is not in conflict with Bledsoe v. Fitts, 105 S. W. 1142. In that case, the original vendor of the land still retained the ownership of the purchase-money note at the time of her death. She died without children, leaving a husband and sisters, and the issue presented was who inherited from her the vendor's lien note. Her sisters claimed that, as the legal title to the land remained in her, therefore the vendor's lien note would descend as if it were real estate, while the husband claimed that he inherited the note from her as personal property. That case was presented to the court on application for writ of error, and the writ refused for the reason that the note was personal property and descended to the husband. We see nothing in the opinion of Justice Levy which would justify the conclusion that it was intended by that court to decide the question here presented.

Langford and Cameron, the original vendors, having transferred the note to Spradling, held the legal title to the land in trust to secure the payment of the note. When Langford and Cameron died, the legal title must have passed to and vested in some one. It could not vest in the holder of the note unless it was conveyed to him by the original vendors of the land or their heirs. It could not vest in the vendee until the purchase money was paid. Therefore, to preserve the trust, the title must pass and vest by descent in the heir at law of the deceased vendors. 1 Perry on Trusts, § 342; Wainwright v. Bright, 1 J. & W. 195.

The trust in this case is similar to the one which exists in the vendor under an executory contract for the sale of land after the purchase money has been paid. In such case the vendor holds the legal title in trust for the vendee, and, the original vendor dying, the legal title descends to the heirs for the benefit of the cestui que trust. We can see no reason for a distinction between that class of cases and the one under consideration. In each the vendor is wholly divested of the equitable title to the land, and in neither case does the descent confer upon the heir a beneficial interest in the land; but the legal title is a valuable right held by the vendor for the holder of the note. The vendor could not terminate this trust by conveying the land to another, nor by purchasing the equitable title. Russell v. Kirkbride, 62 Tex. 455. It can be united with the equitable estate only by payment of the purchase money. To hold that the legal title did not descend to the heir is to hold that it was extinguished, and that there is an estate in land to which there is no legal title in existence.

We have not been able to find any authority in point, but we believe that the application of the general principles above stated brings the correct solution of the question as expressed in our answer above.

PARKS et al. v. WEST et al.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 18, 1908.)

On motion for rehearing. Motion overruled. For former opinion, see 111 S. W. 728.

WILLIAMS, J. The argument in support of the motion contends that the original opinion is based entirely upon the word "within," and does not give proper weight to the whole of the phrase, "within all or any of the counties," and it is urged that the words "all or any" would be useless to express only the meaning which we have ascribed to the Constitution. It is very easy to see why those words were used. The power proposed in the constitutional amendment was to be one to provide for school districts either by general or special law—by general law "within all," or by special law "within any," of the counties. But in all cases the districts were to be within all or within some of the counties. As we pointed out in the original opinion, all of those words would have been wholly useless, and out of place, had the purpose been to give unlimited power to create districts out of any territory without regard to the division of the state and counties. We are treating, of course, of the creation of districts to be invested with the power of local taxation granted by the amendment to the Constitution, and our holding is that, as formed, the district of Mertens does not so conform to the Constitution as to have that power.

Motion overruled.

Appeal from District Court, Red River county; Ben H. Denton, Judge.

Henry Mathis was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the state.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was indicted in the district court of Red River county on a charge of burglary. On trial he was convicted, and his punishment assessed at a term of four years in the penitentiary.

The record comes to us without statement of facts, without bill of exceptions, and without motion for a new trial. It is obvious that, under the well-settled rules of this court, we can grant him no relief.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 721*)—TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—COMMENTS ON ACCUSED'S FAILURE TO TESTIFY IN FORMER TRIAL.

Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 770, providing that failure of accused to testify shall not be considered, or commented on by counsel, applies where accused was testifying on the second trial of his case, but had not testified on the first trial and a question asked him on cross-examination by the county attorney as to whether his testimony then given was the same as on the former trial, and comments in his argument on accused's failure to testify in the former trial, constituted reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1672; Dec. Dig. § 721.*]

Appeal from District Court, McLennan County; Richard I. Munroe, Judge.

Charles T. Wilson was convicted of horse theft, and appeals. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. This is an appeal prosecuted from the district court of McLennan county on a conviction for theft of a horse. The trial resulted in a conviction of theft as charged, and the punishment of appellant was assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

There are a number of questions made by appellant; but as the case must be reversed on account of the argument of the county attorney, and as the other matters may not arise on another trial, we deem it unnecessary to discuss them.

The record shows this is the second trial of appellant on this same charge. On this trial appellant became a witness in his own behalf, and on cross-examination, over the protest of appellant, the county attorney asked him if his testimony on this trial was the same as on the former trial. This was objected to, because it was inadmissible, irrelevant, immaterial, and highly prejudicial to appellant, in that it disclosed to the jury the fact that there had been a former trial of said cause, and because the statute inhibits any allusion to or comment on the fact that the defendant failed to take the stand in his own behalf in said cause. Following this objection, and in argument, counsel for the state said to the jury that the defendant on a former trial of said case failed to take the stand and swear to the alibi pleaded in said cause; that he failed to take the stand in his own behalf in said former trial; that this defense of alibi was an afterthought of defendant, and was a fabrication invented since said trial. These remarks of the county attorney were objected to, and the court requested to withdraw same from the jury, and to instruct the jury not to consider same, which objections and request were then and there by the court overruled.

Both the question asked and the argument made, as complained of, were improper, and should not have been allowed. Article 770 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1895 provides: "Any defendant in a criminal action shall be permitted to testify in his own behalf therein, but the failure of any defendant to so testify shall not be taken as a circumstance against him, nor shall the same be alluded to or commented on by counsel in the cause." That this applies to comment on the failure of the defendant to testify in a case then on trial has been repeatedly held by us. See Jordan v. State, 29 Tex. Cr. App. 595, 16 S. W. 543, Reed v. State, 29 Tex. Cr. App. 449, 16 S. W. 99, Hunt v. State, 28 Tex. Cr. App. 149, 12 S. W. 737, 19 Am. St. Rep. 815, and numerous cases since then. It was held in the case of Richardson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 518, 27 S. W. 139, that the statute above quoted was comprehensive enough in its terms and covered a preceding trial, and that, though the defendant might testify in the case then being tried, if the same case had been tried at a former term of the court, and defendant had failed to testify on such trial, any allusion to his failure would constitute reversible error. A similar decision was rendered in the case of Dorrs v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 40 S. W. 311. See, also, Gaines v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 53 S. W. 623.

For the error indicated, the judgment of conviction is set aside, and the cause is remanded for another trial.

MALONE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 91*)—SIMPLE ASSAULT—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to support a conviction of simple assault.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 136; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

Appeal from Bowle County Court; Sam H. Smelser, Judge.

Earnest Malone, charged with committing an aggravated assault, was convicted of a simple assault, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was charged in the county court of Bowle county with committing an aggravated assault upon one M. Smith. On trial he was found guilty of a simple assault, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $5.

There is in the record, as it comes to neither charge of the court, nor bills of exception, nor any special charges requested. The only question which we can consider is the first assignment of error made in appellant's motion for a new trial, to the effect that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and the evidence, in that the evidence shows conclusively that defendant is not guilty of any violation of law, and that such verdict should not stand, for the reason that the testimony of the prosecuting witness, on whose evidence alone the conviction is based, shows that he was an excessive user of morphine, that his memory is impaired, that he relates things as occurring when in fact they did not occur, and that he is altogether too irresponsible to be believed. The case is rather a singular one, and a strong attack is made upon the memory of the prosecuting witness. He is, however, supported by the testimony of another witness to some extent, and we are not prepared to say, under all the circumstances, that he is so wholly unworthy of belief as to justify us in reversing the judgment of the court below. The jury who heard his testimony and the court who tried the case were in a better situation than ourselves to pass fairly on his credibility. We do not believe, as presented, we would be authorized to reverse the judgment on the sole ground that the evidence does not support the verdict.

Finding no error in the proceedings below, the judgment is affirmed.

PRESCOTT v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, that if from the acts of prosecuting witness or his words there was created in defendant's mind a reasonable apprehension that he was in danger of losing his life, or of serious bodily injury, then defendant had the right to defend himself from such danger, or apparent danger, as it reasonably appeared to him, and that a party unlawfully attacked is not bound to retreat to avoid the necessity of killing, and defendant committed the assault as a means of defense, believing that he was in danger of losing his life or serious bodily injury, he should be acquitted, did not limit the right of selffense to an actual attack by prosecuting witness upon defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 616, 617; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

A charge, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, that if defendant assaulted prosecuting witness with a deadly weapon, to wit, a knife, but at the time was by some adequate cause moved to such a degree of anger, sudden resentment, or terror as to render him incapable of cool reflection, and in such a state of mind committed the assault, and such assault was not in defense of himself against unlawful attack, then to find defendant guilty of an aggravated assault, did not place upon defendant the burden to show the facts reducing the assault to an aggravated assault, where the court had theretofore clearly submitted the issue of assault with intent to murder, and had also charged that, if the jury believed defendant guilty of an assault, or had a reasonable doubt as to whether it was with intent to murder, then to acquit him of that offense and consider whether he was guilty of an aggravated assault, or was justified in his action, and in addition gave a general charge that defendant was presumed innocent until his guilt was established beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1900, 1904; Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Nor was the instruction subject to the criticism that it instructed that the knife used was, as a matter of law, a deadly weapon, where the court had previously defined a deadly weapon as one which from the manner used is calculated to produce death or serious bodily injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1900, 1904; Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 338*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—PREJUDICE.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, it is shown beyond doubt that defendant struck and wounded prosecuting witness with a knife, and that the wounds, of which there were several, were both dangerous and well-nigh mortal, defendant cannot complain of a charge that the knife was, as a matter of law, a deadly weapon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715-720; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, that if defendant sought a meeting with prosecuting witness to slay him, and did some act, or used some language, with intent to produce the occasion and bring on the difficulty, and the same was reasonably calculated to provoke a difficulty, and on such account prosecuting witness attacked him, and defendant then attempted to slay prosecuting witness, defendant could not justify on the ground of self-defense, but such attack by defendant would be assault with intent to murder; but, if defendant had no such purpose in seeking the fatal meeting, and was attacked by prosecuting witness, then his right of self-defense would not be forfeited, and he could stand his ground and defend himself by the use of such means of defense as the circumstances indicated to be necessary to protect himself from danger or what reasonably appeared to him to be danger—did not shift the burden of proof to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 632; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS.

Nor was the charge subject to the objection that it was limited, in its application of the law of self-defense, to an actual attack, since it expressly included apparent danger, and that as viewed from the standpoint of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 629; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—REQUESTED CHARGES COVERED BY CHARGE GIVEN.

Requested charges which, so far as applicable, have been covered by the general charge of the court are properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

Appeal from District Court, Armstrong County; J. N. Browning, Judge.

Will Prescott was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

L. C. Barrett, J. M. Jones, Geo. W. Wharton, and J. S. Stallings, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was indicted in the district court of Potter county on a charge of assault with intent to murder. The trial from which this appeal results was had in Armstrong county, where the case was sent on change of venue on application of appellant. The case has twice been before this court, and the facts will appear with a reasonable fullness in the earlier opinions of the court in this case as found in 101 S. W. 215, and 105 S. W. 192. On this trial appellant was found guilty of assault with intent to murder, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for two years. Appellant assigns a number of errors on which a reversal is sought.

1. Among other things, complaint is made of the charge of the court on the issue of self-defense, and the claim is made that the court's charge limits the right of self-defense to an actual attack made upon him by the prosecuting witness W. H. Reece. We think the charge of the court, taken altogether, is not subject to this complaint. On the law of self-defense the court instructed the jury as follows: "Upon the law of self-defense you are instructed that, if from the acts of the said W. H. Reece, or from his words coupled with his acts, there was created in the mind of defendant a reasonable apprehension that he (the defendant) was in danger of losing his life, or of suffering serious bodily injury at the hands of the said W. H. Reece, then the defendant had the right to defend himself from such danger, or apparent danger, as it reasonably appeared to him at the time, viewed from his standpoint. And a party so unlawfully attacked is not bound to retreat in order to avoid the necessity of killing his assailant. If you believe that the defendant committed the assault as a means of defense, believing at the time he did so (if he did so) that he was in danger of losing his life, or of serious bodily injury at the hands of said W. H. Reece, then you will acquit the defendant." We think that the charge of the court taken altogether is not subject to any serious objection, but substantially charges the law as applied to the facts of the case.

2. Again complaint is made of the eighth paragraph of the court's charge. This paragraph is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant in the county of Potter and state of Texas, on or about the time charged in the indictment, with a deadly weapon, to wit, a knife, did unlawfully assault the said W. H. Reece, as charged, but at the time of making such assault the defendant was by some adequate cause (as hereafter explained) moved to such a degree of anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror as to render him for the time incapable of cool reflection, and in such a state of mind he committed said assault, and that such assault was not in defense of himself against an unlawful attack producing a reasonable expectation or fear of death or serious bodily injury, then you will find the defendant guilty of an aggravated assault, and assess his punishment at a fine not less than $25, nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than one month, nor more than two years, or by such fine and imprisonment, as you may determine and state in your verdict." In respect to this paragraph of the court's charge two complaints are made. First, it is contended that this charge threw upon appellant the burden of proof to show the facts which would reduce the assault, if unlawful, to the grade of aggravated assault. Again it is claimed and contended that the effect of the court's charge is to instruct the jury in terms that the weapon (the knife) with which the assault was made was in fact, as in law, a deadly weapon. We do not believe that either of these contentions can be sustained. In paragraph 6 of the court's charge, preceding that complained of, the court had submitted very clearly the issue of assault with intent to murder, and grouped the facts necessary to be proven in order to sustain a verdict of such offense. In the seventh paragraph of the court's charge the following instruction is given: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant is guilty of an assault, but have a reasonable doubt as to whether such assault was upon malice aforethought, with intent to murder (as hereinbefore explained to you), then you will acquit him of that offense, and next consider whether he is guilty of an aggravated assault, or whether he was justified in his action." In addition to this the court gave a general instruction, to the effect, in substance, that the defendant was presumed to be innocent until his guilt was established by legal evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, and that in case the jury should have a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, they would acquit him. Nor do we think the charge complained of is subject to the criticism that it instructed the jury as a matter of fact that the knife used was a deadly weapon. The court in the third paragraph of the charge to the jury had thus instructed the jury: "An assault becomes aggravated when committed with a deadly weapon. A deadly weapon is one which, from the manner used, is calculated or likely to produce death or serious bodily injury." Construed in the light of this instruction, the statement of the court complained of did not undertake nor have the effect to declare, as a matter of fact, that the knife used was a deadly weapon, but merely stated the kind of weapon, and left it to be found as a fact as to whether it was in truth a deadly weapon as that term is used in the law. Nor do we believe in the event that appellant is in a situation to complain if it be conceded that the court's terms told the jury that the knife was such an instrument as from the manner of its use was likely to produce death or serious bodily injury. The evidence shows, beyond doubt or controversy, indeed, is admitted, that appellant struck and wounded prosecuting witness Reece with a knife. The evidence beyond dispute that the wounds of which there were several, were both dangerous and well-nigh mortal. Logan v. State (Tex. App.) 53 S. W. 694.

3. Complaint is also made of the charge of the court in respect to the issue of provocation, the difficulty, and the claim is made, in respect to this portion of the court's charge, that it shifts the burden of proof on the appellant. We do not think, considering the charge of the court altogether, that this contention can be sustained. The charge of the court complained of is as follows: "If I further charge you that, if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant sought the meeting with the said W. H. Reece for the purpose of slaying said Reece, and, having found him, did so act, or used some language, or did both, with intent to produce the occasion and bring about the difficulty, and that the same, under the circumstances, was or were reasonably calculated to provoke a difficulty, and on such account the said W. H. Reece attacked him, and he then attempted to slay said Reece in pursuance of his original design, then the defendant cannot justify on the ground of self-defense, but such attack, on defendant's part, would be assault with intent to murder, provided, if said Reece had been killed under such circumstances, it would have been murder of either the first or second degree; but if defendant had no such purpose in seeking the fatal meeting, or, having had the meeting, did not act reasonably calculated to provoke the difficulty, and was attacked by the said W. H. Reece, then his right of self-defense would not be forfeited, and he could stand his ground and defend himself by the use of such means of defense as the facts and circumstances indicated to be necessary to protect himself from danger, or what reasonably appeared to him at the time to be danger, viewed from his standpoint." Nor is this charge subject to the objection that it is limited, in its application of the law of self-defense, to an actual attack, since it expressly includes conditions of apparent danger, and that as viewed from the standpoint of appellant.

4. We have carefully considered the several special charges requested by appellant, and they seem to us, so far as applicable, to have been covered by the general charge of the court, and we do not believe there was any error in refusing same.

We have carefully examined the statement of facts, and believe that the testimony fully supports the verdict of conviction rendered in the case, and that there is no reason why we should interfere or intervene. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the court below be, and the same is hereby, in all things affirmed.

SOMERS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 543*)—TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY AT EXAMINING TRIAL.

In a trial for theft, a sufficient predicate was laid for the admission of testimony of non-resident witnesses taken on the examining trial where it was shown that the witnesses, at the time of the alleged theft, were passing through the state when it occurred, and the district attorney testified that, in reply to a letter written to one of the witnesses at his address in Ohio, witness answered that he would be unable to attend the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1233, 1236; Dec. Dig. § 543.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 662*)—TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—RIGHT OF ACCUSED TO CONFRONT WITNESSES—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Bill of Rights, § 10, guaranteeing that every person accused of crime shall be confronted with the witnesses against him is not contravened in a criminal case by the admission of testimony of nonresident witnesses taken at the examining trial; a sufficient predicate being laid therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1542; Dec. Dig. § 662.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 545*)—EVIDENCE.

Where testimony is taken, in an examining trial before a magistrate on a charge of a different offense than the one being tried, such testimony in reference to the distinct offense is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1235; Dec. Dig. § 545.*]

Appeal from District Court, Webb County; F. Mullally, Judge.

Leo Somers was convicted of theft, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. Winslow and Anderson & Belden, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was indicted in the district court of Webb county on a charge that he did, on the 21st day of March, 1908, fraudulently and privately take from the possession of one Fritz Boehler one pocketbook of the value of $20. On trial he was convicted, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the state penitentiary for a term of two years.

A number of reasons are assigned why the judgment of conviction should be set aside and the cause reversed. Some of these questions relate to matters which are not likely to arise on another trial of the case; and, in view of the fact that it is to be reversed, we shall discuss only the matters hereinafter referred to.

Counsel for appellant urge that the court erred in admitting in evidence the testimony of Christine Schneider and John Schneider, who were alleged to be nonresidents of the state. This testimony was objected to for many reasons. Among others, that the absence of these witnesses and their residence beyond the state were not sufficiently proven. We think, in view of the fact that it was shown that these witnesses at the time of the alleged theft were passing through Laredo, that their residence was Cleveland, Ohio, and that they were bound on a pleasure trip to Monterey, Mexico, in connection with the testimony of the district attorney that he had written a letter to John Schneider, to the address given him by said witness, at Cleveland, Ohio, and that he received a reply from him in substance and to the effect that he would be unable to attend the trial, furnish a sufficient predicate for the admission of the testimony taken on the examining trial, if the same had otherwise been admissible. The general objection is made that the court erred in admitting said testimony for the reason that same is in contravention of section 10 of the Bill of Rights in this state, which guarantees that every person shall be confronted with the witnesses against him. On full consideration this question was decided adversely to the contention of appellant in the case of Earl Hobbs v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 112 S. W. 316. This further additional objection was made, however, which we think must be sustained: Because the admission of said written testimony of these witnesses by the court was error, because said testimony was given by them before a justice of the peace of Webb county holding an examining trial for an offense where appellant was charged by affidavit with the theft of property, to wit, one diamond stud from the possession of John Schneider, which said charge and case is a different and distinct transaction from the one in which this defendant was on trial and of which he was convicted, to wit, the theft of one pocketbook and $20 from the person of Fritz Boehler. We think the rule ought not to be extended beyond that laid down in the case of Hobbs v. State, supra, and where, as in this case, testimony is taken, in an examining trial before a magistrate, on a charge of another and different offense than the one being tried, that such testimony in reference to the distinct offense should not be admitted. We are not aware that this precise question has ever been passed on in this state, but in reason there seems to be no safe ground upon which the admission of such testimony can be sustained.

For the error pointed out, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

Ex parte BLACK.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 149*)—LIMITATIONS—RAPE.

A prosecution for rape is barred by limitations, where the first intercourse charged occurred more than a year prior to the beginning of the prosecution.

2. RAPE (§ 51*)—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a prosecution for rape considered and held to show consent by the prosecutrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

Appeal from District Court, Galveston County; Lewis Fisher, Judge.

Petition by J. H. Black for writ of habeas corpus was denied, and he appeals. Reversed, and relator ordered discharged.

R. H. & Alice S. Tiernan, for appellant.
F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Relator applied to the Honorable Lewis Fisher, judge of the Tenth judicial district of Texas, for a writ of habeas corpus, and upon hearing was remanded to the custody of the sheriff on a charge in the justice court of rape.

It appears from the record that relator had previously had an examining trial on the 21st of September, 1908, before the justice of the peace of said county, and remanded to custody in default of the giving of a $5,000 bond. Upon a subsequent hearing the district judge fixed the bond at $2,000.

The prosecuting witness swears that the first carnal intercourse took place in the month of May, 1907, more than a year prior to the beginning of the prosecution in this case. It follows therefore that the prosecution is barred by the statute of limitation. Furthermore, we do not think the evidence in this case shows the offense of rape, but, on the contrary, shows a clear consent on the part of the prosecutrix. We do not deem it necessary to collate the evidence. Suffice it to say, the prosecutrix is 23 years of age and the circumstances show that the illicit intercourse occurred in the kitchen, with relator's family sitting on the gallery, and the intercourse occurred under such circumstances that showed clear consent on the part of the prosecutrix. Furthermore, she made no outcry and manifested no concern about the supposed outrage upon her until a year or more afterwards.

The judgment is, accordingly, reversed, and relator ordered discharged.

CASEY v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 1, 1908.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 110*)—EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE.

If decedent attacked accused with a knife with threats to kill him, accused was justified in shooting him in self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 140-142; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence tended to show that the killing was in self-defense, an instruction authorizing a conviction for manslaughter was improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-654; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 39*)—MANSLAUGHTER—SUICIDE—PASSION.

If decedent was 8 or 10 feet from accused when he drew a knife with threats and turned as if to go to accused, when the latter shot him so that accused was in no real danger at the time, but the threatened attack inflamed his mind so as to prevent cool reflection, the killing could constitute manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 59-61; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence showed that accused killed deceased because of a threatened attack which might have inflamed his mind beyond cool reflection but placed him in no real danger, a charge on manslaughter based on the theory of a real attack was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-654; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence showed that deceased made an actual attack on accused with threats to kill, a charge on self-defense based on the theory of an actual attack which caused accused to believe he was in danger of great bodily harm, etc., was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614-632; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the state introduced accused's statements as to the manner of the killing, there being no other evidence of the occurrence, the court should have instructed that the state must disprove accused's statements to obtain a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1846; Dec. Dig. § 778.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Accused having testified fully as to the manner of the killing, so that the state's case did not rest entirely on statements of accused as to killing proved by the state by other witnesses, the court's omission to charge that the state must disprove accused's statements to secure a conviction, if error, was not reversible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3164-3163; Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

Appeal from District Court, Titus County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

John Casey was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appealed. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 433, 102 S. W. 725.

R. T. Wilkinson, R. E. Davenport, Templeton, Crosby & Densmore, and Ralston & Ward, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree, his punishment being assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary. The record does not contain any bills of exception. The errors assigned are directed against the charge of the court on manslaughter and self-defense.

1. In regard to manslaughter, the court charged as follows: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant shot and thereby killed the said J. F. Harrison, but you further believe from the evidence that, at the time he did so, the deceased had made an attack on him with a knife, and you further believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was not justified in so doing, on the ground of self-defense as this law is given to you in this charge hereafter, but you do believe that such attack on defendant would commonly have produced a degree of anger, rage, resentment, or terror in a person of ordinary temper sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection, then you may find that such attack is adequate cause to reduce the homicide to the grade of manslaughter." Then follows a general charge under which the jury were instructed that any condition or circumstance which, in their opinion, would commonly produce such degree of anger, rage, resentment, etc., might be adequate cause.

We are of opinion that the charge is incorrect. The facts upon which this charge was predicated arise out of a difficulty occurring at the time of the homicide. Appellant was the owner of the premises at the time the homicide occurred, deceased being his tenant or renter. Without going into a statement of the conversation, appellant was standing in the door that led onto the gallery—perhaps just outside of the door on the gallery—deceased was sitting on the steps that led up from the ground onto the gallery.

Deceased became sufficiently angered to arise from his seat, draw his knife and threatened to cut off the head of appellant, and turned around as if to start in the direction of appellant, who was, perhaps, some 8 or 10 feet away. Appellant reached up on the rack above the door, just on the inside, pulled down a gun and fired. Deceased ran out in the yard and died. This is substantially the evidence of the witness Hill as to the statements made to him by appellant shortly after the homicide.

Appellant took the stand and testified that an angry altercation occurred between them; that deceased got up, opened his knife, and started at him, and he reached up and got the gun, and deceased grabbed appellant's gun with his left hand, undertaking to cut him with the knife in his right hand; that he jerked loose and fired without taking aim, the shot resulting fatally; that deceased ran out in the yard, fell down and died. The evidence shows that there was considerable amount of blood on the steps, except perhaps the top step, and a few specks of blood on the gallery, and from the steps to where deceased fell there was quite a trail of blood. The wound evidently cut an artery from which the blood flowed very copiously.

Under the charge quoted above and criticised by appellant, a conviction for manslaughter was authorized by reason of the actual attack made by the deceased upon appellant. If deceased made any attack upon appellant at all, it was with a knife with a threat to kill. That was an actual attack, and justified appellant in shooting, and he would not be guilty under the law of self-defense. Therefore, manslaughter could not be predicated upon that state of case, for in giving this charge on manslaughter, from the standpoint of an actual or real attack made by deceased with his knife, accompanied by a threat to kill, the court authorized the jury to convict of manslaughter on a state of case under which appellant was justified by law, and a verdict should have been returned in his favor of acquittal. This charge was evidently wrong in submitting manslaughter on an actual or real attack under the facts of the case. There is but one theory, as we understand this record, upon which manslaughter could be predicated, and that is when deceased got up, pulled his knife, and turned as if to go to appellant, and appellant shot, he being in no real danger from the drawn knife of deceased—across the gallery 8 or 10 feet away from him. If this was the condition of things when appellant shot, there was no real danger. There was a threatened attack, which might have inflamed the mind of appellant beyond capacity for cool reflection, and under such circumstances, if he shot, it could constitute manslaughter. We are of opinion that the charge criticised is erroneous, based upon a state of facts upon which self-defense alone could be predicated. We, therefore, are of opinion that this charge is incorrect, first, in basing the charge upon a real attack, and, second, in placing appellant's case before the jury so that he might be convicted of manslaughter on a case of self-defense.

2. The charge on self-defense is criticised wherein the court informed the jury that if appellant killed Harrison, but at the time he did so Harrison had made an attack on him, which, from the manner and character of it, etc., created in his mind or caused him to believe that he had a reasonable expectation or fear of death or serious bodily injury, and acting under such reasonable expectation the defendant killed deceased, they should acquit him. We have sufficiently stated the facts as testified by appellant. Under his testimony it showed an actual attack, and the court, therefore, was not in error in submitting the theory of self-defense on the idea of an actual attack.

3. There were no eyewitnesses to the transaction who testified on the trial, except appellant. The state, therefore, introduced appellant's statements through some of the witnesses as to how the transaction occurred. Had the case closed at this point, appellant's contention that the court should have informed the jury that the state would be required to disprove his statements in order to obtain a conviction, under the authority of Jones v. State, 29 Tex. App. 20, 13 S. W. 990, 25 Am. St. Rep. 715, Pratt v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 227, 96 S. W. 8, and Slade v. State, 29 Tex. App. 381, 16 S. W. 253, would be correct. For a full discussion of the matter, in addition to the cases cited, see Combs v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 108 S. W. 649, and Pratt v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 109 S. W. 138. However, this charge may not be necessary in this case, inasmuch as the defendant took the stand in his own behalf and testified fully in regard to the facts of the case, and the case was not therefore one alone based upon the confessions or statements. As the case is presented, therefore, we would not feel called upon to reverse the judgment for this omission in the charge.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

THOMPSON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 364*)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

Where the breaking up of a dance by accused was what caused the difficulty leading to the assault for which he was on trial, evidence that he broke up the dance was admissible as part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 813; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 783*)—TRIAL.—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHING TESTIMONY.

Where the jury could not have considered impeaching testimony for any other purpose than for impeachment, the failure to so limit the testimony by charge was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1875; Dec. Dig. § 783.*]

Appeal from District Court, Caldwell County; L. W. Moore, Judge.

Buddie Thompson was convicted of assault to murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of assault to murder, and his punishment assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

Bill of exceptions No. 1 complains that the court erred in permitting the state's witness to testify that appellant broke up the dance, appellant's objection being that he was indicted for breaking up a dance or for disturbing the peace. The bill shows that this is the occasion that caused the difficulty, and is part of the res gestæ.

Bill of exceptions No. 2 complains that the court erred in permitting the state to prove that the reputation of the appellant was for truth and veracity, the objection being made that the witnesses had not qualified themselves to speak of the reputation. The bill of exceptions as well as the statement of facts show the witnesses did qualify themselves.

The next bill complains that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury in the charge in regard to impeaching testimony. The jury could not have used the impeaching testimony for any other purpose than impeachment. This being the case, it is unnecessary to limit same in the charge to impeachment. See Givens v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 563, 34 S. W. 626.

The charge of the court presented every phase of the evidence. Appellant's special charges were properly covered in the main charge.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—ERRORS IN CHARGE—ELIMINATION.

6. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—MANSLAUGHTER—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

7. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—SELF-DEFENSE—THREATS—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that if decedent made threats, and at the time of the difficulty made demonstrations as if to execute them, the jury should consider the fact with reference to self-defense, was erroneous as leaving the jury to find that threats were made, while they should have been told that the criterion was whether accused believed that threats had been made.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 811*)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where there was evidence that accused, relying on self-defense, had been criminally intimate with decedent's wife prior to the homicide, an instruction that evidence of that fact could be considered only to show motive on the part of decedent was erroneous for singling out a particular fact so as to tend to eliminate accused's right of self-defense.

Appeal from District Court, Hopkins County; R. L. Porter, Judge.

Walter Pannell was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. O. James and C. E. Sheppard, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of manslaughter, his punishment being assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The substance of the evidence is that there were unkind feelings between appellant and deceased, deceased being jealous in regard to the relations that he believed existed between appellant and his wife, and which may, in fact, have existed. Deceased had conceived the idea, with perhaps evidence to justify his belief, that appellant had alienated to some extent the affections of his wife, and was suspicious, if not convinced, of the fact that they had been criminally intimate. This engendered in his mind an excited state of ill will towards appellant, so much so that on one or more occasions he had threatened to take the life of appellant. Some time previous to the homicide deceased armed himself and asked a friend to accompany him to the oilmills where he thought he would catch appellant and his, deceased's, wife in compromising relations. The friend did not accede to the request, but deceased went to the point and there found appellant. A witness testified that he heard part of the conversation between appellant and deceased at the oilmills in which deceased proposed to appellant to shoot it out or cut it out with him. Appellant declined. The wife of deceased, however, was not present with appellant, nor is there any evidence tending to show, that she had been with appellant at that time and place. On the night of the homicide the negroes of the town had met at the residence of Jeff Sparks to engage in a "festival." Sparks expected to sell candles and other things to the assembled crowd, and was in a room in the house making preparations to this end. The crowd had congregated in one of the rooms of the house where they were playing and dancing. While engaged in dancing, deceased was dancing with his wife, and appellant was dancing with the sister-in-law of deceased, Lela Templeton. Deceased was "calling the set;" had called all around until he reached appellant and Lela Templeton. At this point he failed to call, and appellant asked if he did not intend to call his dance. Deceased inquired whether he liked it. Appellant indicated he did not. Lela Templeton testified at this point that she did not recollect just what was said between the parties, "but I think I said 'Harrison, mind out your business,' and he said, 'I thought you negroes had sense to know when your time come.' I don't know exactly what Gete said, but he said something like, 'If you are going to call this set, why don't you call us like the rest?' Then Harrison said something, asked if he did not like it or something like that, and Gete said, 'No, you God damn black bastard, I don't.' Then they both threw their hands to their pockets like they were going after their guns, and started towards each other. I caught hold of Gete, and Ellen took hold of Harrison. Gete turned around to Jim Nash, a boy they always called Monk, and said 'Monk, let's go home; I will get into trouble here.' Monk said, 'Let's be hitting the door,' and they started on out of the house. Harrison was trying to get loose, and I took hold of him and helped Ellen to hold him. He said, 'Turn me loose; I am not scared of the damn son of a bitch.' When Harrison said this Gete turned and said, 'If you follow me out of here with that little Harrington, I'll make you eat it up.' Gete is the nickname for appellant. Ellen is the wife of deceased, and witness was the dancing partner of appellant. This is practically the state's case of the transaction to that point. Lum Kay testified for the appellant that he knew the parties and was present at the time of the killing and saw both difficulties. "The first one came up over the dance. Harrison was calling the set, and Gete was dancing in it. Harrison called all the boys till it came Gete's time, and then he did not call him. Gete asked him why he didn't call him, and Harrison said, 'You damn negroes ought to know when your time comes'; and then he asked Gete if he didn't like it, and said, 'If you don't like it, rise up.' He then threw his hand to his right hip pocket and started towards Gete. Gete threw his hand towards his pocket, and Harrison's wife and Lela Templeton grabbed Harrison. Gete walked off and said to Jim Nash, 'Come on and let's go; I will get into trouble here.' He then started on out, and Harrison was trying to get loose and said, 'Turn me loose, he's got his gun and I've got mine.' Gete said, 'Don't follow me out here with that little Saturday night gun or I'll make you eat it.' Gete then went on out. Directly Gete came back in the room where the dance was and was talking to Ada Bates by the fire. Harrison came in and looked straight at Gete. Joe Bates called him and said something to him about not having any trouble, and Harrison spoke out loud enough for Gete to hear him that he was not afraid of the damn long black son of a bitch, and then he walked over in the corner close to Gete. Louis Templeton walked up to him and said something to him, and he again said he was not afraid of the son of a bitch, and then he said to Gete: 'Gete, do you think I am scared of you?' and Gete said, 'No, you are a man just like me.' Harrison was then walking over to the corner, and while he was doing so he had his right hand back to his hip pocket. About the time he said this Louis Templeton moved out of the way and the defendant shot. Harrison fell, and his pistol fell down on the floor right by him. Some of the evidence goes to show that at the time the deceased approached appellant while he was standing in the corner, and while Louis Templeton was standing between them, appellant said, "Get out of the way," or "Clear the way." Templeton stepped out of the way, the shot was fired, and deceased fell. There is but little difference, if any, in regard to what was said and done in regard to the second difficulty. All the evidence shows that the deceased's pistol fell when he fell and was lying on the floor by him. Between the first and second difficulties, when appellant went out of the house with the expressed intention of leaving, he met the owner of the premises, Sparks, in the yard, and Sparks requested him to go or back, the trouble was over, and there would be no more trouble. Upon this statement appellant returned to the dancing room. Deceased came in the house directly after appellant returned, and the difficulty was renewed which ended in the tragedy. Without going into a further detailed statement of this matter, this sufficiently presents the case for a discussion of the questions involved.

The jury in convicting of manslaughter assessed the lowest punishment. Therefore all errors in regard to the charge passed out of the case, unless the charge on manslaughter as given, may have induced the jury to convict appellant of manslaughter and to refuse to acquit on the ground of self-defense. As a general rule, whatever errors there are in the charge are eliminated by reason of acquittal of the offense to which the charge pertains. It may be also stated, as a general rule, that all errors in the charge pertaining to the offense of which appellant is convicted, also pass out if the minimum punishment is assessed, if the facts conclusively show him guilty of that particular offense. But there is another rule, equally well recognized, that if the error in the charge pertaining to the offense of which the jury convicted injured appellant's rights in respect to a lower offense or to the question of self-defense, and had a tendency to bring about a conviction for the offense of which he was convicted instead of a lower offense or an acquittal, then the charge would be reversibly erroneous.

The charge in request to manslaughter, and which seemed to be the basis of the conviction, was almost identical with that in respect to self-defense. After giving the usual stereotyped definition of adequate cause and sudden passion, the court charged the jury as follows: "If you should believe from the evidence that the defendant, Walter Pannell, killed the deceased, Harrison Carr, by shooting him with a pistol at the time, place, and in the manner alleged in the indictment, yet if you should further believe that by the acts or conduct, or words, if any, or both, of deceased, at the time of and immediately before the killing, as they appeared to the defendant from his standpoint, in connection with all previous facts and circumstances of whatever nature or character, and in connection with all the surrounding facts and circumstances as known to or believed by defendant and viewed from his standpoint, created in the mind of the defendant such a degree of anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror as to render his mind incapable of cool reflection at the time of the killing, and because thereof the defendant shot and killed said Harrison Carr, and not in self-defense, then the defendant would not be guilty of any higher degree of homicide than manslaughter."

The charge on self-defense is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant, Walter Pannell, shot and killed Harrison Carr on or about the 21st day of February, 1907, in Hopkins county, Texas, and if you further believe that at the time of the killing or shortly prior thereto the deceased was in the act of making an attack upon the defendant, or made some demonstration indicating an intention of inflicting death or serious bodily injury upon the defendant, or if deceased was doing some act or acts, which either alone or together with accompanying words, if any, produced in the mind of the defendant, as viewed from his standpoint, which, considered with all the facts and circumstances as known to the defendant or as believed by the defendant to exist, a reasonable apprehension of death or serious bodily injury at the hands of said Harrison Carr, then the defendant had the right to kill the deceased in self-defense; and if you believe that he did kill deceased to protect himself from said danger or apparent danger, then such killing is in justifiable self-defense."

These charges, as we understand them, are practically the same, and put appellant in the attitude of standing before the jury upon the same facts in regard to manslaughter and self-defense. We have before stated the salient features of the evidence as given by the witnesses.

While it is sometimes a little difficult to draw the exact line between manslaughter and self-defense on the immediate facts, yet it is not permissible for the court to authorize a conviction for manslaughter upon the facts which justify a killing. All the facts and attending circumstances, viewed from the defendant's standpoint, and as exhibited by this record, show that a few moments before the tragedy there had been a threatened serious trouble between the parties, with the deceased rather in the wrong. He had threatened the life of appellant, and had on a prior occasion at the oilmills, proposed to fight it out with him to the death, either by shooting or by cutting. Upon the second difficulty, or meeting in the dancing room, the deceased approached appellant over the protest of his friends not to have trouble, using language indicating that he intended to have a difficulty, in which he called appellant a "son of a bitch," repeating the same language when again cautioned not to have a difficulty. In the meantime as he approached the deceased in the corner, he had his hands upon his pistol pocket, and was in that condition when he used the second insulting remark. The shooting came off, deceased's pistol was heard to strike the floor, and was found by his side. These were the facts upon which the jury were to predicate the finding of manslaughter or self-defense, both as set forth in the charges. These charges were so framed that the jury was left to understand that, upon the facts marshaled by the charge, appellant could be convicted of manslaughter, or acquitted on self-defense, at the option of the jury. We are of opinion this charge on manslaughter was of such erroneous character that it may have brought about a conviction of manslaughter on facts that authorized an acquittal.

The court's charge in regard to threats was also criticised in that it instructed the jury, if they believed deceased made threats, and at the time of the difficulty made demonstrations as if to execute the threats, to consider this with reference to the question of self-defense. The vice in the charge, as urged, is that it left the jury to find the threats were in fact made; whereas, they should have been told that the criterion was that if the appellant believed the threats were made. It makes no difference whether the threats were in fact made or not, if he was so informed and believed. The jury might, under the later developments of the case, have found that they were in fact made, or believed they were not in fact made. It does not seem to be controverted, however, in this case that the threats were made and that appellant knew of the animosity and ill will, especially by reason of the fact of deceased's offer to fight him to the death at the meeting at the oilmills. Other threats were shown to have been made, but the record does not disclose them to have been communicated to appellant. The proposition of appellant is a correct theory of the law in a proper case. We call attention to this so that upon another trial the court will submit this question from the appellant's standpoint.

D. L. Palmer was called by the state in rebuttal, and testified as follows: "I was a member of the jury that tried the defendant in this case the last term of court. He testified in his own behalf at that trial. I remember that he swore then that he had had carnal intercourse with Harrison Carr's wife before the killing. I don't remember how many times he said he had intercourse with her, and don't remember whether he said it was while she and Harrison were separated or not." Objection was urged to the introduction of this testimony. It is not clear to our mind that this testimony was objectionable. Just why the state offered it, we are in doubt. It is evident, we think, from the record that deceased was not only jealous on account of his wife, but his feelings were very bitter, and that in fact this feeling of jealousy and anger led to the final tragedy. Deceased had expressed himself to the effect that he thought there was something wrong between them, and expressed a desire or purpose to kill both of them, and in one conversation expressed himself as anxious to meet appellant and kill him and go to hell with him. There had been no direct evidence, however, introduced to the fact of intercourse between the parties. The reason for the admission of this testimony may be found, however, in the court's charge to which an exception was reserved, and if that was the purpose for which it was introduced, then we are of opinion there was error. In any event, we are clearly of the opinion that the court's charge limiting this evidence was error and of serious import. The court gave the law as he understood it, as applicable to this evidence, in the following charge:

"You are further instructed that the evidence introduced in this case showing that defendant had been guilty of having carnal intercourse with the wife of the deceased prior to the time of the homicide can be considered by you only for the purpose of showing motive, if any, on the part of the defendant, and you will consider such evidence for no other purpose."

We are of opinion that this charge is erroneous. It assumes the fact that the intercourse occurred, and instructs the jury that they can consider the fact of such intercourse only as showing the motive of appellant in the killing of deceased. The evidence shows that appellant had tried to evade difficulties with the deceased, and it may have been an account of the fact that he had wronged deceased; but from whatever motive it occurred he had declined to fight him, and sought to evade rather than bring on the difficulties. The deceased had pressed the matter which ended in his death. Appellant did not forfeit his right of self-defense under the circumstances of this case, if it be conceded he had been having intercourse with appellant's wife. While this was an adequate cause resulting in favor of the deceased, if accompanied by sudden passion, to reduce his killing of appellant, had it occurred, to manslaughter, still we have appellant and not deceased on trial, and the case must be viewed from appellant's standpoint. This would not require him to stand and be shot to death; his right of self-defense under the circumstances would be perfect. It may have left on the mind of appellant, and doubtless did, an impression that the deceased intended to press the difficulty to his (appellant's) death, and there was no other course left to him but to shoot, and the fact may have operated upon his mind most cogently that his life was at the time being sought by the deceased. It was a cogent reason in appellant's favor, under the law of self-defense, rather than against him, to show a criminal motive in the killing, under the facts.

Again, this charge singles out one fact and charges adversely to appellant upon it. This is a charge upon the weight of the evidence and in a very hurtful manner to appellant's cause before the jury. It had the tendency to eliminate his right of self-defense, and he selected this one single circumstance as the criterion of his motive for the homicide. Under the decisions as written in this state this is not only a charge upon the weight of the evidence, but the singling out of a fact and giving it undue prominence, and in such manner as to operate adversely to appellant's rights on the crucial point. See Terry v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 264, 76 S. W. 923, and cases cited.

For the errors discussed, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

FULLER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 167*)—THREATS BY ACCUSED—ADMISSIBILITY.

The state could not show that about two weeks before the homicide accused declared that he was going "to kill a Dutchman or run him out of the country," where there was no reference to decedent nor to the trouble between them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 334; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

2. HOMICIDE (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS UNSUSTAINED BY EVIDENCE.

It was improper to submit an issue as to provocation given one accused of murder by one other than decedent where there was no claim or proof of such provocation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 608; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 271*)—"ADEQUATE CAUSE"—QUESTION OF LAW.

Since insulting words or conduct of decedent towards a female relation of accused is deemed in law adequate cause for the homicide so as to reduce it to manslaughter, it was improper to allow the jury to determine whether decedent's statement that accused's daughter was pregnant before her marriage to decedent was "adequate cause."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 565; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 789*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

It was error in a murder trial to omit to direct an acquittal if the jury had reasonable doubt as to the existence of facts essential to manslaughter.

Brooks, J., dissenting.

Appeal from District Court, Angelina County; James I. Perkins, Judge.

George F. Fuller was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

E. B. Robb and Geo. S. King, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. This is the second appeal of this case. On the trial from which this appeal results, appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for 15 years. A very full and substantially correct statement of the facts of the case will be found in volume 50 Tex. Cr. R. 14, 95 S. W. 541, where the case is discussed at length by Judge Henderson on the former appeal.

Many questions are raised in the record, some of which we shall deem it unnecessary to discuss.

1. Among other matters complained of is the action of the court in permitting the witness Muller to testify that some two or three weeks before the homicide appellant stated to him that he was going to kill a Dutchman, or run him out of the country. It is claimed that this conversation or threat so particularly identified the deceased as to make this general statement admissible. In the case of Goodwin v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 466, 43 S. W. 336, we held the rule to be that evidence of general threats made by the defendant on trial for murder, when such threats are not shown to have been directed towards the person slain, or to embrace such person, are inadmissible. Again, in the case of Holley v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 301, 46 S. W. 42, we said: "Now, upon whom is the burden to show that the threat was directed towards the person slain, or embraced such person? Obviously upon the state, for no presumptions can be indulged against the appellant. Before the testimony can be admitted, it must appear that the threat was directed towards the person slain." The case of Garrett v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 106 S. W. 389, is cited by appellant, and seems to be strongly relied on. In that case it seems that one Owens, who was testifying for the state, testified that he overheard the defendant talking with another party, in which conversation Garrett made threats to kill a "guinea," and that in the opinion of witness he meant this girl, but that he did not know what he meant by saying "guinea." It was, however, shown in the record by some of the testimony that the word "guinea" referred to negro women generally. Objection was urged to this testimony on the ground, as shown by the record, among other things, that it did not sufficiently identify deceased. In discussing this matter Davidson, P. J., speaking for the court, says: "Without going into a detailed statement of it and the grounds of objection, we are of opinion that this character of threat was not admissible. This has been decided so frequently we deem it unnecessary to cite authorities. Before a threat supposed to have been made by the accused can be used against him in his trial, the evidence must show that the threat was directed against and individuates the deceased. The fact that 'guinea' meant negro women is not sufficient." In this case, while the witness Fred Muller was on the witness stand, he testified that he knew appellant, and that about two or three weeks before the killing appellant met him in the town of Lufkin, and they went into a saloon together and took a drink, and that during this time appellant told him he was going to kill a Dutchman or run him out of the country. This testimony was objected to by appellant on the ground that it did not show any connection with the transaction under investigation or any of the parties, and was wholly irrelevant and immaterial, and highly calculated to prejudice the rights of appellant. Thereupon the court intervened, and the following colloquy occurred: "The Court: Your statement, as I understand you, is that he told you he was going to kill 'the' Dutchman or 'a' Dutchman, or run him out of the country? A. That is what he told me. Q. Did you say 'a' Dutchman, or 'the' Dutchman? A. A Dutchman. Q. That was how long before this killing? A. About two weeks, as well as I remember. The Court: It will be a question of fact for the jury as to what the meaning was." Thereupon the defendant again stated to the court that they desired to reserve a bill of exceptions to the admission of this testimony, and wanted the bill to further show as to the court's interrogating him whether before or after the killing, and whether the statement referred to "a" Dutchman or "the" Dutchman; these being matters not elicited by the state. To this suggestion of counsel the court readily consented. We think probably this testimony was not admissible. It has occurred to us that the decisions of this court, at least in the language of some of them, have carried the rule rather further than as an original proposition the writer should have been inclined to go, but where, as in this case, there is no reference to the deceased, no suggestion in the testimony that his troubles with appellant were the subject of conversation and nothing in the language of the parties to constitute even a remote reference to or connection with the deceased, it would seem under the authorities, and in reason, that such a statement ought not to be received. We can well understand how the evident idea of the court below that it was a question for the jury might apply if there was enough in the testimony to leave it open to a fair inference that the threats introduced had reference to the deceased. We do not believe, however, that this contention is sustained in the record before us.

2. Serious complaint is made of the charge of the court on the subject of manslaughter. This charge in its entirety is as follows:

"Manslaughter" is voluntary homicide committed under the immediate influence of sudden passion, arising from an adequate cause, but neither excused nor justified by law. The act of killing must be directly caused by the passion arising out of the provocation. It is not enough that the mind is merely agitated by passion arising from some other provocation, or a provocation given by some other person than the party killed. The passion intended is either of the emotions of the mind known as anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror, rendering it incapable of cool reflection. By the expression 'adequate cause' is meant such as would commonly produce a degree of anger, rage, resentment, or terror in a person of ordinary temper sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection. Insulting words or conduct of the person killed towards a female relation of the defendant would be adequate cause, such as above spoken of, provided the killing took place immediately upon the happening of the insulting words or conduct, or so soon thereafter as the party killing may meet with the party killed after having been informed of such insulting words or conduct. And any condition of circumstances which is capable of creating in the mind of a person of ordinary temper, and does create in the mind of defendant sudden passion, such as anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror, rendering the mind incapable of cool reflection, is deemed adequate cause. And, where there are two or more causes to arouse passion, although no one of them alone would constitute adequate cause, it is for you to determine whether or not all such causes combined any there are, might be sufficient to reduce a voluntary killing to the grade of manslaughter, it is necessary only that adequate cause existed to reduce the state of mind referred to (but also that such state of mind did actually exist at the time of the commission of the offense). Now, applying the finding law of manslaughter to the case before you, you are instructed:

"(1) If you find that the killing of deceased, if he was killed, would otherwise be murder, then, in order to reduce the killing to the grade of manslaughter on the ground of insulting words or conduct towards a female relation of defendant, the following facts must all concur and have existed:

"(2) That deceased was guilty of insulting words or conduct towards defendant's daughter, Lula Brunsterman (now deceased), or that defendant had been informed and in good faith believed, deceased was guilty.

"(3) If you believe the witness Alvin Vinson on the day and before the homicide the killing told defendant that deceased said of and concerning defendant's daughter, Lula, in effect and substance, that she was in a state of pregnancy when deceased married her, the same would be insulting words towards a female relation of defendant, and would constitute 'adequate cause' such as is meant by that term in the definition of manslaughter, if in connection with what else, if anything, defendant was informed deceased had and the other circumstances of the case, the relations of the parties, the same such provocation as would commonly produce in a person of ordinary temperament as defendant was, a degree of anger, or resentment sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection, and this connection you are instructed that evidence of the general character of said daughter for chastity and virtue, if you believe defendant had knowledge of such character of his daughter, may be considered by you in order to ascertain the extent of the provocation.

"(4) That he killed deceased the first time he met with him after he, defendant, had been informed by Vinson of such insulting words of deceased towards or concerning said daughter, Lula, and in this connection you are instructed that the time intervening between the time defendant was informed of the insulting words and the time of the killing is immaterial, as to the matter of it is only required that the killing must have been upon the first meeting after information of the insult was communicated to defendant by the witness Vinson, hereinbefore referred to, if you believe the matter so communicated by Vinson was under the circumstances sulting, and in this connection you are instructed that, in judging and deciding whether the matter so communicated to defendant by Vinson was insulting and calculated to provoke the passion of defendant, you may look to and consider previous insulting words or conduct, (if any there was), of deceased towards said Lula, notwithstanding the defendant may be shown to have met with deceased after he had been informed of such previous insults and before the occasion upon which the shooting occurred, and you will also bear in mind that it is immaterial for the purpose of this case as to whether deceased, Fred Brunsterman, was in fact guilty of such insulting words or conduct, if any, imputed to him and upon information of which defendant claims to have acted. If defendant was informed that he, deceased, was so guilty, and in good faith believed and acted upon such information, it would avail him the same whether deceased had or had not in fact been guilty of such insults.

"(5) That such insulting words or conduct by deceased was the real provocation which induced the killing. * * *

"(6) That when defendant killed deceased, if he did kill him, he was affected by such a degree of anger, rage, resentment, or terror as would commonly, in a person of ordinary temper, render the mind incapable of cool reflection.

"Now, if you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant did voluntarily shoot with a pistol and thereby kill Fred Brunsterman at the place and about the time charged in the indictment, but you further believe that at the time of the killing the defendant was under the immediate influence of sudden passion rendering his mind incapable of cool reflection and aroused by insulting words of or imputed to deceased towards or concerning defendant's daughter, Lula Johnson (then Lula Brunsterman), communicated to defendant by the witness Andrew Vinson, to the effect that said Lula was in a state of pregnancy when deceased married her, and that same amounted to 'adequated cause,' and that the killing took place upon the first meeting of defendant with deceased after Vinson had informed defendant of such insult, you will not find defendant guilty of murder, but will find him guilty of manslaughter, and assess his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years."

The correctness of this charge is vigorously assailed by appellant, and on many grounds. Among other things, it is asserted that it is error for the court to fail to charge the jury, in connection with his charge upon manslaughter predicated upon such facts, that the facts and circumstances must be viewed from the standpoint of the defendant, and that in view of all the testimony showing that deceased had only a short while prior to the homicide stated of and concerning appellant's daughter that he could prove that she was in a state of pregnancy for a period of two months prior to her marriage to deceased, which statement had been communicated to the appellant, that it was error for the court to submit to the jury in its charge upon manslaughter as a question of fact to be found by them as to whether or not such language constituted adequate cause. Further, it is complained that this charge is erroneous, in that the doctrine of reasonable doubt is not applied to the evidence raising the issue of manslaughter. It is also complained that the court erred in this charge, in that it is a charge upon an issue not raised by the evidence and included an instruction on "a provocation given by some other person than the party killed." Again, complaint is made that the charge of the court on the subject of manslaughter is argumentative, upon the weight of the testimony, and holds out too prominently before the jury the opposite view upon the issue of manslaughter, in that in the fourth, fifth, and thirteenth paragraphs of the charge quoted the court instructs and repeats to the jury that that cause must have created in the mind of the defendant sudden passion, such as anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror in order to reduce the offense to manslaughter, and by such repetition was calculated to induce the jury to believe that the court was of the opinion that no such passion existed. We think that many of these criticisms are correct. There was, as we conceive, no justification for the inclusion in the charge of the clause "on a provocation given by some other person than the party killed," and, while this of itself, in view of the evidence, may possibly not have been hurtful, on another trial it should be omitted for the reason that there was no claim by appellant or pretense in the evidence that the provocation for the killing was given by any other person than the party killed.

Among other things, the court instructs the jury as follows: "Now, if you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant did voluntarily shoot with a pistol and thereby kill Fred Brunsterman at the place and about the time charged in the indictment, but you further believe that at the time of the killing the defendant was under the immediate influence of sudden passion rendering his mind incapable of cool reflection, and aroused by insulting words of or imputed to deceased towards or concerning defendant's daughter, Lula Johnson (then Lula Brunsterman), communicated to defendant by the witness Andrew Vinson, to the effect that said Lula was in a state of pregnancy when deceased married her, and that same amounted to 'adequated cause,' and that the killing took place upon the first meeting of defendant with deceased after Vinson had informed defendant of such insult, you will not find defendant guilty of murder, but will find him guilty of manslaughter, and assess his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years." It is to be assumed, of course, that the word "adequated" is either a typographical error or a mere lapse of the pen, but we believe that the insertion of this clause, "and that the same amounted to adequate cause," was both erroneous and hurtful. It is expressly provided that among others the following is deemed in law adequate cause: "Insulting words or conduct of the person killed toward a female relation of the party guilty of the homicide." And it is error in such case to leave the jury to determine whether such insulting words or conduct are adequate cause. Fuller v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 14, 95 S. W. 541; Stewart v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 106 S. W. 685. In the case of Stewart v. State it is said: "In regard to insulting conduct toward a female relative, the statute provides that it is adequate cause if the passion be engendered thereby, if the killing occurs on the happening of the insulting conduct, or as soon as the parties may meet after the slayer has been informed of such insulting language or conduct." It will be noted that in a former paragraph of the charge the court had instructed the jury as follows: "Insulting words or conduct of the person killed towards a female relation of the defendant would be adequate cause, such as above spoken of, provided the killing took place immediately upon the happening of the insulting words or conduct, or so soon thereafter as the party killing may meet with the party killed after having been informed of such insulting words or conduct." However, as will be noted in the last clause of the charge quoted, where he comes to apply the law to the facts of the case and state the penalty for the offense, it is in terms left to the jury as to whether same is adequate cause. Again, we think the charge of the court subject to criticism and just complaint, in that it does not apply the doctrine of reasonable doubt to the issue of manslaughter. The court does charge the jury that if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of an unlawful killing, but have a reasonable doubt as to whether the offense is murder or manslaughter, that they will give defendant the benefit of such doubt and find him guilty of no higher grade of offense than manslaughter; but the jury are not in terms instructed that, if they have a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the facts essential to constitute the offense of manslaughter, they would acquit him of such grade of homicide. As stated in the opinion on the first appeal, under the facts of this case, it was all important to the appellant that a clear and correct submission of the issue of manslaughter should have been given by the court in his charge. We do not think this has been done, and we think that the charge is justly subject to the objections above noted and probably others.

For the errors noted, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded.

HARROLSON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—INSTRUCTION—REASONABLE DOUBT—APPLICATION TO CASE.

In a prosecution for theft of a hog, an instruction that, "if the defendant took the hog in question, but at the time he took it the hog belonged to him, or if he believed that the hog belonged to him, then he is not guilty of the same, and you will acquit him, or if you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, you will acquit him," sufficiently applied the law of reasonable doubt to the particular issue in connection with which it was given; a general instruction on reasonable doubt having been given in another portion of the charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1990; Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 942*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED TESTIMONY—IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

A motion for a new trial will not be granted for newly discovered testimony which is not impeaching in its nature, and directed mainly to one witness in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2331, 2332; Dec. Dig. § 942.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 941*)—NEW TRIAL—CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE.

A new trial will not be granted for testimony which only multiplies witnesses as facts already investigated, or adds other circumstances of the same general character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2328-2330; Dec. Dig. § 941.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 957*)—NEW TRIAL—CONFLICT OF JURY.

On an application for a new trial, the court properly refused to permit accused to prove a juror that, while in their retirement, some of the jurors remarked that they would not convict, unless they understood the testimony of certain witness as to the incriminating facts about which he testified; the jury having been brought into court and the testimony of such witness in its entirety read to them, after which they brought in a verdict of guilty.

Appeal from District Court, Shelby County; James I. Perkins, Judge.

Silas Harrolson was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Stephenson & Stephenson and Bryar, Carter & Walker, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This is a hog theft conviction. In a general way, and substantially, the evidence discloses that Daw, the alleged owner, lost some hogs, one of which was subsequently discovered in the possession of appellant with marks changed. Appellant claimed the hog as one that he had raised. Daw and another witness testified that appellant subsequently, in substance, admitted that he believed it was Daw's hog. This may be a sufficient statement of the case for the state, though the facts are rather voluminous. Appellant claimed the hog as his own property, and further that when he found the hog and put it in his pen, somebody had changed it from his mark into Daw's mark, and that he (appellant) changed the mark back to his own. His statement is corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses. The theory of the state was that appellant had stolen the hog and changed the mark, and placed the hog in his horse lot. Appellant's theory was that Daw had changed the mark, and he (appellant) had discovered that fact, and Daw instituted the prosecution to protect himself. This is about the substance of appellant's theory of the case. The court charged the jury, after giving the general definition of theft, as follows: "If he defendant took the hog in question, but at the time he took it the hog belonged to him, or if he believed that the hog belonged to him, then he is not guilty of theft, and you will acquit him, or if you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, you will acquit him." Exception was reserved to this charge because the reasonable doubt, it is contended, referred to the whole case, and not specifically to the particular question of appellant's account of possession of the hog. Usually a charge on reasonable doubt applying to the whole case is sufficient, where this does not interfere with the exception to the rule which calls for the application of reasonable doubt to specific matters, such as the degrees in homicide. We believe this charge does sufficiently apply the law of reasonable doubt to the identical issue in the connection in which it is given. A general instruction on reasonable doubt was given in another portion of the charge. We are of opinion there is no error at this point.

Appellant filed a motion for new trial, among other things setting up newly discovered testimony, much of which is only impeaching in its nature and directed mainly to one witness in the case, to wit, Frazier. By these witnesses it was proposed to prove that Frazier's reputation for truth and veracity was bad. A motion for new trial will not be granted for this character of testimony, under the authorities in this state. By the witness Smith it was proposed to show, as newly discovered evidence, that he (Smith) knew the hog in question, and knew it to belong to appellant. The affidavit of Smith states the fact why he knew it, etc. He further swears he did not communicate the knowledge of these facts to appellant or his attorneys until after the conviction. This may be disposed of by the statement that it is only cumulative, and is strikingly similar to the testimony introduced by the appellant on the trial. Upon this ground, under the authorities, the motion will not be granted. A new trial will not be granted for testimony which is merely cumulative. Evidence is cumulative which only multiplies witnesses as to one or more facts already investigated, or only adds other circumstances of the same general character. For citation of authorities see White's Annotated Code of Criminal Procedure, art. 817, § 1149, subd. 6.

Appellant reserved a bill of exceptions to the refusal of the court to permit him to prove by the juror Crawford that, while in their retirement, the jury had not agreed; some of them remarking they would not convict unless they understood the testimony of the witness Frazier as to the incriminating facts about which he testified. The jury was brought into court, and Frazier's testimony in its entirety, as taken down by the stenographer, was read to the jury. That they retired, and shortly afterwards brought in a verdict of guilty. The court refused to hear the testimony of Crawford, and a bill of exceptions was reserved. We are unable to see what effect this would have had on motion for new trial. It is provided by law that where the jury disagrees as to facts, they may be brought into court upon their request, and have the testimony about which they disagree reproduced or again detailed. The bill raises no objection to the fact the jury was brought in and Frazier's testimony read to them. The objection seems to go to a rejection of the facts offered to show that the disagreement grew out of Frazier's testimony, which tended to incriminate appellant. This, perhaps, may have been intended to have a bearing upon the alleged newly-discovered impeaching testimony. If this is not the reason for it, we do not understand why the testimony of the juror was offered. The bill does not state the reason for it, or the objection or purpose to be attained. If the newly discovered impeaching evidence is not cause for a new trial, then the rejection of the testimony of Crawford would not be error.

As the case is presented, we find no reversible error. Therefore the judgment ought to be affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

HABEAS CORPUS (§ 30*)—GROUNDS—TESTING INDICTMENT.

Original application for writ of habeas corpus by John Webb for his discharge from imprisonment under a criminal charge. Relator remanded.

Bisland & Bruce, for relator. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Relator was arrested, after an information being filed against him, charged with keeping a disorderly house by reason of selling spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors therein without license. Upon his arrest relator sued out a writ of habeas corpus before the county judge of said county, who remanded relator, whereupon relator applied to a member of this court for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted and made returnable before the whole court, and now comes before us for decision.

The decisions of this court preclude the use of a writ of habeas corpus to test the validity of an indictment. This is the only question involved in this appeal. See Ex parte Beverly, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 644, 31 S. W. 645, and Ex parte Cox (Tex. Cr. App.) 109 S. W. 369.

Accordingly relator is remanded.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1156*)—MOTION TO REVERSE—CONSIDERING AFFIDAVITS NOT IN RECORD.

In support of a motion to reverse and remand, because of the failure of the trial judge to make up and file a statement of facts, the affidavits accompanying the motion, and showing the reason for such failure, cannot be considered; the appellate court having power on appeal to consider only matters appearing of record, and Rev. St. 1895, art. 998, providing that such court shall have power on affidavit to ascertain such matters of fact as may be necessary to the proper exercise of its jurisdiction, having no application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1156.*]

Appeal from Lamar County Court; Leslie Hardison, Judge.

Action by J. E. Thompson & Co. against W. H. Rush. Defendant appealed, and moved to reverse. Motion denied, and judgment affirmed.

Allen & Dohoney, for appellant. G. W. Wells, for appellee.

LEVY, J. This suit was instituted by appellees against appellant, to recover certain commissions, claimed to be owing them for effecting a sale of land. In accordance with the verdict of a jury judgment was rendered in favor of appellees.

There is no statement of facts in the transcript. Appellant has filed a motion in this court, asking that the case be reversed and remanded because of the failure and inability of the trial judge to make up and file a statement of the facts in the case. The motion is accompanied by affidavits, setting out facts which go to show that the failure to procure and have filed such statement of facts was not due to any fault of the appellant or his attorneys, but it was because of the serious and dangerous sickness of the trial judge, occurring immediately after the final orders in the case were made, and continuing for a long time, and his inability to make a statement of facts, even during convalescence, from want of recollection of the facts, due to severe sickness. We are of the opinion that the case of Ennis Mercantile Co. v. Wath, 93 Tex. 622, 57 S. W. 947, rules this motion. In that case no statement of the facts was made out and filed by the trial judge; a motion was made in the Court of Civil Appeals asking to reverse and remand the case because of the failure, on the part of the trial judge, to make up and file a statement of the facts, which motion was supported by affidavits. In answering the certified questions in the case the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice Brown, ruled that the statute confines the action of the Court of Civil Appeals, on appeal or writ of error, to such matters as are made to appear of record by one of the methods stated in article 1014, Rev. St. 1895, and which are presented to the court by an assignment of error pointing out the matter complained of as it appears in the record of the case, and the fundamental errors apparent of record. It further ruled that article 998, Rev. St., could not be made applicable to the motion and affidavits accompanying it. This court having no power to consider the motion predicated on the facts set up in the affidavits, it is overruled. To the end that the ruling in this instant case be not understood as conveyed, the idea that, if the transcript had contained the affidavits herein, and an assignment of error had been filed thereon in the court below, a contrary ruling would have been made, we feel justified in intimating that as the law now stands, prescribing the basis for the exercise of appellate jurisdiction and confining the power, on appeal or writ of error, to the Courts of Civil Appeals, we doubt the power of this court to consider an assignment predicated on such facts. While the facts set out in the affidavits in the two cases are not alike, and mandamus perhaps would not have been awarded in the instant case, yet the ruling as to the power of this court on appeals on assignments made and predicated on failure to obtain a statement of facts is stated by us, as we construe the law, in the case of Applebaum v. Bass, 101 S. W. 173, recently decided by us, and here referred to in connection with the above intimation.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Index.

The assignments of error in this record are of such a nature that this court cannot pass thereon without a statement of the facts. Because thereof, the case was ordered affirmed.

TEXAS CENT. R. CO. v. ESTES.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Nov. 14, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 7, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The judgment for mules killed by defendant's train will not be disturbed, though there was evidence that they entered on the track through a gate left open by some one; there being other evidence to support the finding that defendant's right of way fence was out of repair, and that the mules escaped from plaintiff's pasture through the fence.

Appeal from Hill County Court; N. J. Smith, Judge.

Action by J. H. Estes against the Texas Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. P. McKinnon and J. A. Kibler, for appellant. L. C. Hill and C. F. Greenwood, for appellee.

RAINEY, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in the county court against the railroad company in favor of appellee for the killing of two mules by appellant's locomotive engine.

The appellant's railroad track runs through appellee's farm. Its right of way is fenced, and gates are placed on either side, and a crossing over the track for a passageway to and from the different pastures of the farm. On the morning after the mules were killed, the gate was found open. By whom left open the evidence does not disclose. The fence was not in good repair, and the evidence is sufficient to sustain the appellee's contention and to warrant the jury's finding that the mules entered upon the right of way over the fence where out of repair. Whether or not the mules went through the gate or through the fence seems to have been a sharply contested issue on the trial below. There being evidence to support the finding that the fence was out of repair, and that the mules escaped from appellee's pasture through the fence, the judgment will not be disturbed. Railway Co. v. Pruitt, 109 S. W. 925, 21 Tex. Ct. Rep. 72.

There is testimony tending to show that the mules were running in front of the engine, and that by a proper lookout being kept by the operatives they could have seen them in time to have prevented killing them. This was sufficient to warrant a finding of negligence on the part of the operatives in not stopping the train before killing the mules.

The judgment is affirmed.

Const. art. 5, § 10, provides that either party, on application in open court, may have a jury by depositing a specified jury fee. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 3189, requires the application to be made on the first day of the term at which the case is to be tried unless it be an appearance case. Held that, where plaintiff in an action of trespass to try title applied for a jury on the first day of the term at which the case was tried and tendered the fee, it was error to refuse the application because the case had been on the nonjury docket for several terms, and to grant a jury over defendants' objection would necessitate a continuance.

5. ESTOPPEL (§ 28*)—WARRANTY DEEDS—HEIRS.

A warranty in a deed only binds the grantor's heirs to the extent of the property received by them from the grantor's estate, which being insolvent, the heirs were not estopped to acquire a title adverse to that conveyed by the ancestor.

6. ESTOPPEL (§ 44*)—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

The doctrine of estoppel on which that of after-acquired title rests does not depend on a covenant of warranty, nor does it apply to one who is not a grantor in the deed on which the estoppel is sought to be predicated, and is not bound by the warranty contained therein.

Appeal from District Court, Jasper County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Trespass to try title by William D. Cleveland & Sons against George W. Smith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Howell, for appellant. W. W. Blake, for appellees.

PLEASANTS, C. J. This is an action of trespass to try title brought by the appellant against Geo. W. Smith, Sampson Smyth, Isaac Riley, and Isabella Riley to recover the title and possession of a tract of 335 acres of land on the Geo. W. Smith head-right survey in Jasper county. The trial in the court below was without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of defendants for all of the land in controversy. At the request of appellant, the trial court filed the following conclusions of fact, which we find to be supported by the record and adopt as our fact conclusions:

"It was agreed, and I so find, that J. T. Armstrong and wife were common source of title, and that the title was in them from the sovereignty of the soil. It was agreed that the grantors of Geo. W. Smith were the legal and sole heirs of J. T. and S. A. Armstrong, and that they were dead, and Geo. W. Smith was the son of W. H. Smith, and that he was dead. I find that on the 23d day of October, 1875, J. T. Armstrong and his wife, S. A. Armstrong, conveyed the land in controversy to W. H. Smith for a consideration of $1,100, evidenced by two promissory notes, one for $600 and one for $500, which fact was recited in the deed.

The notes reserved a lien on the land to secure their payment but the lien was not expressed in the deed. On the 15th day of April, 1891, W. H. Smith, acting with his son as a member of the firm of Smith Bros., a firm of merchants in Colmesneil, Tyler county, Tex., executed a deed of trust to Geo. W. Smith in trust for W. D. Cleveland & Co. of Houston, Tex., which among other lands and property included the land in controversy. During the negotiations leading up to the execution of this deed of trust and at the time of the execution of said deed W. H. Smith notified the firm of Cleveland & Co. that the vendor's lien notes were outstanding against the land, and at first objected to including in the deed of trust a tract of land in controversy, but upon being pressed by Cleveland & Co., included the land in the deed of trust. On the 1st day of July, 1894, Cleveland & Co. foreclosed the deed of trust in the district court of Tyler county, Tex., and had order of sale to issue to Jasper county, Tex., under which the land was sold on the 4th day of April, 1895, to Cleveland & Co., and the bid created on the judgment. On the 16th day of April, 1897, the heirs of J. T. Armstrong sold the land to Geo. W. Smith, the defendant, for the face value of the notes (the interest having been kept paid up by W. H. Smith), and that said deed was duly recorded on the 29th day of April, 1897, the deed records of Jasper county, Tex.; this occurring before the death of W. H. Smith.

"I find that the firm of Smith Bros., Colmesneil, was composed of W. H. Smith, J. J. Smith, and R. R. Smith, and were indebted to W. D. Cleveland & Co. in a large sum of money and executed the deed of trust to G. W. Smith as trustee for Wm. D. Cleveland & Co. to secure the same, and that said Cleveland & Co. knew at the time of the deed of trust was executed that the vendor's lien notes were out against the land in controversy, and accepted the same with full knowledge of that fact. On the 1st day of November, 1901, Geo. W. Smith conveyed to Sampson Smyth, his codefendant, 92 acres of the land in controversy, which deed was duly placed on record in Jasper county on the 25th day of November, 1901.

"I find that W. H. Smith never delivered up possession of the land after the foreclosure sale by Cleveland & Co. until its purchase by Geo. W. Smith, when he immediately took possession by his tenant and has continuously held possession since said purchase. Geo. W. Smith testified that his father and himself had always kept the taxes paid up on the land, except the past two years or three years. A statement from the tax rolls made by the collector from 1897 showed that Geo. W. Smith had paid for the years 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Index.

1902, 1903, and 1904. The statement showed that Sampson Smyth had paid the taxes on the land purchased by him from his co-defendant every year from the date of his purchase. Sampson Smyth was in possession at the date of his purchase as tenant of Geo. W. Smith, and has continued to occupy the same since his purchase, and is now living on it."

The appellant, Wm. D. Cleveland & Sons, a private corporation organized under the laws of this state, is the holder of whatever title was acquired by the firm of W. D. Cleveland & Co. under the foreclosure proceedings above mentioned.

The first assignment of error complains of the refusal of the trial court to comply with appellant's demand to have the case placed upon the jury docket and tried by a jury. The bill of exceptions to this action of the court is as follows: "Be it remembered that on the 10th day of June, A. D. 1907, being the morning of the first day of this term of the court, and during the call of the nonjury docket for the first time during this term, and this cause being called regularly on the docket, the plaintiff, Wm. D. Cleveland & Sons, Inc., then and there, in open court, demanded a jury in said cause, and then and there tendered to the clerk of said court the sum of five ($5.00) dollars cash, lawful money of the United States, as a jury fee in said cause, but that the court then and there denied and overruled plaintiff's said application for a jury, and refused to allow plaintiff to have a jury for the trial of said cause, to which action of the court plaintiff then and there in open court excepted, and now here tenders this its bill of exception, and prays that the same be approved and signed and made a part of the record in this cause, which is accordingly done." In approving this bill the trial judge makes the following statement: "The above case was filed in this court on the 30th day of October, 1905, and no jury was ever demanded until the first day of this term. At the May term of this court, 1905, the first week of this court was set apart for the trial of nonjury cases, and the attorney and parties to this suit knew of this order, and said cause had stood on the nonjury docket ever since it had been filed, with full knowledge that it would be called for trial on the first day of the term along with all other nonjury cases. There was no jury for the first week of the court, nor has there been one for the first week of the court since May, 1905. The defendants were ready, and so announced and objected to the jury, on the ground that it was nonjury week, and the case having been permitted to remain on the nonjury docket since it was filed in October, 1905, and to permit it to go to the jury docket, then was equivalent to continuing the case, owing to the condition of the docket. The defendant and plaintiff both being nonresidents, and for such (nonresidents') litigants' convenience, the court set the first week of the term for the trial of nonjury cases, and jury was refused for the above reasons."

We think the court erred in refusing the demand for a jury. The Constitution of this state provides that in the trial of all cases in the district courts the plaintiff or defendant shall upon application made in open court, have the right of trial by jury, the only further requisite to make such right available, in addition to the demand in open court, being the deposit of a jury fee "for such sum and with such exceptions as may be prescribed by the Legislature." Const. art. 5, § 10. In compliance with this provision of the Constitution, the Legislature has fixed the jury fee which the party applying for a jury is required to deposit, and had excepted from such requirement any applicant who makes oath of inability to make such deposit. The statute further provides that an application for a jury in such cases shall be made "on the first day of the term of the court at which it (the case) is to be tried, unless the same be an appearance case, in which event the application shall be made on default day." Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 3189. The appellant having fully complied with all of these requirements was entitled to a trial by jury, notwithstanding the fact that to grant it such right may have caused a continuance of the cause when appellees were ready and anxious for a trial. This condition, if it existed, was not due to any dereliction on the part of appellant, and therefore could not defeat or impair its constitutional right to have its case tried by a jury. It has been uniformly held that, even where a party has been dilatory in making his application, his right to a jury will not be denied, unless the granting of such right will prejudice the rights of the opposite party, and we have been cited to no case in which the right to a jury has been denied when the demand therefor was made in the manner and at the time prescribed by the statute. In the case of Cole v. Terrell, 71 Tex. 553, 9 S. W. 608, cited by appellees, the demand for the jury was not made until the 5th day of the term, the court could only sit for two weeks, and the parties had agreed that the case should not be tried before the second week of the term with actual or constructive notice that by a standing order of the court no jury had been drawn for that week. Under these facts, it was held that the appellant by his failure to demand a jury on the first day of the term and by agreeing to have the case tried at a time when he knew, or was charged with knowledge, of the fact that no jury would be in attendance upon the court had forfeited his right to a jury trial. The decision in the case of Petri v. National Bank, 84 Tex. 155, 19 S. W. 379, also cited by appellee, is based upon the failure of the appellant to demand a jury on the first day of the term. In the case of Allen v. Plummer, 71 Tex. 546, 9 S. W. 672, it is held that, the demand having been made on the first day of the term, the applicant was entitled to the jury, notwithstanding the fact that the jury fee was not deposited until the next day, and the granting of the application would have the effect of continuing the case. This decision is conclusive of the question presented on this appeal, and, while in the subsequent case of Petri v. Bank, supra, Judge Gaines, who wrote the opinion in both cases, observes that the rule announced in the Plummer case "goes to the extreme verge of propriety," it has not been modified so far as we are aware.

We are of the opinion, however, that this error of the trial court does not require nor authorize a reversal of the judgment because the undisputed evidence adduced upon the trial would have required a verdict in favor of the appellees, and, if a jury had been impaneled to try the case, it should have been instructed to find for the defendants. Such being the state of the evidence, no injury resulted to appellant from the refusal of the court to comply with its demand for a jury, and the error in refusing such demand was harmless. We predicate this holding upon the following statement of the pleadings and the evidence disclosed by the record. In addition to their pleas of not guilty, the defendants pleaded the statutes of limitation of three, five, and ten years. All of the testimony shows that the defendant Geo. W. Smith, by his tenants, Isaac and Isabella Riley and Sampson Smyth, had occupied the land in controversy from the 29th day of April, 1897, to the 25th day of November, 1901, and that after said date and up to the filing of this suit on October 30, 1905, 92 acres of said land was occupied by the defendant Sampson Smyth under a deed therefor from Geo. W. Smith, which was duly recorded on November 25, 1901, and the possession and occupancy of the remainder was continued in the said Geo. W. Smith through his said tenants. The possession of Geo. W. Smith was under a deed from the heirs of J. T. and S. A. Armstrong which was recorded on April 29, 1897, and the possession and occupancy of the defendants during all the time before stated has been of the adverse character required to sustain their pleas of limitation. The undisputed evidence further shows that Geo. W. Smith paid the taxes on all of the land held by him for the years from 1898 to 1904, inclusive, and that Sampson Smyth has paid the taxes on that part of the land purchased by him since the date of his purchase. The records of the collector's office of Jasper county show that the land assessed, and upon which the taxes were paid by the defendants as above stated, was assessed as a part of Geo. W. Smith survey "Abstract No. 36" up to the year 1904, since which time the rolls show that the land assessed by the defendants was on the Geo. W. Smith survey "Abstract No. 968." This apparent confusion as to the abstract number of the survey on which the land rendered for taxes by the defendant was situate arose out of the fact that the Geo. W. Smith headright survey was located upon two separate tracts of land, and that both surveys appeared upon the state abstract No. 36 up to the year 1904, when the Land Office discovered the confusion thereby caused, and corrected the abstract by giving the smaller of the two surveys abstract No. 968. All of the evidence shows that the land assessed in the name of the defendant and upon which the taxes were paid by them as aforesaid was the land in controversy in this suit and is situate upon the smaller of said Smith surveys now having abstract No. 968. Under this state of the evidence had the trial been by a jury, it would have been the duty of the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendants on their plea of limitation for five years.

There is no merit in appellant's contention that Geo. W. Smith having been made trustee in the trust deed executed by his father, W. H. Smith, for the benefit of Cleveland & Co., was estopped from subsequently acquiring a title to the land against Cleveland & Co., who purchased at the foreclosure sale under said trust deed, and that any title thus acquired by said Geo. W. Smith would inure to the benefit of Cleveland & Co. As before shown, the land was not sold by the trustee under the deed of trust, and we agree with the trial court in the conclusion that the issue of after-acquired title does not arise upon the facts of this case. Geo. W. Smith as trustee in the deed of trust was under no legal or moral obligation to defend the title of his grantor, and, while his conveyance under the terms of the trust deed would have bound his grantor to warrant and forever defend the title to the land, and any title thereafter acquired by said grantor would pass by estoppel to the purchaser, the trustee would not be estopped from acquiring a title adverse to that conveyed by him under the trust deed.

The contention that, because Geo. W. Smith is a legal heir of W. H. Smith, he is estopped from acquiring a title adverse to that conveyed by his father, is also without merit. The warranty of W. H. Smith would only bind his heirs to the extent of the property received by them from his estate, and the evidence shows that the estate was insolvent and Geo. W. Smith therefore could have received no property therefrom.

The doctrine of estoppel upon which that of after-acquired title rests does not depend upon the covenant of warranty, but it certainly cannot be held that such doctrine should apply to one who is not a grantor in the deed upon which the estoppel is sought to be predicated, and is not bound by the covenant of warranty contained in such deed. The deed from the Armstrong hels conveys the interest inherited from their father and mother in the land in controversy, and we think the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that the notes given by W. H. Smith to the Armstrongs in payment of the purchase money for the land in controversy contained an express vendor's lien, and therefore the superior title remained in the Armstrongs, and, when Geo. W. Smith paid said notes and received the deed from the Armstrong heirs, he acquired the superior title to the land, and defendants were entitled to recover upon such title.

This disposes of all of the material points presented in appellant's brief. None of the assignments of error, except the first, is presented in a manner requiring our consideration, but we have considered the questions sought to be presented and are of the opinion that none of the assignments should be sustained, and that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

On Rehearing.

In holding in the main opinion in this case that the error of the trial court in refusing appellant's request for a jury does not require a reversal of the judgment because had there been a trial by jury no other verdict than one in favor of the appellees could have been properly rendered under the undisputed evidence adduced on the trial, we do not intend to announce the rule that a party who has been wrongfully deprived of his right to a jury trial is required to submit his cause to the court. It may be that the party thus denied a trial by jury can stand upon his rights, and decline to offer any evidence or to recognize the right of the court to proceed with the trial, and in such case would be entitled to have any judgment which might be rendered against him reversed because of the refusal of the court to grant his request for a jury, but this record does not present a case of this kind. The judgment recited that, after the refusal of the court to grant appellant's request for a jury, the parties by their attorneys submitted "the matters in controversy as well of fact as of law to the court, and, the evidence and argument of counsel having been heard and fully understood, it is considered by the court," etc. There is nothing in the record to negative the presumption that the facts of the case were fully developed. The appellant, having submitted its entire case to the court, and taken its chances on a favorable judgment, is not in the position to claim a reversal of the judgment because of the error of the court in refusing its request for a jury when the case made by the undisputed evidence is one in which no other verdict than one in favor of appellees could have been rendered.

In that portion of the main opinion in which we find the facts on the issue of limitation we state that both of the tracts of land located under the Geo. W. Smith headright certificate appeared upon the state abstract as No. 36. This statement is not accurate. Abstract No. 36 was applied to the Geo. W. Smith headright survey. This headright certificate, as stated in the main opinion, was located upon two separate tracts of land, so the abstract No. 36 might have applied as well to one of the surveys as to the other, but there was not, in fact, two abstracts No. 36 designating the two surveys.

We have, after full consideration of the motion for rehearing, concluded that it should be overruled, and it has been so ordered.

Overruled.

Trespass to try title by J. B. Burroughs against M. E. Trimble. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wright & Wynn, Brightman & Upton, and E. Cartledge, for appellant. W. C. Merchant and Hill & Lee, for appellee.

RICE, J. This was a suit in trespass to try title, originally brought in the district court of Coke county, Tex., against appellant for title and possession of fractional section No. 4, certificate No. 5/121, H. T. & B. Ry. Co., containing 460.1 acres of land, situated in said county, and for $500 as damages for removing certain fence posts and wire therefrom, as well as to recover the rental value thereof, alleged to be reasonably worth 10 cents per acre per month. The venue of the suit, on appellant's application therefor, was changed to Tom Green county, wherein the same was tried. On a former appeal of this case the same was reversed and remanded, principally on account of the error of the trial court in sustaining exceptions to defendant's application for change of venue. See 95 S. W. 614, 14 Tex. Ct. Rep. 753. Defendant answered by general demurrer, general denial, and plea of not guilty. A jury trial resulted in a verdict in favor of appellee for the land sued for and for rents thereon, in the sum of $391, and judgment was rendered in accordance therewith, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

The land involved in this suit is what is known as "public school land," situated in the absolute lease district. The controlling question in this appeal, in our judgment, raised by appellant's first and thirteenth assignments of error, is whether or not the court erred in refusing to give appellant's peremptory instruction directing a verdict in his behalf, but, instead thereof, submitting to the jury the question whether or not lease No. 11,252, to F. L. and R. H. Harris, of said land for a term of 10 years from October 1, 1895, had been canceled at the time the plaintiff made his first file on said land on the 29th of September, 1899, or at the time he made his second file thereon on the 18th of September, 1901. The facts, briefly stated, are that appellee, being an actual settler on and owner of the west half of survey 314 in block 2, H. & T. C. Ry. Co., which being within the proper radius, on September 26, 1899, in due form of law, applied to purchase the survey in question as an additional section to his home tract, which application was filed in the land office September 29, 1899. Thereafter, on September 18, 1901, appellee made another application in due form to purchase the same land, which on the same day was filed in the clerk's office and duly recorded, and thereafter, on the 24th day of September, 1901, was filed in the land office. It was shown that he had made his first payment of 1/40 of the purchase price and executed his obligations in due form under each of said applications. This land was awarded to appellee September 24, 1901, on his first application, his second having been rejected. He paid all of the interest that accrued on said obligations to November 1, 1902, testifying that since 1902 he sent each year the necessary amount of money to the State Treasurer to pay the annual interest thereon and that the money had never been returned to him.

It was shown on the part of appellant that the Commissioner of the Land Office, on October 24, 1895, by lease No. 11,252, of that date had duly leased said land for a term of 10 years therefrom to F. L. and R. H. Harris, but it appeared from a certificate of the Commissioner of the Land Office that the last rental payment was made thereon September 3, 1898, and it was likewise shown that said lease was duly canceled by the Commissioner of the Land Office September 22, 1902. Appellant's application to purchase said land, duly filed in the land office, on date September 23, 1902, accompanied with proof of payment of 1/40 of the purchase money, the execution of his obligation therefor, and interest payments thereon, and the award of same to him October 10, 1902, were all fully shown, and he testified that at the date of his application he was an actual settler upon said land. The following evidence was introduced by appellee in rebuttal: (1) A relinquishment of said lease executed in July, 1899, and filed in the land office, by R. H. Harris to F. L. Harris, of his leasehold interest in said land. (2) A letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office to the county clerk of Coke county under date of July 10, 1900, informing said clerk that lease No. 11,252 had been canceled, instructing him to enter a cancellation thereof upon his records. (3) A notice from the Commissioner of the Land Office of date September 16, 1901, addressed to the county clerk of Coke county, stating that the land in suit was again placed on the market, classifying the same as grazing land, valued at $1 per acre, but at this time the rents on said lease were about two years in arrears, and soon after said last letter from the commissioner to said clerk, to wit, September 24, 1901, an award was made of said land to appellee. It appears from the testimony of one of the attorneys for the appellant that, soon after the decision in the case of Schwarz v. McCall was rendered, which was on the 24th of

March, 1900, that he told the State Treasurer that he wanted to pay the rentals on said lease, but the treasurer informed him that he could not accept it, "as his books showed that the lease was at an end," and that he was informed by Mr. Rogan, Commissioner of the Land Office, that a sale of land out of the lease, though illegal, had the effect to cancel the lease. There was no evidence on the part of appellant to show any rights under said lease, nor was it shown that the same had ever been recorded in Coke county.

The court, among other instructions, charged the jury as follows: "You are instructed that in this case you will return a verdict for the plaintiff (who is the appellee herein) for the land sued for, unless you find for defendant under instructions hereinafter given you. You are further instructed that, if you do not find from the evidence that the lease introduced in evidence to F. L. and R. H. Harris had been canceled at the time plaintiff made his first file, to wit, on the 29th September, 1899, or at the time he made his second file, to wit, on the 18th of September, 1901, then you will return a verdict for the defendant, M. E. Trimble. There are two ways to cancel a lease: One is statutory, as where the land commissioner, under his hand and seal, cancels a lease and files said cancellation with the papers pertaining to said lease. The other is what our Supreme Court has denominated an 'informal cancellation.' On the question of an informal cancellation of a lease you are charged that, if the land commissioner and the lessees (that is, the parties owning the lease) agree together that said lease shall be canceled generally and as to all persons, then said lease would be canceled; or if the fact exists that authorizes a cancellation, which fact is the nonpayment of the lease money for 60 days after the same is due, and the land commissioner treats said lease as canceled, and the lessees acquiesce in said commissioner's action in said matter, then said lease would be canceled. If you do not find that said lease had been canceled as the same is hereinabove explained to you at the time the plaintiff made his first file, on the 29th day of September, 1899, or at the time he made his second file on the 18th day of September, 1901, then you will return a verdict for defendant, M. E. Trimble."

Relative to the refusal of the court to give in charge to the jury appellant's peremptory instruction, we understand the law to be well settled that, where the evidence presents any issue under the pleadings, it is always the duty of the court to submit the same to the jury. The facts in this case raise the issue as to whether or not there had been an informal cancellation of the Harris lease at the time of the filing of appellee's applications therefor and the award thereon, and it was the duty of the court to present this issue as raised by the evidence by appropriate instructions for the determination of the jury. Wallace v. Southern Oil Co., 91 Tex. 21, 40 S. W. 399. Therefore, if the court gave a proper instruction on the law of informal cancellation, as raised by the evidence, and the evidence is sufficient to warrant the verdict thereunder, then it would seem to us that appellant has no just grounds of complaint as raised by his said assignments of error. The law provides (article 4218v, Rev. St. 1895) as follows: "If any lessee shall fail to pay the annual rental due in advance for any year within sixty days after such rents shall become due, the Commissioner of the Land Office may declare such lease canceled by a writing under his hand and seal of office, which writing shall be filed with the other papers relating to such lease, and thereupon such lease shall immediately terminate, and the land so leased shall become subject to purchase or lease under the provisions of this chapter." It is not contended by appellee in this case that there was any formal cancellation of the Harris lease at the time of the filing of his several applications and the award thereon; but it is insisted in his behalf that the evidence shows an informal cancellation thereof, and sustains the action of the commissioner in making said award to him, because at said time the annual rental thereon was past due over 60 days; the rent being in arrears for about two years. And it is further contended by appellee that the failure to pay the annual rental on said lease for 60 days after it accrued, the relinquishment of his interest in the lease to F. L. Harris by R. H. Harris, above alluded to, together with the silence and apparent acquiescence of the said lessees and the letters referred to by the commissioner to the county clerk of Coke county authorizing its cancellation upon the records and again placing same on the market, and his action thereon in making the award to appellee, constituted a sufficient basis for a valid cancellation of said lease, and justified the action of the Commissioner of the Land Office in making said award.

In discussing the law with reference to an informal cancellation of a lease by the Commissioner of the Land Office, Mr. Justice Williams, speaking for the court in West v. Terrell, 96 Tex. 548, 74 S. W. 905, after discussing the facts that the record disclosed no formal cancellation of the lease in that case on the part of the commissioner, said: "But, aside from this view, we are of the opinion that even if it be conceded that, in order to put an end to the rights of a lessee under his lease by the mere action of the commissioner, this formal declaration of cancellation is essential. It is also true that such rights may be terminated by an informal cancellation, when the power to cancel exists and all parties concerned agree to or acquiesce in it. It is certainly not the law that a lease must continue in existence notwithstanding facts have arisen authorizing its cancellation, and all parties consent to and submit to an informal cancellation and a letting or sale of the property as subject to sale or lease. The facts show that such was the character of this transaction, if the formal cancellation was not made, and it is not permissible for a third party, if it would be for the lessee after this lapse of time, to reopen the subject." In the present case it appears that, while there was no formal cancellation of the lease at the time appellant's applications were made, nor at the time of his award, still it clearly appears that at said time the rents upon said lease were in arrears for about two years, and one of the lessees had relinquished his rights thereunder. They knew that the rents were unpaid, and they likewise knew, or could have known, that the commissioner had taken such action as to again place the land upon the market, and he did make an award thereof to appellee. It seems to us that these facts were sufficient to authorize the court in giving the charge upon the subject of an informal cancellation, and, the jury having found in favor of appellee thereon, we are not disposed to disturb their verdict.

We do not believe that the court erred in refusing to permit appellant to introduce in evidence the application for and the award of the land to F. L. Harris by the commissioner, for the reason that, if the same had been shown, it would constitute only an outstanding equitable title in said Harris, which, in the absence of evidence showing any connection therewith on the part of appellant, would constitute no defense to this action. Where an outstanding valid legal title is shown, a party not connected therewith can plead and offer the same in bar of an action of trespass to try title, but this is not true of only an equitable title. Capt v. Stubbs, 68 Tex. 222, 4 S. W. 467. This case is easily distinguishable from that of Patterson v. Knapp (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 125, and other cases cited in support of the doctrine therein announced, in this that in the present case the lessees are not complaining of the action of the commissioner in making an award adverse to their lease; but in Patterson v. Knapp, supra, and other cases cited by appellant, the lessees or the parties at interest thereunder were asserting rights under the lease. Here appellant is shown to have no connection with nor claim to the lease of the Harrises, but is interposing it as an obstacle to the right of the state to make an award of the land to appellee, after the existence of facts is shown authorizing its cancellation, which cannot, as we believe, be legally done.

We overrule appellant's contention complaining of the action of the court in refusing to allow him to introduce evidence showing the cancellation of the award to appellee by the commissioner, because we believe under the law there was no power or authority in the commissioner, after making the award to appellee, to cancel the same. This would be the doing of a judicial act on the part of the commissioner, authority for which is not vested in him under the law, but in the courts.

Believing there is no merit in the questions presented by the remaining assignments, the same are overruled, and, finding no error in the record, the judgment of the trial court is in all things affirmed.

Affirmed.

On Rehearing.

Appellant requests, in the event his motion for rehearing herein should be overruled, then the following additional facts be found by this court to have been proven on the trial below, which we have consented to do, the same being as follows, to wit:

1. We find that the evidence shows that appellant made his application and obligation to purchase the land in controversy on September 23, 1902, and that the same was awarded to him by the Commissioner of the Land Office October 10, 1902.

2. That the payment of the first $\frac{1}{4}$ of the purchase price on said application was duly made, together with interest thereon as it accrued regularly each year thereafter until 1905.

3. That the appellant was living upon the land in controversy prior to the date of his application, and continued to occupy the same with his family for three years thereafter, and was living on the land in September, 1901; but we also find, in this connection, that at the time of the filing of said application and obligation by appellant, as well as at the time of the award thereon to him, the land had been previously awarded to the appellee upon his applications and obligations theretofore made, as stated in the original opinion.

With these additional findings, appellant's motion for rehearing is overruled.

Appeal from District Court, Harrison County; W. C. Buford, Judge.

Personal injury action by E. R. White against C. L. Taylor, receiver of the Texas Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. P. Jones, for appellant. T. W. Davidson, for appellee.

LEVY, J. Appellee sued for personal injuries received by him while in the discharge of his duties as a fireman on the locomotive of the appellant receiver, resulting from the alleged explosion in the boiler of the locomotive, which explosion was due to defective stay bolts, severely scalding him with hot water. The appellant answered by general denial and plea of contributory negligence and assumed risk. The case was tried to a jury, and, in accordance with the verdict, a judgment was entered for the appellee.

The evidence shows that E. R. White, the appellee, was a locomotive fireman in the employ of the receiver, and was called to go out on engine No. 57 on the night of June 26, 1907. Appellee had never seen or handled this engine before this particular time. While on the trip, and at the station of Rhonesboro, and while the train and engine at the time were on a side track, a portion of the engine boiler gave way, caused by a sudden explosion in the fire box, throwing the fire door open, and severely scalding the appellee with hot water. Appellee at the time was in the performance of his duties as a fireman on the engine. It was proven that the explosion was not caused from any improper management or operation of the engine at the time on the part of the fireman or engineer. It was proven that the engine boiler at the time it was furnished the appellee to perform his work had five defective stay bolts, and the giving way of these stay bolts caused the explosion, and which condition of the engine had previous to this time been reported to the master mechanic of the appellant, but had not been fixed or renewed by him. Appellee did not know of the condition of the engine at the time, nor did he know that its bad order condition had been reported to the master mechanic. Our conclusion of facts are that there was negligence on the part of the appellant, as alleged in the petition, and no contributory negligence on the part of the appellee, and that the amount of damages awarded in the case is sustained by the evidence.

It does not appear from the record that the court took any action upon the motion referred to in the first assignment. If we assume that the court denied the motion to require the appellee to undergo examination before the physician summoned by the appellant, it would not constitute error. Railway v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 75 S. W. 807.

The second assignment is in complaint of the charge to the effect that the court erred in describing the duty that the master owed to the servant in respect to the instrumentality with which the servant is to perform his work. The particular error urged is that a more onerous burden than authorized by law is required of appellant when the instruction to the jury prescribed the duty of "furnishing a reasonably safe engine with which to perform the duties of his employment." That portion of the instruction complained of is contained in the first sentence of the paragraph, and the whole paragraph reads: "It is the duty of the defendant to furnish the plaintiff with a reasonably safe engine with which to perform the duties of his employment. And, if in the performance of this duty defendant failed to exercise such care as an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the same circumstances to see that the said engine was reasonably safe, then the defendant would be guilty of negligence. But, on the other hand, if in the performance of said duty the defendant did exercise such care as an ordinary prudent person would have exercised under such circumstances to see that said engine was reasonably safe, then defendant would not be guilty of negligence and the plaintiff could not recover, although you may believe he suffered injury." We do not think that the instruction, taken and read in its entirety, could be properly construed and understood as making it the absolute duty of the appellant to furnish appellee with a reasonably safe engine with which to perform his duties. The effect of the instruction was to subject and confine the appellant to liability for failure to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe engine, and to liability for no other cause or condition in respect thereto. Although it be conceded that the words used in the first sentence of the instruction to denote the legal standard of safety which the engine furnished by the appellant must satisfy did describe a different and higher duty than authorized by law, yet nevertheless, when that duty is illustrated by the following portion of the instruction contained in the next sentence applying the law, there is indicated and fixed the proper legal standard of ordinary care which appellant is to exercise in order to provide appellee the reasonably safe engine. The instruction as a whole imports that, even though the engine was not reasonably safe, yet the unsafe condition would not be negligence unless appellant failed to use ordinary care in respect thereto. A duty is but an obligation to perform some act, and the court expressly stated to the jury that, "if in the performance of this duty" appellant failed to exercise ordinary care, he would be guilty of negligence, and not guilty of negligence if he did exercise ordinary care, in respect to the matter referred to. In so charging both the performance and the nonperformance of the duty of the master is confined to the exercise of ordinary care with respect to the instrumentality which causes the injury. By the instruction considered as a whole we think the jury were informed, and could not reasonably have been misled, that they could not find for the appellee, if they found that that the appellant's duty to the appellee was performed by the exercise of ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe engine with which to perform his duties. We do not think that our construction of the charge in this case is opposed to the case cited us, as the charges in these cases are not the same as this one nor are they constructed as a whole like the one before us. The assignment of error is overruled.

The third assignment of error in complaint of the charge of the court involves in effect practically the same contention as is raised in the second assignment of error. The ruling upon the second assignment of error determines the contention on this assignment. We are of the opinion that the charge is not susceptible of the construction that it misdirected the jury as to the proper legal duty of the appellant to the appellee. The assignment is therefore overruled.

The appellant claims that the verdict in this case is excessive. While it might reasonably be contended under the evidence in this case that the verdict was large for the injuries proven, yet we are not prepared to say that it is so excessive as to justify us to cause a remititur of any part of the same. It is difficult to measure the compensation that should be allowed for anguish and pain occurring from being scalded by hot water, as shown by this evidence. The assignment is therefore overruled.

The case was ordered affirmed.

DAVIS v. SHERRILL.

1. ATTACHMENT (§ 91*)—AFFIDAVIT—SIGNATURE OF AFFIANT—NECESSITY.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 186, authorizes the issuance of a writ of attachment on affidavit in writing by plaintiff or his attorney, setting up some statutory ground therefor. Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; E. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Myra B. Sherrill against John Davis. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reformed and affirmed.

The following statement of the case is taken from the brief of appellant, and, the same appearing to be correct, it is adopted: "Appellee, plaintiff below, filed her suit against John Davis on a note for \$500, dated September 15, 1903, due two years after date, with 8 per cent. interest, and the usual provisions for attorney's fees, and at the same time filed an instrument, which she styled an affidavit and bond in attachment, and proceeded to have issued a writ of attachment. In her prayer she asks judgment for her debt, with the foreclosure of the attachment upon the property seized. There was not in the trial court nor is there any controversy here as to the money judgment proper to be rendered in favor of the plaintiff below, Mrs. Myra B. Sherrill, and against the defendant, John Davis. The only question is as to the writ of attachment. The purported affidavit is in words as follows: 'State of Texas County of Dallas. Mrs. Myra B. Sherrill, Plaintiff, v. John Davis, Defendant. Before me, the undersigned authority, on this day personally appeared R. E. L. Sauer, who, being by me duly sworn, says that he is the attorney for Mrs. Myra B. Sherrill, plaintiff in the above-entitled cause; that the defendant, John Davis, is justly indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of four hundred and ninety (\$490.00) dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, from the 15th day of September, A. D. 1903, together with an additional amount of ten per cent. as attorney's fees, which amount at this date is seven hundred and four and $\frac{17}{100}$ dollars, and that the said John Davis is about to convert this property, or a part thereof, into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors; that the attachment is not sued out for the purpose of injuring or harassing the defendant; that the plaintiff will probably lose her debt unless this attachment is issued. Sworn to and subscribed before me, this the 22d day of March, A. D. 1907. Geo. W. Mitchell, Notary Public in and for Dallas County, Texas. [Seal]—same being regular, except that it was neither signed by plaintiff below nor any one else. The defendant below called the attention of the court to the defect by a motion to quash the writ. Plaintiff below replied by a motion to be allowed to amend her affidavit by having Saner, her attorney, attach his signature to the instrument. The motion to quash was overruled. The motion to amend was granted, and the court rendered judgment for the debt, and ordered the land seized in attachment to be sold in satisfaction of the debt. Thereafter defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, to all of which said John Davis excepted and gave notice of appeal, which was duly perfected."

Albert W. Webb, for appellant. Saner & Saner and Don Robinson, for appellee.

BOOKHOUT, J. (after stating the facts as above). The only question presented by this appeal is, Was the purported affidavit for attachment sufficient, and if not, could it be amended? Article 186 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 authorizes the issuance of a writ of attachment upon the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney making an affidavit in writing, setting up the existence of some one of the statutory grounds therein set out for the issuance of the writ. The making of the affidavit is the basis for the issuance of the writ, and without the affidavit the writ is unauthorized. Article 6 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 provides that: "All affidavits provided for in this title shall be in writing and signed by the party making the same." It is held that the words "all affidavits provided for in this title" mean all those concerning or relating to which the provisions of the title are made. It is further held that the language is mandatory, and necessarily has the effect to make the signature of the affiant a necessary part of all affidavits embraced within its provisions. Anderson v. Cochran, 93 Tex. 583, 57 S. W. 29. In the case cited it was held that an affidavit required to establish a claim against an estate must comply with said article 6, and must be in writing and signed by the party making the same. It is also clear, from the opinion in that case, that article 6 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 applies to affidavits for attachment, and that a writ of attachment, issued upon an affidavit not signed by the party making the same, is unauthorized and void. Article 6 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 was not adopted until 1879, and the decisions prior to its adoption held that the signature of the affiant was not an essential part of an affidavit. Shelton v. Berry, 19 Tex. 154, 70 Am. Dec. 326; Crist v. Parks, 19 Tex. 234. The purported affidavit in this case not being signed by the affiant, it was not an affidavit within the meaning of the statute. Not being an affidavit, it could not be amended, and the trial court erred in permitting the amendment, allowing the affiant to attach his signature thereto. It follows that the trial court erred in overruling the motion to quash the writ of attachment.

The judgment is reformed and the writ of attachment is quashed, and that part of the judgment foreclosing the attachment lien is held error, and is set aside. The money judgment on the note in favor of appellee is affirmed.

Reformed and affirmed.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Nov. 5, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 19, 1908.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 71*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—ORDER GRANTING OR DISSOLVING TEMPORARY INJUNCTION.

Acts 1907, p. 208, c. 107, authorizing appeals from interlocutory judgments granting or dissolving injunctions, provides only for an appeal from the final order granting or dissolving a temporary injunction, and no appeal lies from an order refusing to grant an injunction on return of an order to show cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 394; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

Appeal from District Court, Bowie County; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Action by Samuel Berger against A. B. De Loach and others. From a judgment refusing an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

Appellant brought this suit by petition or bill for injunction to restrain the members of the city council of the city of Texarkana, Tex., from "closing or in any manner interfering with the operation of plaintiff's business," in pursuit of his occupation as a retail liquor dealer at No. 210 Broad street in the said city; also for mandamus to compel said city council to grant him a license to pursue said occupation at said place. Upon the presentation of the petition, on August 19, 1908, to the district judge at chambers, he made the order fixing August 22 at 9 o'clock at chambers as the time and place for hearing and determining whether the relief prayed for should be granted, and requiring the clerk to forthwith serve the defendants in the suit with notice. At the time and place named all the parties appeared, the defendant filed answer, and the judge heard the evidence, and thereafter rendered his judgment refusing the relief prayed for, and such judgment was entered upon the record. Appeal was taken by the plaintiff in the suit from the action of the judge.

Todd & Hurley, for appellant. Thos. N. Graham and F. M. Ball, for appellees.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). This appeal is taken under Acts 1907, p. 206, c. 107, authorizing appeals from interlocutory judgments granting or dissolving injunctions. The appellees moved to dismiss the appeal. In reply to appellees' motion to dismiss, the appellant says that the action of the judge in assuming jurisdiction, fixing a time and place for hearing, and notifying defendants to appear and show cause, constituted, in legal effect, the granting of a temporary restraining order, or limited injunction restraining defendants, until such hearing, from taking any action interfering with plaintiff's business, and the order of the judge, August 22d, refusing the relief prayed for was, in legal effect, the "dissolution" of such preliminary injunction. It might be a proper legal contention in a given proceeding that the recited action and order of the judge had the legal effect of preserving the status quo and protecting the plaintiff's rights, if any he had, pending the interim of hearing on August 22d; but we are of the opinion that the statute provides only for an appeal from the final order of the judge wherein a temporary injunction may be granted or dissolved in the suit. Baumberger v. Allen (Tex.) 107 S. W. 526; Walstein v. Nicholson (Tex. Civ. App.) 105 S. W. 207.

The appeal is ordered dismissed.

ROSS-ARMSTRONG CO. v. SHAW.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. June 3, 1905.
On Rehearing, July 1, 1905.)

1. SALES (§ 38*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—MATERIALITY.

Where the seller of a piano represented to the purchaser that the piano had a mandolin attachment, and the purchaser was thereby induced to make the purchase believing that he was purchasing a better piano than he did purchase, the representation was material.

2. SALES (§ 38*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—KNOWLEDGE OF FALSITY.

is immaterial that he may have been ignorant of the fact that it was false.

On Rehearing.

3. SALES (§ 38*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—PRUDENCE OF PURCHASER.

A false representation by the seller to the purchaser of a piano that it had a mandolin attachment was of such a nature as would likely have deceived a person of ordinary prudence and business sense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

Appeal from Tarrant County Court.

Action by the Ross-Armstrong Company against J. A. Shaw. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Baskin, Dodge & Baskin and W. Stover, for appellant. Martin & Smith, for appellee.

STEPHENS, J. The evidence tended to prove, and warranted a finding, that appellant represented to the appellee and his wife that the piano sold appellee had a mandolin attachment, and that appellee relied on this representation, and was thereby induced to make the purchase, and that he was thereby induced to believe that he was purchasing a better piano than he did purchase, which representation was therefore material. The evidence also warranted a finding that the representation was false, and it matters not that appellant may have been ignorant of the fact that it was false. He who affirms that to be true which he does not know to be true is responsible for the consequences in law, if not in morals. Judgment affirmed.

On Rehearing.

The Michigan cases cited in motion do hold that it is not sufficient that the person defrauded deemed the false representation material, and was in fact induced to act on them, but it is held also, in Hall v. Johnson, 41 Mich. 286, 2 N. W. 55, that they would be material if, in addition to deceiving, they be such as a person of ordinary prudence would likely be deceived by. In this instance we hold, not only that appellee and his wife were deceived, but also that a person of ordinary prudence and business sense situated as he and his wife were would probably have been influenced as they were. The other cases cited are not applicable, the representations being promissory, and not as to existing facts.

TEXAS LAND & IRRIGATION CO. v. SANDERS et al.

1. COURTS (§ 169*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

In an action in the county court to recover one-fifth of a certain crop alleged by plaintiff to be worth $960, a mandatory injunction was granted requiring defendants to deliver to plaintiff the property claimed. After delivery to plaintiff defendants filed a plea in abatement, alleging that the amount in controversy was more than $1,000 and beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and on trial the court sustained the plea and rendered judgment for $1,218.75, the value of the property. Held, that the judgment was authorized, though the amount exceeded the court's jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 733*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

An assignment that the court erred in overruling plaintiff's motion to set aside the judgment, for the reason that the judgment was against the law and the evidence, and the motion referred to was made on the grounds that "the judgment of the court is against the law and the evidence," is too general to require consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3025; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

Appeal from Austin County Court; C. G. Krueger, Judge.

Action by the Texas Land & Irrigation Company against H. M. Sanders and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. Chesley, C. R. Johnson, and W. A. Matthaef, for appellant. Brown, Carothers & Brown, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. The Texas Land & Irrigation Company, appellant, brought this suit against H. M. Sanders, L. M. Sanders, and J. W. Sanders, appellees, to recover one-fifth of the rice raised by appellees during the year 1905, under a contract wherein appellant contracted to furnish water to irrigate the crop, and appellees jointly agreed to pay to it therefor one-fifth of all the rice raised by them. Appellant alleged the value of the one-fifth to be $960. Upon an allegation that appellees had repudiated the contract and its right to one-fifth of the crop and were preparing and threatening to sell the entire crop, which appellant alleged they would do unless restrained, appellant sought and obtained from the county judge of Austin county what is termed in its brief "a mandatory injunction," which required appellees to deliver to appellant one-fifth of the rice raised by each of them during said year. Appellees filed and presented their motion to dissolve the injunction, which, on hearing, was refused. In compliance with the order of the judge each delivered to appellant one-fifth of his rice crop, amounting to 325 sacks, of which 184 sacks were delivered by H. M. Sanders, 106 by L. M. Sanders, and 85 sacks by J. W. Sanders. The value of the rice so delivered was fixed by appellant's own witnesses at $3.25 per sack, and this valuation was accepted by the court as correct. The value of the rice thus delivered was in excess of $1,000. Thereafter appellees filed a plea in abatement, alleging that the amount in controversy was beyond the jurisdiction of the county court, and that the value of the rice stated in the petition to be $960 was fraudulently alleged in order to confer jurisdiction on that court. When the case was called for trial, all the parties appeared, and the court having heard evidence upon the plea in abatement, sustained the plea and dismissed the suit of appellant, and in the same order, and evidently for the purpose of placing the parties in statu quo (the rice having been sold by appellant in the meantime), rendered judgment against appellant and in favor of each of the appellees for the value of the rice each had delivered to appellant under the order of the court; the aggregate of the amounts being $1,218.75. By an appropriate assignment of error appellant questions the right of the county court to render judgment against it, because the evidence offered in support of the plea in abatement showed that the value of the rice it had received and sold was in the aggregate in an amount beyond the jurisdiction of the county court, and the judgment against appellant in favor of appellees, being in the aggregate for more than $1,000, was beyond the jurisdiction of said court to render. On the other hand, the appellees contend that, while the county court correctly refused to entertain appellant's suit, and there was no error in dismissing it, having unlawfully taken the rice from appellees, the court had power to order restitution and thereby place the parties in statu quo, notwithstanding the value of the rice was of such an amount as to deprive the court of jurisdiction to hear and determine the controversy, and that inasmuch as appellant had sold, and could not therefore return the specific rice received by it, the court correctly rendered judgment against appellant for its value. On this state of facts we certified to our Supreme Court the following questions: "(1) Did the court have jurisdiction to render the judgment against appellant? (2) Was the judgment properly rendered against appellant under the facts stated?"

Our Supreme Court has answered both questions in the affirmative, and, in accordance with the opinion of that court, we hold that the judgment was correctly rendered against appellant and in favor of each of the appellees for the value of the rice delivered by him in obedience to the order of the county court. Appellant has presented several other assignments of error seeking a reversal of the judgment, none of which is presented according to the rules or in a way to require our consideration. For instance, the first assignment is that the court erred in overruling plaintiff's motion to set aside the judgment rendered, for the reason that the judgment was against the law and the evidence as set out in section 1 of said motion. Section 1 of the motion is that "the judgment of the court is against the law and the evidence." Under repeated decisions of our appellate courts the assignment is too general to require consideration. Some of the assignments, not propositions in themselves, are submitted as propositions, while others are not followed by statements as required by the rules, and still others, relating to entirely different subjects, are grouped, and propositions subjoined which are not germane to the group.

There being no reversible error pointed out, and none apparent on the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Affirmed.

SANDERS et al. v. CAULEY et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Nov. 7, 1908.)

1. EQUITY (§ 65*)—PRINCIPLES OF EQUITY—AID TO WRONGDOING — CLEAN HANDS OF COMPLAINANT.

A court of equity never aids in the commission of a wrong, nor in protecting or preserving an unjust advantage wrongfully obtained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 185-187; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

2. EQUITY (§ 65*)—EQUITABLE PRINCIPLES—CLEAN HANDS.

Under the principle that he who seeks equity must come with clean hands, equity will not aid a complainant, if his claim grows out of or depends on, or is inseparably connected with, his own prior fraud or misconduct, but will leave him to his remedies and defenses at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 185-187; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

3. DEDICATION (§ 48*)—LANDS DEDICATED TO PUBLIC USE—EFFECT.

Where a landowner for more than 25 years before his death knew and acquiesced in the use of a tract of land and a house thereon for public school purposes, and repeatedly offered to convey the title to the school trustees, complainants, with knowledge of and acquiescence in such use, had no right, though with the consent of the trustees of the school district, or the original owner's heirs, to remove the house from such tract and place it on land held by them, though in trust for school purposes, notwithstanding the property had also been used for religious and cemetery purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 69*)—SCHOOL PROPERTY—APPROPRIATION.

Where property on which a school building was located had been dedicated to school purposes for the benefit of all the patrons of the school district, the participation by two of the trustees of the district in the removal of the building to another tract constituted a legal fraud, a perversion of their trust, and a practical confiscation of the schoolhouse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 174; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

5. EQUITY (§ 65*)—EQUITABLE PRINCIPLES—CLEAN HANDS.

Where complainants had illegally removed a school building from a tract dedicated to the public for school purposes, they could not maintain a suit for injunction to restrain defendants from removing the schoolhouse from the place complainants had located it.

Appeal from District Court, Johnson County; O. L. Lockett, Judge.

Suit by Dud Sanders and others against Jim Cauley and others. Judgment for defendants, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Davis & Davis, for appellants. Poindexter & Padelford and J. M. Moore, for appellees.

TALBOT, J. This suit was instituted by appellants to enjoin appellees from removing a house from land alleged to be owned by appellants. A temporary writ of injunction was granted, and upon motion of appellees was, on the 12th day of September, 1908, dissolved. From this judgment appellants have appealed.

The grounds of the motion are: (1) That "the bill or petition is void of equity, and shows no ground for the relief sought, for the reasons appearing in defendants' answer, herewith filed and here referred to and made a part hereof"; (2) that "all the material allegations contained in plaintiffs' petition are denied and traversed by defendants in their sworn answer, herewith filed and made a part hereof." In support of and against the motion to dissolve, in addition to the sworn pleadings, numerous affidavits were filed by the respective parties, and from these affidavits and pleadings the following facts may be adduced: About 30 years prior to the institution of this suit O. P. Arnold gave and dedicated five acres of land, situated in the Hopewell public school community or district in Johnson county, Tex., to be used for school, religious, and cemetery purposes. No deed was ever made conveying said land, but shortly after Arnold donated the land for said purposes the resident citizens of said community, by voluntary contributions and subscription, erected thereon a house 24x18 feet, which was thereafter used for school purposes, and sometimes church purposes, until some time during the year 1907. For 25 years or more before the institution of this suit the said house was used for school purposes, and controlled by the trustees of the said Hopewell public school district, and was known and recognized during that time as public school property of said district. For said number of years the said O. P. Arnold, who died before this suit was brought, set up no claim to said property, but acquiesced in the use being made of it, and recognized it at all times as public school property, and repeatedly offered to convey it to the school trustees, as such property, if they would prepare and present to him a deed to that effect. During the year 1907 the boundaries of the said public school district were extended, and the school patrons of said district thereafter met in a mass meeting, and by a majority vote agreed to move said schoolhouse off the said school and cemetery lot donated by O. P. Arnold to a more desirable point to them in said school district, the plaintiffs voting with the minority to keep said house on said school and cemetery lot. It is alleged by appellees, and proof in support thereof by affidavits was introduced by them, to the effect that, by the action thus taken at the mass meeting of the patrons a controversy arose about the moving of said schoolhouse, and that by common consent it was agreed that said house should remain where it was during the year 1907, and until new school trustees were elected; that thereafter the plaintiffs, appellants in this court, or a portion of them, of their own motion, and in violation of the agreement that said schoolhouse should remain on the school and cemetery tract of land, moved said house across the line of said five acres and onto the small piece of land described in plaintiffs' petition, containing only about one-fourth of an acre.

It is alleged by plaintiffs, in a supplemental petition, and evidence, by affidavits in support thereof, was offered, that the house in question and the five acres of land upon which it was originally built was not built for and dedicated to public school purposes, and was not turned over to the trustees of said public school district to be controlled by them; but that said land was dedicated to cemetery purposes, and that the house in question was built, by public donations and subscriptions, to be used for holding religious services in, and burial services, and to teach public or private school in, as the community might desire. It is conceded by plaintiffs in their said pleading, and in argument, however, that said house had been used for school purposes by the school district, as well as for the other purposes mentioned, since it was built, about 25 years, and that, notwithstanding the trustees of said district did not have the exclusive control of said house, yet they did have the right to have the public school of said district taught therein. Plaintiffs do not deny, but admit, as we understand, that they removed said house from the five-acre tract of land, and placed it on the land now claimed by them; but they alleged, and offered evidence in support of such allegations, that they had not agreed that the house should remain on said five-acre tract; that they obtained the consent of two of the trustees of said school district, and the consent of three of the six surviving children of the said O. P. Arnold, to move said house. The instrument by which the plaintiffs acquired the one-fourth acre of land upon which they placed the schoolhouse was attached to and made a part of their petition. This instrument conveyed said tract of land to plaintiffs Sanders and Teeters in trust for their use and the use of the trustees of the Hopewell school district and a minority of the patrons of the school, and provided that "said property, land and all improvements placed thereon shall be used, maintained and perpetuated as a schoolhouse and for such public gatherings of the community and others, as said beneficiaries shall provide for, and for public worship of God and for conducting of funeral services, all these to be conducted at said place only, it being hereby expressly agreed by and between the grantor herein, said trustees and their successors, and the above-named beneficiaries of this trust, that any house or improvements placed by said beneficiaries on said land is their own property and upon the unanimous vote of all of said beneficiaries for such removal, may be removed therefrom at any time upon and to said five-acre cemetery lot, but to no other place, and by authority of no other persons."

Appellants contend that, by their act in moving the house onto the land deeded to them by Shellhorse and wife, the same became a fixture, a part of their land, and that they may justly invoke the aid of a court of equity to restrain appellees from invading their premises and retaking said house. It is well said in argument by counsel for appellees that a court of equity never aids in the commission of a wrong, nor will it lend its aid in the protection or preservation of an unjust advantage wrongfully obtained. It is a fundamental principle of equity jurisprudence that "he who comes into a court of equity must come with clean hands." Mr. Pomeroy says: "Whatever may be the strictly accurate theory concerning the nature of equitable interference, the principle was established from the earliest days that, while the Court of Chancery could interpose and compel a defendant to comply with the dictates of conscience and good faith with regard to matters outside of the strict rules of the law, or even in contradiction to those rules, while it could act upon the conscience of a defendant, and force him to do right and justice, it would never thus interfere on behalf of a plaintiff whose own conduct, in connection with the same matter or transaction, had been unconscientious or unjust, or marked by a want of good faith, or had violated any of the principles of equity and righteous dealing which it is the purpose of the jurisdiction to sustain." Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 398. The principle does not, of course, apply to every unconscientious, inequitable, or wrongful act on the part of the plaintiff. It will be confined in its operation to misconduct connected with the matter in litigation, "so that it has in some measure affected the equitable relations subsisting between the parties and arising out of the transaction." Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 399. Many illustrations of the principle are given in the books, one of the most familiar being cases where the plaintiff's claim is affected by his own fraud. So that it is said that, whatever be the nature of the plaintiff's claim and of the relief which he seeks, if his claim grows out of, or depends upon, or is inseparably connected with, his own prior fraud, a court of equity will in general deny him any relief, and will leave him to whatever remedies and defenses at law he may have. Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 401, and cases cited in note. In such cases a court of equity will refuse all affirmative relief.

But it is not alone fraud which will prevent a litigant from obtaining relief in a court of equity. "Any really unconscientious conduct, connected with the controversy to which he is a party, will repel him from the forum whose very foundation is good conscience." Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 404. We think the conduct of appellees in removing the house onto their land, in the manner and under the circumstances shown by the undisputed evidence, brings them within the operation of the equitable principles announced, and that the writ of injunction was properly dissolved. The house and the five-acre tract of land upon which it originally stood had become dedicated to the uses to which it was being put before its removal. The uncontradicted facts show that O. P. Arnold, for about 25 years or more before his death, not only knew and acquiesced in the use of said land and house for public school purposes, but proffered more than once, to make title thereto to the school trustees for such purposes. Such knowledge and acquiescence is also shown by appellants' pleadings, and the fact that said property may have been used also for religious and cemetery purposes does not, in our opinion, materially affect the question of its dedication to school purposes, and neither the consent of the trustees of the school district, nor of O. P. Arnold's children justified the removal of the house and the placing of it upon land held by appellants (even though it be in trust for school purposes), under a conveyance or instrument which, by its express terms, provides that it may be used for purposes other than those to which it was dedicated by O. P. Arnold, and that any house or improvements placed on said land by the beneficiaries named therein is their own property, and should only be removed from said land by the authority of said beneficiaries. As has been seen, the instrument by which the one-fourth acre of land upon which the schoolhouse was placed by plaintiffs, and from which they seek to restrain its removal, provides that said land is conveyed to the beneficiaries named, among whom are the two trustees of the Hopewell public school district who consented to the removal of the schoolhouse off the five-acre tract, "and in trust that said property land and all improvements placed thereon shall be used * * * as a schoolhouse and for such public gatherings of the community and others, as said beneficiaries shall provide for, and for public worship, etc., all these to be conducted at said place only, it being further expressly stipulated that any house or improvements placed by said beneficiaries on said land is their own property and shall be removed therefrom only by the unanimous vote of all of said beneficiaries, and then only to and upon said five-acre cemetery lot adjoining, and by authority of no other persons."

The sanction of the two school trustees of the Hopewell public school district of this unwarranted appropriation of property which had been dedicated to school purposes for the benefit of all the patrons of the school of said district could give no validity to the unlawful and wrongful act; and the participation in such act, on the part of said trustees, was a violation of duty, and in legal effect a perversion of the trust which had been committed to them as school trustees, and constituted such a legal fraud, in relation to the subject-matter of this litigation, as will prevent them from entering a court of equity for the relief sought. By their wrongful conduct they have practically confiscated the house, which they now call on a court of equity to assist them in holding. They have sought to wrest the control of said house from the trustees of the school district, and confer it upon the beneficiaries named in their deed, who are a part, if not all, of the minority patrons of the Hopewell school, and who opposed a majority of such patrons in their desire to locate said house at a point in the school district which, at least, appeared to them to be more convenient and accessible for all. They have, by placing said house upon the one-fourth acre tract of land, attempted to make it a part of said land, and thereby, and by the written agreement contained in the deed from Shellhorse, converted said house and endeavored to make it their own. The trustees who became parties to this transaction and unlawful removal of said house from the five-acre tract have thereby abandoned said last-named tract for school purposes, and assisted in placing it probably within the power of Arnold's heirs, two of whom, it seems, are beneficiaries in said deed, to not only secure the land by reversion, but also, if it should please the other beneficiaries in said deed to act with them, by moving said house back on the abandoned five-acre tract, to acquire the title to and possession of said house. Clearly it cannot be said that under these circumstances the plaintiffs came into court in the prosecution of this suit "with clean hands," and hence we think they are in no position to invoke in a court of equity the relief asked.

This effectually disposes of the appeal, and other questions, discussed in the briefs and arguments of counsel need not be noticed.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

ORANGE LUMBER CO. v. THOMPSON.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 15, 1908.
On Rehearing, Nov. 23, 1908.)

1. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 26*)—OBSTRUCTIONS—INJURIES—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for damages from obstructions placed in waters alleged to be navigable, an instruction that "such waters as are navigable in fact are navigable waters" is not misleading, although so indefinite as to be of little service to the jury in determining whether waters are navigable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 163; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 26*)—REMEDIES FOR OBSTRUCTION—"NAVIGABLE STREAM."

In an action for damages for placing obstructions in a bayou and river alleged by plaintiff to be navigable, thus preventing him from floating logs placed therein to market, an instruction to find for plaintiff, if the jury believed from the evidence that he had placed logs in the bayou and river, and further believed that said bayou and river "were navigable for the purpose of floating said logs to market," is inaccurate, as such waters might have been navigable at the time that plaintiff wished to market his logs and not navigable at other times, and the stream to be navigable must be capable of use by the public, either at all times during the year, or for times long enough to make them useful to the public as a means of transportation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 163; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4675-4684; vol. 8, p. 7728.]

3. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

An instruction, in an action to recover damages for the obstruction of navigable waters, thereby preventing plaintiff from floating his logs to market, directing the jury to find for plaintiff, if they believed from the preponderance of the evidence that defendant unreasonably detained plaintiff's logs by reason of wrongfully obstructing their passage "along said navigable waters," is incorrect as being on the weight of the evidence; the question of the navigability of those waters being controverted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 439-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1317, prohibiting a trial judge from commenting on the weight of the evidence in his charge to the jury, is mandatory, and an assumption in the charge that a controverted fact has been established one way or another is a violation of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 420; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

5. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 26*)—REMEDIES FOR OBSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for obstructing navigable waters, thereby preventing plaintiff from floating his logs to market, plaintiff alleged in his complaint that, because of defendant's wrongful obstruction, it was necessary for him, in order to save his logs and get them to market, to camp near the same and spend his entire time between two specified dates, and he testified that, because of the obstruction complained of, it became necessary for him to stay near and watch his logs, and that the customary wages for such services was $3 per day, and that his time, while engaged in caring for his logs while they were detained, was reasonably worth $3 per day. Held, that an instruction that plaintiff's damage might be measured by the reasonable value of his time while he was necessarily engaged in caring for the logs was correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 162, 163; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

6. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 19*)—REMEDIES FOR OBSTRUCTIONS.

One who is rightfully using navigable waters is not liable for damages resulting from their necessary obstruction by such use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*)—OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction which is defective because omitting an important modification will not be considered on appeal, where no instructions supplying the omission were requested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 629; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

On Rehearing.

8. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 26*)—REMEDIES FOR OBSTRUCTION.

In an action for obstructing navigable waters, thereby preventing plaintiff from floating his logs to market, the petition alleged that defendant constructed and maintained a boom in such a manner that its logs completely blocked Tiger bayou and Old river for a distance from their mouths, and at the trial plaintiff testified that he was prevented from floating his logs out of the Tiger bayou and into the Sabine river by an obstruction across the mouth of said bayou, and that defendant put in timber in Old river, and kept plaintiff from reaching Sabine river. The court, in submitting the case to the jury, instructed them to find for plaintiff on certain conditions, if they believed that plaintiff placed logs in Tiger bayou, or Old river, and that defendant, by placing obstructions in said waters, or across the same, prevented plaintiff from transporting his logs to market. Held that the question whether Tiger bayou and Old river were navigable was a material issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 163; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

9. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 21*)—OBSTRUCTIONS.

A lumber company has no right, by constructing booms across the mouth of a navigable stream, or at other places in navigable waters, for any length of time to prevent their free use by others for the purpose of floating logs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 123; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

10. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 26*)—REMEDIES FOR OBSTRUCTION.

If a lumber company used navigable waters to store logs instead of to transport them, it would be liable, to one who desires to use the waters to transport logs, for such damages as reasonably should have been contemplated by the lumber company as likely to result, from so storing its logs, to the person who desires to use the waters to transport his logs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 162; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

Appeal from Orange County Court; W. J. Wingate, Judge.

Action by John Thompson against the Orange Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Adams & Huggins, for appellant. Holland & Holland, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. Alleging that Sabine river and its tributaries Tiger bayou and Old river were navigable, and that, because of obstructions wrongfully placed and maintained therein by appellant, he had been unable, from April 29th to October 1, 1905, to float to market certain cypress logs he had prior to said April 29th placed in said bayou and Old river for that purpose, whereby he had lost certain of the logs, and time in caring for same, and incurred extra expense in marketing those of the logs not lost, appellee sought by his suit to recover of appellant as damages $430 as the value of the logs lost, $450 as the value of his time lost, and $20 as the aggregate of expenses incurred by him over and above those he otherwise would have incurred in marketing the logs saved. From a judgment in his favor for the sum of $788, rendered in accordance with the verdict of a jury, this appeal is prosecuted.

The evidence established without controversy that appellant had constructed, and during the time alleged had maintained, in the Sabine river a boom extending across the mouth of Tiger bayou and Old river, and had so caught and stored logs therein, and in the mouths of said bayou and Old river, as to prevent appellee from floating his logs, from points where he had placed same in said bayou and Old river above their mouths. Into the Sabine river and on to the market at Orange. Whether the bayou and Old river were navigable or not within the meaning of the law, so as to entitle appellee to use same for the purpose of transporting his logs to market, was a controverted issue in the case. In his general charge the court advised the jury that "such waters as are navigable in fact are navigable waters," and instructed them, on other conditions specified in the charge, to find for appellee if they believed from the evidence that he had placed logs in the bayou and Old river, and further believed that said bayou and Old river "were navigable for the purpose of floating said logs to market." "The term 'navigable body of water,'" says Mr. Farnham, "includes all waters which, for a period long enough to be of commercial value, are of sufficient capacity to float water craft for the purpose of commerce, or to float to market the products of the country through which the water extends, so as to be useful to the population along its banks." 1 Water and Water Rights, § 23. "The capability of use by the public for the purpose of transportation and commerce," says another writer, "rather than the extent and manner of that used, affords the true criterion of the navigability of waters. If they are capable in their natural state of being used for the purpose of commerce, no matter in what mode of commerce they may be conducted, they are navigable in fact and become in law public highways." 21 A. & E. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 428. Measured by these definitions, we do not think it properly can be said that the one given by the court was misleading; though, as a guide to the jury in determining whether the bayou and Old river were navigable or not, it perhaps was useless, because a "definition which did not define anything." When it is said that "such waters as are navigable in fact are navigable waters," the question remains: What waters does the law recognize as navigable in fact? We are not so sure that appellant's contention as to the other language quoted from the court's charge is not meritorious. The bayou and Old river at the time in question may have been capable of floating appellee's logs to market, and yet not have been navigable water within the meaning of the law. The jury should have been required to find, not that at that particular time alone the streams were capable of floating appellee's particular logs, but that at that and other times they were capable of floating any person's logs. In their natural state the streams must, to have been navigable, have been capable of use by the public, either at all times, or periodically during the year for times long enough to make them susceptible of beneficial use to the public as a means of transportation. Whether the vice pointed out in the charge was removed by the further instruction, given the jury at the request of the appellant, that to be navigable the bayou and Old river must have been "so far floatable in their natural capacity as to be of public use in the transportation of property" need not be determined, as the judgment will be reversed on other grounds hereafter to be stated, and as on another trial the jury doubtless will be more carefully instructed as to what in law constitutes a "navigable stream."

After instructing the jury on conditions specified to find for appellee as damages a sum equal to the market value of the logs lost, the court further instructed them as follows: "If you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant unreasonably detained the logs of plaintiff, by reason of wrongfully obstructing their passage along said navigable waters, and that it was necessary for plaintiff to care for and watch said logs, and he did so care for and watch same, then you will find for plaintiff such additional sum as his time was reasonably worth during all of the time he was compelled to and did care for said property." The contention made that the portion of the charge quoted, in the use of the language "along said navigable waters," was on the weight of the evidence must be sustained. Whether Tiger bayou and Old river were navigable or not were sharply controverted facts on the trial of the case. The charge assumed that they were navigable. The statute prohibiting a trial judge from commenting on the weight of the evidence in his charge to the jury (Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1317) is mandatory. An assumption in the charge that a controverted fact has been established to be one way or another is a violation of the statute, as is any intimation from the judge as to the weight which should be given by the jury to the evidence on any controverted issue material to a determination of the case. Overall v. Armstrong (Tex. Civ. App.), 25 S. W. 440; Ry. Co. v. Williams, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 675, 40 S. W. 161; Ry. Co. v. Smith (Tex. Civ. App.) 63 S. W. 1066. In the third and fourth paragraphs of the court's instructions to the jury like language was used, rendering those portions of the charge subject to the criticism made of the portion quoted above.

The paragraph quoted above from the court's charge is further objected to on the ground (1) that it states an incorrect measure to determine appellee's damages, appellant contending the reasonable and actual expense incurred in caring for the logs while they were wrongfully detained, and not the reasonable value of appellee's time lost in caring for them, was the correct measure; and (2) that a recovery should have been limited to the expense incurred, not for the entire time that the logs were detained, but only for the time they were detained with reference to appellant's equal right to make use of the streams. In his petition appellee alleged that, because of appellant's wrongful obstruction of the stream, it was necessary for him, in an effort to save his logs and get them to market, to camp near same and spend his entire time from April 29th to October 1, 1905. Appellee testified that, because of the obstructions complained of, it became necessary for him to stay near and watch his logs, that the customary wages for such service was $3 per day, and that his time, while engaged in caring for his logs while they were detained, was reasonably worth $3 per day. In this attitude of the pleading and evidence, we are not prepared to say that the court erred in authorizing the jury to measure appellee's damage, in the particular in question, by the reasonable value of his time while he was necessarily engaged in caring for the logs. If it was necessary for appellee to remain near and devote his time to caring for the logs, then it seems to us that the value of his time should be held to be a part of the "reasonable and actual expenses incurred in caring for the logs," which appellant contends should be the measure of his damages. If it should be so included, it was not error for the court in effect, to so instruct the jury. As to the other objection specified, we think it is not without merit. If the streams were navigable, appellant had the right, equal to appellee's, to reasonably and for a reasonable time use them; and, while it so used them, it would not be liable to appellee because he thereby was prevented from using them. On another trial the court should properly instruct the jury as to the relative rights of the parties to the use of the water, if navigable, and should not authorize the jury to recover for any expense incurred by appellee in caring for his logs while appellant was rightfully using the streams. 1 Farnham on Water and Water Rights, §§ 27, 84c; A. & E. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 441.

Appellant complains of the portion of the court's charge instructing the jury, on conditions specified, to "find for the plaintiff the market value" of the logs lost. The contention is that the instruction should have been to find the market value of the logs lost, "at the time and place they were lost." An instruction supplying the omission from the court's charge was not requested, and for this reason appellant should not be heard to complain thereof. For a like reason there is no merit in appellant's complaint that the court failed to instruct the jury as to appellee's duty, if he could have done so at a moderate expense, to protect himself from injurious consequences of appellant's wrongful acts.

We have considered the assignments of error complaining of other matters shown by the record, and, being of the opinion that they are without merit, overrule them.

The judgment of the trial court will be reversed and the cause will be remanded for a new trial.

On Rehearing.

Appellee insists it was wholly immaterial whether Tiger bayou and Old river were navigable or not—that his suit, as made by his pleadings, the evidence, and the charge of the court, was for damages for obstructing Sabine river, and not for obstructing said bayou and Old river. The allegations of his petition, so far as pertinent to his contention, were as follows: "That therefore, to wit, on or about the 29th day of April, 1905, plaintiff owned and had in his possession 65 sticks of cypress timber, which he had theretofore cut down and topped and placed in Tiger bayou and Old river, both of which are navigable streams, in Orange county, Tex., for the purpose of floating the same down and upon the waters of Sabine river, a navigable stream, to Orange, his only market. That on or about said date, and for a long time thereafter, defendant constructed and maintained a boom, and kept the same constantly filled with floating timber and logs in and across the mouths of said Old river and Tiger bayou and extending a distance of some three miles up and down the Sabine river above and below the mouths of said Tiger bayou and Old river in such a manner that said Orange Lumber Company's logs completely blocked Tiger bayou and Old river for a distance up from their mouths, and kept the Sabine river blocked and filled with logs for the distance between the west bank of said Sabine river and said boom, and although often requested by plaintiff to open same, or to allow said plaintiff to open same, refused to do so, or to allow plaintiff to do so, and prevented plaintiff from reaching, and shut plaintiff off from his only market for, his said cypress timber." Appellee testified: "I placed 36 sticks in Old river and 28 sticks in Tiger bayou. There was no obstructions in either Tiger bayou or Old river when I placed my timber in there. * * * The timber I placed in Tiger bayou I floated down to its mouth where it empties into the Sabine river, and found a 'sheer' or 'skin' across its mouth, which prevented me from getting my logs into the Sabine river. Defendant had their logs in the Sabine river in a boom which took up about one-half of the width of the Sabine river. It was some 300 or 400 feet to the outside of the boom, and all the intervening space was filled with defendant's logs. In order to market, I would have been obliged to open the sheer or skin, pass through all those logs, and then through the boom in the middle of the Sabine river. * * * I often told Mr. Hunt, who had charge of the boom for the Orange Lumber Company, that if he didn't let me out with my timber that I would cut the sheer, but he would not let me out. * * * Defendant maintained a boom across the mouth of Old river. I could not pass the boom with my timber. They also began putting in timber in Old river, and it kept me from reaching the Sabine river." The court instructed the jury: "If you find from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, John Thompson, placed any cypress logs or timber in Tiger bayou or Old river, tributaries of the Sabine river, and that such waters were navigable for the purpose of floating said logs to market, and defendant, by placing booms or other obstructions in said waters or across the same, or in the Sabine river or across the same, prevented the said plaintiff from bringing his said logs to market for an unreasonable length of time, under all the circumstances introduced in evidence before you, and you further find that, because of such obstructions and delay, the plaintiff lost any of the logs, then you will find for the plaintiff the reasonable market value of all the logs so lost, if any." It will be observed that in his petition appellee alleged that appellant constructed and maintained a boom "in such a manner that said Orange Lumber Company's logs completely blocked Tiger bayou and Old river for a distance up from their mouths." It will also be observed that appellee testified that he was prevented from floating his logs out of Tiger bayou and into the Sabine river by a "sheer" or "skin" across the mouth of said bayou, and that appellant "began putting in timber in Old river and it kept me from reaching the Sabine river." And when it is further observed that the court in submitting the case to the jury, instructed them to find for appellee on certain other conditions named, if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff placed cypress logs in Tiger bayou or Old river, and that defendant, "by placing booms or other obstructions in said waters or across the same," prevented appellee from transporting his said logs to market, we think it will be apparent that we did not misconceive appellee's case, and on an immaterial issue reverse the judgment of the lower court.

In support of his contention appellee argues that his cause of action would have appeared to be as perfect, if, instead of alleging that he had placed his logs in the bayou and Old river, navigable streams, he had alleged that he had placed them on a chute extending from the land into the Sabine, or had alleged them to be in a swamp. In fact he argues it was "wholly immaterial where his timber was." But we think it was material. Before he would be entitled to recover damages on the ground that appellant had so obstructed the Sabine as to prevent him from using its waters to transport his logs to market, it would have to appear that but for such obstruction his logs could have been so transported to market. If other obstacles were in the way, which would have to be removed before the logs could be got to and floated in the Sabine, until those obstacles had been removed he would have no ground on which to complain of an obstruction in the Sabine. If his logs were in a position where they could not be floated in the Sabine, even if it were free of obstructions, certainly he would have no right to complain of obstructions in it. If, in the case suggested by him as illustrating his argument, his logs had been on the hillside near the Sabine, it would be no concern of his that its waters were so obstructed as to prevent the floating of logs therein, if on account of a wall or other obstruction on the hillside between his logs and the Sabine, they could not have been gotten to and into its waters. So, if his logs were in Tiger bayou or Old river, and, on account of obstructions existing in those streams, could not be got to the Sabine, he would have no right to complain because of obstructions in the Sabine, which, had he been able to get his logs into its waters, would have prevented him from floating them to market.

In the opinion disposing of the appeal we made this statement: "If the streams were navigable, appellant had a right equal to appellee's to reasonably and for a reasonable time use them; and, while it so used them. It would not be liable to appellee because he thereby was prevented from using them. On another trial the court should properly instruct the jury as to the relative rights of the parties to the use of the waters, if navigable, and should not authorize the plaintiff to recover for any expense incurred by him in caring for his logs while appellant was rightfully using the streams." That there may be no misapprehension as to what was meant by the language quoted, we state that we are of the opinion that, if the bayou and Old river were navigable, appellant would not have a right, by constructing "sheers" or "skins" or booms across them at their mouths, or at other places, for any length of time, to prevent their free use by appellee for the purpose of floating his logs. And we also are of the opinion that, if appellant, without constructing such obstructions, instead of using the waters of the bayou and Old river for the purpose and the incidents thereto of transporting its logs, used them for the purpose of storing them, it would be liable to appellee for such damages as reasonably should have been contemplated by appellant as likely to result to appellee while he was prevented by such storing of its logs from floating his own to the Sabine.

The motion for a rehearing is overruled.

Appeal from District Court, Liberty County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Trespass to try title by Tom Berwick against Mrs. J. A. Thomason, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Stephens & Pickett and G. H. Pendarvis, for appellants. C. N. Smith and H. E. Marshall, for appellee.

PLEASANTS, C. J. This is an action of trespass to try title, brought by appellee against appellants, the widow and heirs at law of J. A. Thomason, Jr., deceased, to recover land situated in Liberty county. Mrs. Julia A. Thomason answered for herself and is guardian of the minor defendants J. A. Thomason and James H. Thomason, by plea of not guilty and pleas of limitation. The minors Laura and Cordelia Thomason answered by their respective guardians, the Houston Land & Trust Company and R. M. Kilgore. Each of these defendants pleaded not guilty, and the Houston Land & Trust Company also pleaded limitation. The trial in the court below without a jury resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the land in controversy.

The record shows that the land was conveyed to H. Berwick by J. S. Blasdel on August 27, 1885. On June 8, 1887, H. Berwick and wife, Ida Berwick, conveyed it to W. E. Stetson, and thereafter it was conveyed by said Stetson to George F. Allen, by Allen to W. B. Brittain, by Brittain to C. H. Simmons, and on May 8, 1893, Simmons and wife conveyed it to appellant, Mrs. Julia A. Thomason, who was then the wife of J. A. Thomason, Jr., now deceased, under whom the other appellants claim. The appellee, Tom Berwick, is the son of Mary Berwick, deceased, who was the wife of H. Berwick at the time the land was conveyed to him by J. S. Blasdel, as before stated, on the 27th day of August, 1885. Mary Berwick died in January, 1886, and H. Berwick thereafter married Ida McShane, who joined him in the execution of the deed conveying the land to W. E. Stetson on June 8, 1887. The evidence sustains the finding of the trial court that the land was paid for with the separate funds of Mary Berwick. The appellee, Tom Berwick, is the sole heir of said Mary. The evidence also sustains the finding that, while the land was conveyed by Simmons and wife to Mrs. Julia A. Thomason, it was in fact purchased and paid for by her husband, J. A. Thomason, Jr., and that at the time he purchased he knew that it was the separate property of appellee's mother, Mary Berwick, and that the plaintiff, as the heir of said Mary Berwick, was claiming the land. There is no evidence that any one of the purchasers under H. Berwick and wife, prior to the said J. A. Thomason, Jr., had any knowledge of the fact that H. Berwick had a former wife, or knew any facts which would put them upon notice of appellee's claim to the land. Upon this state of the evidence the trial court erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff. It is a well-settled rule of decision in this state that, in order for one asserting a prior equitable title against the purchaser of the legal title to prevail, it devolves upon him to show that the holder of the legal title is not a purchaser for value, or that he purchased with notice of the prior equitable claim. Johnson v. Newman, 48 Tex. 642; Edwards v. Brown, 68 Tex. 329, 4 S. W. 380, 5 S. W. 87; French v. Strumberg, 52 Tex. 92; Baldwin v. Root, 90 Tex. 552, 40 S. W. 3; Fordtran v. Perry (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 1000.

It is equally well settled that, if a subsequent purchaser with notice acquires title from a former purchaser, who bought for value and without notice, such subsequent purchaser succeeds to all the rights of his grantor. When land once becomes freed from equities by a bona fide purchase by one having no notice of the equities, such purchaser obtains a complete jus disponendi, and any one who takes title from him takes it free from said prior equities, notwithstanding he may have notice thereof at the time he buys. Grace v. Wade, 45 Tex. 522; Lewis v. Johnson, 68 Tex. 450, 4 S. W. 644. We think it logically follows from these decisions that the burden upon one asserting an equitable claim against the purchaser of a legal title, who has not purchased directly from the holder of the legal title against whom the equity arose, is not discharged by merely showing that the last purchaser had notice of the equity, but the proof must go further and show that the land was not free from such equity in the hands of any of the intermediate vendors of said purchaser. This is the holding in the following cases: Peterson v. McCauley (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 826; Burleson v. Alvis, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 51, 66 S. W. 235.

The record presents no other error that is likely to occur upon another trial, and it is unnecessary to discuss any of the other questions presented.

For the error indicated, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

SMITH v. SIMPSON BANK et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 13*)—TITLE ACQUIRED.

Defendant is entitled to 160 acres of land, embracing the improvements by adverse possession, on showing that his grantor's predecessor having a tax title to a survey gave grantor 160 acres, including a house, etc., and 35 or 40 acres of inclosed and cultivated land, and that grantor went into possession occupying the improvements with his family and cultivating the land continuously for 13 years, at the end of which he sold and delivered possession to defendant, who occupied the land until this suit therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 100*)—EXTENT.

Though one is entitled to a particular tract of land by adverse possession, where his actual occupancy for the statutory period has been by inclosure or other actual uses or by a public claim to the particular boundaries, defendant in trespass to try title, who claims 160 acres through actual occupancy of a part thereof, cannot claim 160 acres to particular boundaries shown by the cutting of timber by his predecessor less than 10 years before the suit was brought, though he is entitled to have 160 acres set aside to him, including the improvements.

Appeal from District Court, Sabine County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Trespass to try title by the Simpson Bank and others against T. R. Smith and another.

From the judgment, defendant T. R. Smith appeals. Reversed and remanded.

John Hamman, John B. Warren, Tom C. Davis, and Hamilton & Minton, for appellant. Goodrich & Synnot, for appellees.

JAMES, C. J. This action of trespass to try title was by the Simpson Bank and others against Henry Smith and T. R. Smith; the judgment being in favor of Henry Smith for a tract claimed by him, but against T. R. Smith for the tract claimed by him. The appeal is by T. R. Smith; he having set up title by limitations to 160 acres of the land sued for, describing a certain tract of that size by metes and bounds.

The court instructed the jury to return a verdict against him, and he claims here that the evidence at least entitled him to a submission of his plea to the jury, and in fact is such as to entitle him to a judgment in this court for the 160 acres as described in his plea. The evidence is to this effect: That about 1886 W. T. Pulliam, who had a tax title to the Henry Canfield survey, gave his son-in-law, Love, 160 acres of the tract, including his dwelling house, etc., and 35 or 40 acres of fenced and cultivated land. Love went into possession, occupying the improvements with his family, and cultivated the land from 1887 continuously until he sold and turned over the place to defendant T. R. Smith early in 1900. Then Smith moved there and occupied it until this suit was brought in August, 1903. Both Love and Smith at all times claimed 160 acres, and this claim was open and understood in the neighborhood. There can be no question from the evidence that there had been such character of occupation by Love and Smith consecutively, and for such length of time, as, under the 10-year statute, entitled this defendant to 160 acres of land embracing the improvements. The only question which arises is whether or not the evidence is such as to authorize the adjudication to Smith of the 160 acres of the survey as he described it in his answer.

It is contended that the limits of the 160-acre parcel were indicated on the ground by the timber which Love had cut and sold from the land for staves; this being claimed to be an act which visibly defined the extent and shape of his claim. But we find that the testimony shows that Love had not been cutting this timber until from about three years before he sold to Love. Consequently this means of proclaiming the lines to which Love was claiming had not subsisted for 10 years. This cutting of timber in this manner, and a survey of the land by Love when he sold to Smith in 1900, which survey was as the 160 acres are described in the answer, the pointing out by Love at that time of the same as the boundaries of his claim, are substantially all there is to establish those lines as the boundary of the 160 acres.

The law, as we understand it, entitled the defendant to the ground actually occupied, by improvements, etc., and enough more to make 160 acres. If his actual occupancy is of 160 acres by inclosure or other actual uses, or if merely by a public and notorious assertion of claim to certain boundaries constituting 160 acres, the decisions entitle him to claim the particular 160 acres. Giddings v. Fischer, 97 Tex. 188, 77 S. W. 209; Davis v. Receivers of Houston Oil Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 219, and cases cited. But here there was nothing indicating an assertion of claim to the 160 acres set up, except what is above stated, which, while they might have been sufficient, had not subsisted for the length of time necessary. Defendant certainly has not the right, when his claim as to boundaries has thus been indefinite, to select the land at the trial. We think that, while appellant has not shown himself entitled as of right to claim the boundaries of the 160 acres to be as he described them, his right, nevertheless, exists to have 160 acres of land set apart to him to include the improvements, as was held in Bering v. Ashley (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 838, and it was error to direct a verdict against him.

Reversed and remanded.

The question of negligence vel non is primarily for the jury, and only becomes one of law for the court when the facts are undisputed and only one conclusion can be drawn therefrom.

STREET RAILROADS (§ 114*)—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIAN—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for death of a pedestrian in collision with a street car, evidence held to warrant a finding that the motorman failed to exercise ordinary care in keeping a lookout for persons on and at the intersection of the streets where the accident occurred.

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 114*)—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIANS—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In an action for death of a pedestrian in a collision with a street car at a street intersection, evidence held to warrant a finding that the motorman's negligence in failing to keep a proper lookout was the proximate cause of decedent's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 114.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 122*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden of proof of proving contributory negligence is on the defendant.

7. STREET RAILROADS (§ 81*)—RIGHTS IN STREET—OPERATION OF CARS.

Use of streets by the public is not subordinate to their use by a street car company; the company being required to operate its cars with due regard to the rights of individuals who are ordinarily not negligent in making a proper use of the street, though it be the part on which the railway is constructed.

9. STREET RAILROADS (§ 93*)—PERSONS CROSSING TRACK—INJURIES—INVITATION.

Where a street railway company provided a bench for waiting passengers, it thereby invited passengers to cross the street diagonally to take a car stopping on the opposite corner, and its servants were therefore required to keep a lookout for persons who accepted such invitation, and to regard the act of crossing as a signal to stop the car in order that they might take passage thereon.

10. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIANS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Decedent occupied a seat provided by defendant street railway company at a street corner for prospective passengers, and, on seeing the car approaching, started diagonally across the street intersection and crossed the track in front of the car to the point where it usually stopped to take on passengers. Decedent was unaware of the proximity of the car when he stepped in front of it and was struck and killed by the motorman's negligence in failing to keep a proper lookout. Held, that decedent was not negligent as a matter of law.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. L. Camp, Judge.

Action by Fannie Levyson and others against the San Antonio Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ogden, Brooks & Napier, for appellant. Terrell, Hopkins & Terrell, H. C. Carter, and Perry J. Lewis, for appellees.

NEILL, J. The appellees, who are the widow and children of Paul Levyson, deceased, sued the appellant for causing his death by negligently running one of its street cars over him. The negligence charged was: (1) In failing to sound the gong; (2) in failing to have the car equipped with a fender; (3) in failing to have the car under complete control, as required by city ordinances; (4) in failing to keep a lookout; and (5) in running the car at a greater rate of speed than allowed by city ordinances. The defendant, after interposing general and special exceptions to plaintiffs' petition, answered by a general denial, specially denied that it was guilty of any of the several acts of negligence alleged, and pleaded contributory negligence of the deceased in stepping immediately in front of the moving car, alleging that he, while waiting for and intending to board defendant's north-bound car, when he knew that it was coming, stepped immediately in front of the same, and that in so doing he was guilty of contributory negligence, which caused his death. The trial of the case resulted in a judgment for the appellees in the sum of $7,000.

As the first assignment complains of the court's refusing defendant's motion, upon the close of plaintiffs' testimony, to instruct a verdict in its favor; the second, of the refusal of a requested special instruction to the jury to return a verdict for defendant; the third, of the failure of the court to grant a new trial upon the ground that the undisputed evidence showed the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in going upon defendant's track immediately in front of a moving car; and the fifth, of its failure to grant a new trial upon the ground that the great preponderance of the evidence showed deceased was guilty of contributory negligence in going upon the track immediately in front of a moving car—the findings of fact will determine the merit of each of the four assignments mentioned, and they will all be disposed of in connection with our—

Conclusions of Fact.

About 2 o'clock in the afternoon of July 10, 1905, Paul Levyson, the husband of appellee, Fannie Levyson, and the father of the other appellees, was struck, knocked down, run over, and killed by one of appellant's electric street cars at the intersection of Guenther and South Alamo streets. At that time appellant maintained and operated an electric street car line which ran along South Alamo street, which is intersected and crossed by Guenther street. It then maintained two car tracks along said street extending south across Guenther street to a point near a bridge across San Antonio river, at which point one of the tracks is terminated by a switch which connects it with the other. The distance between the inner rails of these tracks where Guenther street is crossed is 4.9 feet, which continues south nearly to the point of their convergence. The cars going north ran on the track on the east side of the street, and those running south on the west side. The distance from the south side of Guenther street to the end of the switch which connects the two tracks is 114 feet. The length of the switch is 34.3 feet. The distance from the switch to the bridge is 64.7 feet, the entire distance from the south line of Guenther street to the bridge being 213 feet, and the bridge is nearly 100 feet long. The sidewalk on the east side of Guenther street is 6 feet wide, and the distance from its inner curb to the railway track is 28 feet; on its east side, the sidewalk is 7½ feet wide, and the distance from the curb is 35 feet. There was, and had been a long time prior to Levyson's death, a bench under a shade tree on the southwest corner of the intersection of the streets, used by persons waiting to take passage on defendant's cars, and a telephone pole just north of the bench. The custom of the defendant company was to stop its cars to let off and take on passengers after its car crosses a street. In accordance with this custom, its cars running north into the business part of the city would stop after crossing Guenther street at its northeast corner, and passengers waiting at the bench under the shade to take a north-bound car would have to cross over the street diagonally to that corner in order to get aboard. There was a clear view from the southwest corner of Guenther street of the street car track south to and across the bridge, and further, until it turns a corner; but such view does not extend from the bench, because obstructed by a fence, nor from the telephone pole, and the motorman on the north-bound car would have had a clear view of any one crossing the street diagonally, unless obstructed by a car on the other track.

The deceased, who resided not far from the point of intersection of the streets, when going to his place of business on defendant's cars, usually took passage at this place. On the day of his death, after eating his dinner, he started from his home to his place of business, intending to take one of defendant's cars running north at the intersection of Guenther and South Alamo streets. A few minutes afterwards he was seen by Mr. Guenther in a sitting posture, leaning against the telephone pole, talking to some one on the adjacent bench. A car going south had evidently just passed, though not observed by the witness, or, if it was, it had escaped his recollection when he testified upon the trial. The witness then saw him arise from where he was sitting and start diagonally across the street towards its northeast corner, where defendant's cars going north usually stopped to let off and take on passengers. The witness did not notice whether he walked or ran, but supposed he moved pretty fast, though he did not notice deceased all the time from when he saw him get up. His attention was called next to him by hearing a shriek, and then he saw the accident. He observed no change in the speed of the car before it struck Levyson, and he said that it must have been south of the spur when deceased started across. He had no recollection whether he heard the gong sounded or not. This witness saw the north-bound car stop after it struck Levyson.

Another witness, who visited the scene of the accident a few moments after it occurred, testified: "When I got down there, the body was under the car * * * kinder doubled up, with the wheels touching against a portion of the neck and head. The body was all doubled up like it had been rolled and mashed. * * * A man named Turner lives there on the corner, and the car was just a little south of his front gate, very near the corner. I noticed three blood marks on the ground, one distinctly visible about the middle of the street. The blood spot I observed particularly was right about the middle of Guenther street and in the middle of the east rail. And in the middle of the track near where this blood spot was, about two feet from it, it started. It was just like you had rolled something. The body lay somewhere north of the crossing, under the first or second truck of the car. I remember when the body was taken out. Yesterday morning * * * I stepped it off to see. I had been told I would be called as a witness in the case, and I stepped it off, and it was 17 full steps from the place in the middle of the street to the place where the body was. I remember pretty definitely where the body was."

Mr. Hildebrand, who was on the car when the collision occurred, testified: "As we approached the intersection of Guenther street on South Alamo street, and as the car came to where there was a switch, it kind of slowed up, and we passed the other car, and, after we passed the other car, why, the car made a jolt and stopped. The motorman stopped and got down and looked under the car. The jolt was like you would strike some rocks, or something like that. * * * At the time, the conductor was taking my fare from me. * * * Just before I felt the jolt the motorman looked back at the car that had just passed by. I felt the jolt just about the time I felt for the fare to pay the conductor. The motorman jumped down off the car and looked underneath, and I saw from his expression there was something wrong. * * * He had an expression that something had happened—turned pale, * * * so I could see from his countenance there was something wrong. The conductor was standing by me, and he and I jumped off about right together, and we saw the man under the car. * * * I don't believe I noticed any slackening in the movement of the car after it passed the other car. It was not going at a very fast speed after it passed the other car. It was a little slower than the usual speed because we had just passed the other car, and it hadn't got under good headway. We passed the south-bound car this side of where the switch is, * * * and I suppose it was on the main line at the time we hit the man. * * * I am sure we had passed the south-bound car entirely, that is, the two cars were clear of each other. At the time I felt the jolt I don't know in which direction the motorman was looking. It was before the jolt came that I saw him looking to the rear, towards the car that had passed. It was just an instant before the jolt came. I didn't feel the application of the brakes, or sudden stopping of the car, just before feeling the jolt; but after the jolt I did. I think he put on the brakes right then. I think he must have put on the brakes just after the jolt. I felt the application of the brake after the jolt. The man was under the right-hand side of the car going north, * * * under the first wheels. It would be a hard matter for me to tell whereabouts on Guenther street I got off the car with relation to the south or north boundary line of the street. * * * I didn't notice the bench at that time, but saw it there afterwards. The bench is on the corner right across, at the southwest corner of Guenther and South Alamo streets. * * * The car that we passed would be between the car I was on and that bench. The car passed on the west track, and we were on the east track, the bench being on the west side of the street, so the south-bound car that we passed would be between me and the bench."

Mrs. Hildebrand, who was also a passenger on the car, testified: "I was a passenger on a car on South Alamo street, coming from the Aransas Pass depot on July 10, 1905, at the time Mr. Paul Levyson was run over by a car on Guenther and South Alamo streets. The first thing that attracted my attention to the happening of an accident was the sudden jolt of the car. I knew something had happened, and watched the motorman's countenance to see if it was serious, and I heard him say, 'There must be clods of dirt under the track.' This was almost instantly after I felt the jolting, because he stopped the car. Just an instant, or a very short time prior to feeling that jolt, I noticed that the motorman was looking back, but not at that time. It was not long before I felt the jolting that I saw him look back, just a few seconds before. * * * He was making no effort to stop the car at the time he was looking back. The motorman commenced stopping the car as soon as he felt that he was running over somebody or something. I never observed any effort to stop the car before the jolting."

Neither conductor nor motorman in charge of and operating the car was called as a witness by either party, nor testified in the case, and, as the testimony recited is practically all the evidence introduced, the issues of fact, which must control the disposition of the four assignments of error, must largely be determined from deductions drawn from the testimony introduced and the failure of the defendant to introduce witnesses at its command who were evidently familiar with the facts and circumstances which elucidate and make clear such issues of fact. In determining these issues, we shall view the evidence in the light most favorable to the findings of the jury manifested by their verdict.

The two first assignments of error involve one or both of these propositions: (1) That it appears from the undisputed evidence, as a matter of law, that defendant was free from any of the acts of negligence alleged by plaintiffs as their cause of action. (2) That it appears as a matter of law from the evidence that deceased was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to his death. The third and the last assignment referred to also involve, with a slight modification of it as to the latter, the second proposition.

The question of negligence vel non is primarily a question of fact to be determined by the jury, and only becomes one of law to be decided by the court when the facts are undisputed and only one conclusion can be drawn from them. "It is only where it is so clearly established from the undisputed testimony as to admit of no other reasonable hypothesis or conclusion, that either a fact essential to plaintiff's cause of action is not proven, or one which is a complete defense has been shown, that it becomes the duty of the court to instruct a verdict for the defendant." Southern Pac. Co. v. Winton, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 503, 66 S. W. 477; Lee v. I. & G. N. Ry., 89 Tex. 583, 36 S. W. 63; Choate v. S. A. & A. P. Ry., 90 Tex. 83, 36 S. W. 247, 87 S. W. 819; Bonn v. G., H. & S. A. Ry. (Tex. Civ. App.) 82 S. W. 808; Johnson v.

Tex. Cent. Ry. (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 433; Anson v. Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 94; Reynolds v. G., H. & S. A. Ry. (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 596; G. H. & S. A. Ry. v. Patillo (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 498; Herring v. G., H. & S. A. Ry. (Tex. Civ. App.) 108 S. W. 977; St. L. & S. F. Ry. v. Summers (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 213. In view of this well-settled principle of law, we will examine the testimony recited in order to determine whether either of the propositions involved can be established.

1. Is the evidence such that the only conclusion that can be drawn from it by reasonable minds is that none of the acts of negligence charged by plaintiffs as the cause of Levyson's death was proved?

As is seen from our statement of the pleadings, among the acts of negligence averred by plaintiff is that the motorman operating the car failed to exercise ordinary care in keeping a lookout for people upon and at the intersection of the streets where the accident occurred. As to this averment, we think the conclusions can reasonably be deduced from the testimony of the witnesses Hildebrand that the motorman failed to exercise such ordinary care, and, from the facts and circumstances in evidence, that such failure on the part of the motorman was negligence, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of deceased's death, and we so conclude as matters of fact. As this was the only one of the grounds of negligence alleged by plaintiffs submitted by the court to the jury, we need not pursue the question further; but, were we required to go beyond the conclusion announced, we would be strongly inclined to hold that the evidence of other acts of negligence charged is not such as precludes reasonable minds from the conclusion that some of them, at least, were shown.

2. Was the deceased guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law?

The burden of proving the defense of contributory negligence is upon the defendant, and upon such an issue, if there is from the evidence room for a reasonable difference of opinion, as upon other issues, the judgment of the jury must be taken. Drake v. S. A. & A. P. Ry., 90 Tex. 240, 89 S. W. 407. If it be conceded, as appellant contends, that deceased stepped immediately in front of a moving car, it does not necessarily follow that he was guilty of negligence per se. This depends upon the attending facts and circumstances. It has been held even in a case where one stepped on a railway track immediately in front of a string of moving railway cars and was killed by being run over, that the jury were warranted in finding he was not guilty of contributory negligence in view of the facts and circumstances. G., H. & S. A. Ry. v. Conuteson (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 188. The cases of Texarkana & Ft. S. Ry. v.

Frugia (Tex. Civ. App.) 95 S. W. 565, and St. L. & S. F. Ry. v. Summers (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 211, are of like import. The law upon a question of this character is much more favorable to one who goes upon a street railway track in front of a moving car than it is to one who steps in front of a steam engine. In the former case the rights and duties of the parties are reciprocal. In the latter the right of the railroad to the use of its track is ex necessitate superior to the individual, and, if he interferes with this right by going on a railway track in front of a moving train, he ordinarily becomes a trespasser and guilty of negligence as a matter of law. A street railway, as its very name imports, is ordinarily constructed and maintained in streets of cities which are intended for and used by the general public, and this use by the public of the streets is not subordinate to the use of a street car company to run its cars along it. In the exercise of the right to run its cars along a public street, the company must regard the rights of the public in its use and operate them with due regard to the right of individuals. Ordinarily, a member of the public will not be guilty of negligence when he is in the legitimate exercise of the use of a public street, even though it be that part upon which a street railway is constructed over which the company propels its cars. As it necessarily takes on and discharges its passengers in the streets over which it runs its cars, it is its duty to especially exercise ordinary care to prevent injuring those who are on the street and crossing its track for the purpose of taking passage.

As is seen from the evidence recited, Levyson left his home after dinner for the purpose of taking passage upon defendant's north-bound car in order to return to his place of business. The car not having reached the junction of South Alamo and Guenther streets, where it generally stopped for the purpose of taking on and discharging passengers, when deceased arrived there, he seated himself by the telephone pole, near the bench where passengers intending to take the car usually awaited its arrival. When he arose from his seat, it may be fairly presumed, from the evidence and circumstances, that he knew, or had reason to believe, from having seen the south-bound car pass that point, that it would be but a short time before the car he desired to take would reach the northeast corner of the street, where it would be expected to stop for the purpose of taking him on as a passenger, and, as he went diagonally across the street towards such corner, that it was for the purpose of boarding the car when it arrived there, and that he reasonably thought he had time to reach that point before the arrival of the north-bound car. He also had the right to presume, and act upon the presumption, that the car would slow down at the street crossing, and that its operators would see him in the street and give him timely notice of its approach, and that they would not so run the car as to injure him while in the exercise of his right in crossing the street, from the place the company had provided for waiting passengers to the point where it usually stopped the cars to take on those who intended to take passage north. Indeed, in view of the facts that the company had prepared a place at the southwest corner of the street for passengers to wait for its cars, and that it stopped its north-bound cars at the northeast corner, may be taken as an invitation to those waiting at the bench for the cars to go across from the southwest to the northeast corner, and as an obligation on the part of its servants operating the car to keep a lookout for persons who had accepted such invitation, and to regard the act of the crossing from one corner to the other as a signal to stop the car in order that they might take passage thereon. Evidently, the deceased was acting on these assumptions, and thrown off his guard, when he stepped upon the railway track and was knocked down and run over by the car; and for this reason, as well as the car's coming up from behind him, he was unaware of its proximity when he stepped in front of it, for, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed that the deceased, when he started across the street, had reason to believe that he could reach its northeast corner before the arrival of the car, and, when he stepped upon the track, that he had time to cross it in safety. It must be presumed that he did not knowingly place himself in the position where death was inevitable, and that he exercised ordinary care and prudence to insure his safety. As is said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Railway v. Landrigan, 191 U. S. 462, 24 Sup. Ct. 140, 48 L. Ed. 262: "We know of no more universal instinct than that of self-preservation—none that so insistently urges to care against injury. It has its motives to exercise in the fear of pain, maiming, and death." See, also, Railway v. Frugia (Tex. Civ. App.) 95 S. W. 566; San Antonio Traction Co. v. Upson, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 50, 71 S. W. 565; San Antonio Traction Co. v. Kumpf (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 863; San Antonio St. Ry. v. Renken (Tex. Civ. App.) 38 S. W. 829; Dallas St. Ry. Co. v. Illo, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 290, 73 S. W. 1076; San Antonio Traction Co. v. Haines (Tex. Civ. App.) 100 S. W. 788; Copeland v. Met. St. Ry. (Sup.) 73 N. Y. Supp. 856; Id., 79 N. Y. Supp. 1054.

We therefore conclude that deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; but that the question was one for the jury to determine, and the evidence warranted their conclusion that he was not guilty of such negligence. From this it follows that the verdict upon this issue is not manifestly against the preponderance of the evidence.

Conclusions of Law.

1. Our conclusions of fact, as is seen from them, dispose of appellant's first, second, third, and fifth assignments of error.

2. The fourth assignment of error complains of the second paragraph of the court's charge, which is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that on the 10th day of July, 1905, the deceased, Paul Levyson, was run over and killed by one of defendant's cars at or near the intersection of Guenther and South Alamo streets, and you further find that the motorman operating said car failed to keep a lookout for said deceased on or along said defendant's track at said time and place, and that such failure, if any, was negligence, and that such negligence, if any, was the direct cause of deceased's death, and you further find that said Paul Levyson was not guilty of any negligence that either caused or contributed to his death, and you further find that said plaintiffs have sustained pecuniary damage in the death of the deceased, Paul Levyson, then you will find your verdict for said plaintiffs." To this part of the charge it is objected: (1) That the law does not impose upon the operators of a street car the duty of keeping a lookout for any particular person, but merely imposes the duty to exercise ordinary care to keep a lookout for persons that may come or be upon its track; (2) That there was no evidence that the deceased was walking along the track, and the charge was misleading in submitting that issue. If, as is conceded by appellant in its first proposition under this assignment, the law imposes upon the operator of a street car the duty to exercise ordinary care to keep a lookout for persons on the track, it follows that it was the motorman's duty, upon the occasion under consideration to exercise such care to keep a lookout for any person on the track which would include the deceased. The charge does not bear the construction contended for by the second objection.

3. Our conclusions of fact dispose of the sixth assignment of error adversely to appellant.

There is no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

SAN ANTONIO LIGHT PUB. CO. v. LEWY.†
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 20, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. PLEADING (§ 67*)—PETITION—ANTICIPATING DEFENSES.

It is not necessary for plaintiff to anticipate and avoid in his petition defenses to his action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 139; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 83*)—PLEADING—PETITION—MALICE—NECESSITY OF ALLEGATION.

Though malice may be inferred from other matters pleaded, the rules of pleading require a special allegation of malice in actions of libel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 198; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 89*)—PLEADING—PETITION—SPECIAL DAMAGE—NECESSITY OF ALLEGING.

Damages which are necessarily pecuniary follow a libelous publication as a matter of law, and, if a publication in a newspaper tends to injure plaintiff's reputation and expose her to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule or impair her honesty, it is unnecessary to allege in the petition financial injury therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 213; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 89*)—PLEADING—PETITION—DAMAGE—INJURY TO REPUTATION.

In libel for publishing a newspaper article charging that plaintiff imported goods without paying custom duties thereon, it was unnecessary to allege that the publication tended to expose plaintiff to public hatred, etc., and to cause her to be suspected of smuggling, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 213; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

5. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 86*)—PLEADING—INUENDOES—PROPRIETY.

A defendant in libel is not prejudiced by innuendoes contained in the petition, since he can either deny using the words or using them with the meaning alleged, or he may admit the one and deny the other, or may admit and prove the truth of either, and plaintiff may prove his innuendo, or, on failure to do so, may seek to establish liability from the words themselves, when the innuendo may be rejected as surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 208; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

6. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 89*)—PLEADING—PETITION—ALLEGATIONS OF SUFFERING—NECESSITY.

In libel for charging plaintiff with smuggling, it was unnecessary to aver the nature, character, or extent of the mental suffering caused by the publication, or even the suffering therefrom, it being sufficient to aver the damages sustained thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 213; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

7. PLEADING (§ 8*)—PETITION—INTENT—CONCLUSIONS.

In libel, allegations that defendant published the libelous article recklessly and willfully, without proper investigation of its truth, were not objectionable as stating a conclusion of the pleader, since to have stated the facts showing the intent in making the publication would have been to plead the evidence of such willfulness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

8. PLEADING (§ 11*)—ALLEGATIONS—EVIDENCE—PROPRIETY.

The evidence upon which a party relies to prove his allegations should not be pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO CASE.

In defining libel, the definition should be limited to the character of the libel shown by the evidence, and, in libel for injury to the reputation, it was error to include financial injury as one of the results of the publication; such injury not being alleged or proved.

10. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE.

The error of including financial injury as one of the results of the publication, in an instruction defining libel in an action for injury to the reputation alone, was harmless, where the court only submitted such matters contained in its definition of libel as were pleaded and proved, and instructed that in estimating plaintiff's damages they should not consider any financial injury suffered by her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705, 715; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 192*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF FACT.

Where the undisputed evidence showed that the alleged libelous article was published by defendant as alleged, and its publication was not denied, the court could assume in its charge that defendant published the article.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 432; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

12. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 100*)—ACTIONS—ANSWER—TRUTH—NECESSITY OF ALLEGATION.

The truth of the publication in libel must be pleaded by defendant to be available; Act 1901, p. 30, c. 26, making the truth of the statement a defense to libel, not having affected the rule requiring such defense to be specially pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 249½; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

13. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

Defendant, not having put in issue the truth of the alleged libelous matter, cannot complain that the court did not instruct upon the truth of the publication as a defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 587; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

14. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 54*)—ACTIONS—DEFENSES—TRUTH.

The truth of the defamatory matter is a complete defense in libel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 152; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

15. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 124*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—INJURY FROM DEFAMATION—"GOOD NAME."

A charge in libel that if the article published was calculated to impeach plaintiff's good name, etc., used the word "good name" as equivalent to reputation, in which sense the words have always been used.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

16. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 124*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES—RECOVERY FOR FINANCIAL LOSS.

In libel an instruction to award plaintiff, upon finding for her, such compensatory damages as would ordinarily and probably result from the publication, and in estimating her damages to consider her mental suffering, if any, caused by the publication, did not authorize a recovery for financial loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

17. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 119*)—ACTIONS—DAMAGES—MENTAL SUFFERING.

In libel for charging plaintiff with smuggling, upon a finding for plaintiff, she should be awarded such compensatory damages as would ordinarily and probably result from the publication, and, in estimating the damages, the jury might consider any mental suffering caused by the publication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

18. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 120*)—ACTIONS—DAMAGES—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

In such case exemplary damages are not recoverable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 350, 351; Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

19. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 48*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION—MATTERS OF PUBLIC INTEREST.

Acts 1901, p. 30, c. 26, § 3, subd. 4, making privileged a reasonable and fair criticism of official acts of public officials and all other matters of public concern, relates solely to criticism of official acts and matters of public concern, and the existence of probable cause for making the comment is immaterial, as the criticism is not privileged if libelous, unless it is shown to be fair and reasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

20. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 124*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTION—PROBABLE CAUSE.

In libel for charging plaintiff with smuggling, the publication commenting upon the acts of the officers in discovering the goods as well as upon plaintiff's conduct, an instruction that if any of the statements were libelous, but were made by defendant upon probable cause and for general information, the finding should be for defendant, was properly refused, since it would permit a finding for defendant even though there was probable cause for the comments upon the officers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

21. EVIDENCE (§ 34*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The state courts take judicial notice of the laws of the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 49, 50; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

22. TRIAL (§ 33*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—SCOPE OF PROOF.

Since state courts take judicial notice of the laws of the United States, the testimony of federal officers, such as revenue agents, is not admissible to prove such laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

23. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 103*)—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In libel for charging plaintiff with smuggling, testimony by a revenue officer as to the authority of custom agents to enter one's house and seize property without warrant, upon probable cause for suspecting that the goods were smuggled, was irrelevant even if such officer had the authority stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

24. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 48*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—COMMENT ON PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Where an alleged libelous article did not comment on the acts of custom officers in seizing smuggled property, but charged that plaintiff was guilty of smuggling, and possibly of bribing the custom officers, the publication was not privileged as to plaintiff on the ground that it was a fair comment on official acts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

25. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 51*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—EXISTENCE OF MALICE.

Actual malice on the part of a publisher of a libelous article prevents it from being privileged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

26. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 48*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—MATTERS OF PUBLIC CONCERN—COMMENT.

Though official proceedings are matters of public concern, unless newspaper comments thereon are fair and impartial they are not privileged, and, if such comments are untrue, the fact that such proceedings were matters of public concern would not render the comments privileged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

27. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 56*)—JUSTIFICATION AND MITIGATION—PROBABLE CAUSE.

Though the existence of probable cause for believing matters contained in a libelous article to be true may mitigate the damage, it will not justify the publication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 153; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

28. TRIAL (§ 251*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

In libel for charging plaintiff with smuggling, the truth of the alleged libelous charge not having been pleaded, a charge submitting whether plaintiff was guilty of the offense of smuggling was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 587; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

29. TRIAL (§ 261*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

In libel for charging plaintiff with smuggling, an instruction submitting the question whether plaintiff was guilty of smuggling was properly refused where it omitted an essential element of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 660, 671, 675; Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

30. CUSTOMS DUTIES (§ 125*)—VIOLATION OF CUSTOM LAWS—"SMUGGLING"—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

To constitute the offense of smuggling, there must be a secret introduction of dutiable goods with intent to defraud the government.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs Duties, Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6535.]

31. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 124*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

In libel, where the trial court did not submit an instruction as to the effect of the existence of probable cause for the publication of the libelous article, an instruction that, in determining the existence of probable cause as to any issue in which the existence of probable cause was submitted, the jury could inquire whether plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged in the article, was properly refused, there being nothing to which it could apply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

32. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 882*)—RIGHT TO REVIEW—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR—INVITED ERROR.

A party may not commit error prejudicial to himself and obtain a reversal because the trial court refused a charge to correct such error; and hence in libel, for charging the offense of smuggling, where defendant introduced in evidence the judgment of the federal court in proceedings to forfeit the goods, he cannot complain of a refusal to instruct that such judgment should have no influence on the issues.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3602; Dec. Dig. § 882.*]

33. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

In libel, where trial court charged the issue of privilege in the language of the statute, which clearly defines and enumerates the matter made privileged thereby, a charge that defendant was not required to prove its defense of privilege literally, but only substantially, was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

34. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 7*)—WORDS ACTIONABLE—WORDS IMPUTING CRIME—SMUGGLING.

An article which in effect charged plaintiff with smuggling goods into the country without paying the custom duties thereon was libelous, there being nothing in the article limiting or qualifying its meaning.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 67; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

35. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

A requested charge, given in substance in the main charge, is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

36. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 106*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In libel, where the undisputed evidence showed that defendant published the article in its paper, a copy of the paper containing the alleged libelous article was properly admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 298; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

37. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIONS—CONVERSATIONS WITH OTHERS.

A question which sought to elicit the witness' conclusion from a conversation had with plaintiff was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2153; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

38. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 103*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—RELEVANCY.

In libel for charging that plaintiff imported goods without paying the custom duties thereon, even if the report of the government officers who investigated the case was an official proceeding so as to justify comment thereon, the report not being commented on in the alleged libelous article, it was irrelevant and inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

39. EVIDENCE (§ 318*)—HEARSAY—ADMISSIBILITY.

In libel for charging plaintiff with smuggling, the report of the government officer who investigated the case was inadmissible as evidence of the facts stated therein, being hearsay.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; Arthur W. Seeligson, Judge.

Action by Dora C. Lewy against the San Antonio Light Publishing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Nat B. Jones and Marcus W. Davis, for appellant. John Sehorn and R. U. Culberson, for appellee.

NEILL, J. This suit was brought by the appellee against appellant to recover damages alleged to have accrued to her from the publication in a newspaper of the libelous article concerning plaintiff, hereinafter copied in our conclusions of fact. Plaintiff's petition copies the alleged libelous publication, and avers in the usual form all the essential facts necessary to constitute a cause of action for the publication in a newspaper of a libel against the defendant. The appellant answered by general and special exceptions to plaintiff's petition, a general denial, and specially pleaded that the alleged libelous article, if published, was in good faith and in the honest belief that it was a true, fair, and impartial account of the official proceedings of the United States, through its officers of law, in an attempt to collect lawful duty and revenue upon the goods imported and brought into this country by the appellee, which proceedings were authorized by law and had under color and by virtue of their official position; that there were just and reasonable grounds and probable cause for believing that the alleged article was a fair, true, and impartial account of said official proceedings, and that the publication was made only after due and sufficient inquiry as to the matters mentioned in the article and of the acts of the officers engaged in an investigation and prosecution concerning the importation of the goods therein mentioned; and that the article and matters complained of were reasonable and fair comments upon a matter of public concern, and were published by it for general information. The trial of the case resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for $2,500.

Conclusions of Fact.

The undisputed evidence shows that the defendant, on the 11th day of February, 1906, was engaged in the publication of a newspaper in the city of San Antonio, Tex., called the San Antonio Sunday Light, and that on said day the defendant maliciously published and distributed in the city of San Antonio, Tex., an issue of said newspaper containing the following libelous article of and concerning the plaintiff:

"Smuggled Goods are Seized by the Customs Officers.

Nearly Two Thousand Dollars Worth of Bric-a-brac Confiscated.

"Goods Came from Europe.

"Seized Merchandise Said to have been Smuggled Through Port of Galveston and an Investigation will be Made.

"Several Official Heads may Fall.

"What has proved the largest seizure of smuggled goods that has occurred in San Antonio in fifteen years, involving the identity of one of the best known ladies of this city, came to light yesterday when Customs Inspector C. M. Ferguson disclosed $1,870 worth of miscellaneous bric-a-brac, in his office, confiscated from Mrs. Dora C. Lewy, widow of the late Augustus Lewy. It is claimed that the seized merchandise was smuggled through the port of Galveston, either with or without the knowledge of the Galveston authorities. As a result of the disclosure the Galveston customs service is greatly agitated, and several official heads will probably fall.

"Hand painted china and glassware, $1,392; oriental and Turkish rugs, $342; hand-made laces, $200; making a grand total of $1,870 worth of European and Eastern bric-a-brac, comprise the list of goods now in the possession of the United States custom house authorities at this port. These articles were seized by the officers nearly seven days ago, since which time they have been traced from practically their purchasing point to the places where they were at last discovered.

"This seizure is the largest haul of smuggled goods that has been made in San Antonio in fifteen years. The last great haul was that of smuggled opals that were seized here, after they had passed the customs inspectors at the port of Brownsville on the Rio Grande. It was cleverly worked up by the officers, and its history involves quite a bit of detail.

"Several years ago Customs Inspector C. M. Ferguson suspected that smuggled goods of the nature just seized were brought into this city and sold to local merchants and private purchasers. While he had his suspicions, no tangible evidence was discovered and nothing definite was done. He determined to keep a watch, however, believing that if his suspicions were well founded his watchfulness would bear fruit in due season.

"Advertisement Read.

"Early in January of the current year Mr. Ferguson read an advertisement in a local paper saying that fine hand-painted China was for sale by a certain party in the city, who also had established a studio where reproductions of the work would be taught. Believing he knew who the lady was who had thus inserted the advertisement, and not wishing to excite undue suspicion, Mr. Ferguson called in the assistance of Special Treasury Agent H. C. Smith, to help in the work of finding out whether the advertised goods were smuggled or not.

"In a Commerce Street jewelry store window the officers observed some of the china-ware displayed for sale, to which was attached a card that more of the same character of goods might be seen in a certain studio in the Riverside Building. To the Riverside Building the officers wended their way, and into the studio Mr. Smith ushered himself.

"Did he wish to see the goods?" inquired the lady in charge, very politely.

"To be sure, madam, my wife is quite an artist herself, and this afternoon I shall bring her here to see if she would not like to make a few purchases."

"It happened that Special Agent Smith had his wife with him while in the city, and, by pre-arrangement, she accompanied her husband to the studio the following day to make a thorough examination of the imported merchandise. Representing themselves as tourists from the north, the pair presented themselves at the studio.

"This display is perfectly exquisite," exclaimed Mrs. Smith to the owner of the property. "You have these plates marked at from $25 to $35 apiece. They are well worth that amount. If I had them back home I could easily get from $75 to $100 apiece for them. Those rugs which you price to me at $150 I could sell for $300 in my native city."

"Suppose we buy the entire lot, take them back home and sell them again," interposed Mr. Smith to his wife.

"How perfectly lovely!" cried Mrs. Smith enraptured.

"Investigation Commenced.

"A price for the entire lot was accordingly fixed, and arrangements were perfected whereby the husband was to return on the morrow to make a payment and take his purchase. This delay was merely a play for time, in order that every step about to be taken might be certain, sure and legal. Mr. Smith was in daily consultation with Mr. Ferguson during the procedure, in addition to which other government authorities were at work along other lines. Telephonic communication was had with Galveston, Baltimore, Washington City, Chicago, and several European points. It was discovered, in the course of the investigation, that Mrs. Dora C. Lewy, widow of Augustus Lewy, prominently known in San Antonio, left the port of Galveston on the steamer Frankfort on the afternoon of June 8, 1905. When she left Galveston, it was ascertained, she had three pieces of baggage; when she returned she carried eight pieces.

"It was further learned that Mrs. Lewy had three daughters who had either finished, or were completing, their art education in Germany, and that it had been her custom for several years to make trips to that country. Mr. Ferguson further learned that Mrs. Lewy had been accustomed to bringing back with her from these European journeys much valuable bric-a-brac of the European and oriental type.

"Two and two were put together, and, apparently, the result was four.

"Astonishing Revelation.

"Well, I am here to get the goods," announced Mr. Smith on the appointed day, to the lady owner of the bric-a-brac; "but before I hand you the money I would like to have the customs house receipts for them. A mere matter of business, you know."

"Why, the receipts are unnecessary," replied the lady. "Just take the goods along with you, and the receipts will be all right."

"But the receipts; I must have the receipts. I could never think of taking this stuff back north unless I had the proper customs house papers," declared the prospective purchaser.

"Well, to tell you the truth, I have no receipts. The customs inspectors passed the articles through the port of Galveston free of duty."

"Then, madam, I must seize these goods and convey them to the office of the local customs officer, Mr. C. M. Ferguson. I am a special agent of the government, and there are men below with a dray ready to come after them."

"Oh, my goodness!" exclaimed the lady. "What have I done?"

"Nothing, madam, except these goods must be confiscated by the government, and an explanation made how they were brought through the Galveston customs house without any tribute being levied against them," replied Mr. Smith very deliberately.

"Goods Seized.

"Forthwith the outfit was carted to the Federal Building where an appraisal was made as to their value. There the goods will stay until further disposition of them is made by the Federal authorities. By her own confession, Mrs. Lewy, for it was not other than she who brought them with her across the water, has surrendered her ownership of the rugs, laces and china to the United States government.

"Our duty as customs officers ceases when we have seized goods and made out our case," said Customs Inspector Ferguson last night. "Mrs. Lewy has acted perfectly fair about this matter through the entire investigation has helped us recover the goods she had already sold, and I have no mind to make further prosecution. If criminal action is taken against the lady it will have to be taken by the United States District Attorney, and the Treasurer at Washington City. I have performed my duty in apprehending smuggled merchandise, have seized the goods, and proved that the goods thus seized were smuggled. That completes my action in the premises."

"Responsibility Fixed.

"An investigation is now being made concerning the identity of the particular inspector who made the final examination of the merchandise at the time Mrs. Lewy entered Texas through the port of Galveston. The idea of bribery is indignantly spurned by the principals involved, and it is presumed that the investigation will result in the discharge of the inspector who 'grossly neglected' his duty in not making a closer and more thorough examination of the imported bric-a-brac.

"The Galveston customs service is greatly agitated over the disclosure and it is not unlikely that several heads will fall by reason of the vigilance and merciless activity manifested by the San Antonio customs inspector."

Copies of said paper, containing said libelous publication, were sold, distributed, and put in the hands of a number of citizens of the city of San Antonio, and the libelous article therein published was read by them.

The evidence is reasonably sufficient to show that the article so published by the defendant, taken as a whole, tended to impeach the honesty, integrity, and good name of the plaintiff, and that the same, or at least part thereof, constituted a libel as against the plaintiff, it not being a fair, true, and impartial account of any official proceedings authorized by law in the administration of the law, nor a reasonable and fair comment or criticism of the official acts of public officials, or of other matters of public concern published for general information. That by reason of defendant's publishing and distributing said libelous article the plaintiff was damaged in the amount found by the jury.

Conclusions of Law.

1. The plaintiff's petition was not obnoxious to the general demurrer. It alleges the essential ingredients of a libel as defined by statute, and embraces word for word the newspaper report alleged to be libelous. It is not necessary for the pleader to anticipate and avoid that which, if pleaded and proved, would defeat the plaintiff's action. Townes on Pleading, 272.

2. That portion of the petition assailed by defendant's special exception, referred to in the second assignment of error, is such as has been used for ages to charge malice in declarations of slander and libel, and has always been taken as an allegation of fact rather than as a conclusion of the pleader. Though the fact of malice may be inferred or deduced from other matters pleaded, the rules of good pleading require a specific allegation, in appropriate language, of such fact; and that employed in the petition is so generally used in alleging malice in actions of this character that it may be regarded as stereotyped.

3. What is said in disposing of the second assignment, likewise disposes of the first proposition under the third, which simply repeats the objection to the same part of the petition. In regard to the second proposition, it is enough to say that it was not essential to aver that the alleged libelous publication exposed, or tended to expose, the plaintiff to financial injury. Damages, which are necessarily pecuniary, follow, as a matter of law, unprivileged libelous utterances.

If the publication tended to injure plaintiff's reputation and thereby expose her to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to impeach her honesty, integrity, or reputation, unless it was privileged, as alleged in the petition, it was no more necessary to aver that it tended to her financial injury than to allege that it tended to impeach her virtue. For it is not necessary to aver all the injurious or pernicious tendencies enumerated in the statute of a publication in order to state a cause of action. A newspaper report which has any of such injurious or pernicious tendencies is actionable.

4. Nor was it essential for the plaintiff to charge in her petition "that said publication tended to expose her to, or that it did expose her to, public hatred, contempt, and disgrace among her neighbors and all good citizens of this state, and cause it to be suspected and believed by those neighbors and citizens that she had been guilty of the crime of smuggling and bribery of the customs officers of the United States," as is contended by appellant in the fourth assignment of error. This is too obvious to admit of discussion.

5. This assignment of error complains of the court's overruling defendant's special exception to a certain innuendo following the third paragraph of plaintiff's petition. In disposing of this assignment we deem it only necessary to make this quotation: "The defendant is in no way embarrassed by the presence of the innuendo in the statement of the claim; in fact, it is to him an advantage. He can either deny that he spoke the words, or he can admit that he spoke them, but deny that they conveyed that meaning. He can also plead that the words were true, either with or without the alleged meaning. It will then be for the jury to say from the proofs whether the plaintiff's innuendo is sustained. If not, the plaintiff may fall back upon the words themselves, and urge that, taken in their natural and obvious signification, they are actionable in themselves without the alleged meaning, and that therefore his unproved innuendo may be rejected as surplusage." Newell on Slander & Libel, p. 628, § 38. See, also, Odgers on Libel & Slander, 101; Townshend on Slander & Libel, § 336.

6. The principle of law quoted in disposing of the fifth assignment is alike applicable to the sixth, and demonstrates the correctness of the court's ruling upon the exception to plaintiff's petition which is complained of.

7. It was not necessary to aver the nature, character, nor extent of the mental suffering caused her by the publication of the libelous article. It would baffle the powers of the most skilled anatomist to describe or measure one's mental suffering. He may "minister to a mind diseased," but an accurate description or measurement of mental suffering is "past all surgery." Indeed, it was not at all necessary for the plaintiff to allege that she suffered any agony on account of the libelous publication. It was enough for her to aver the damages she sustained by reason thereof, for upon the mere proof of the libel the jury could give such substantial damages as would compensate her for the defamation.

8. The allegation, "The defendant published and caused to be published of and concerning plaintiff the aforesaid libelous article recklessly and willfully, without having made any proper and sufficient investigation of the truth of the charges contained," is not obnoxious to the objection urged by exception to the petition that it "states the mere opinion and conclusion of the pleader, and does not charge or aver any facts showing that the article was recklessly and willfully made and published." To have stated the facts showing the animus of the defendant in making the publication would have been to allege the evidence by which the fact, that the defendant published the article recklessly and willfully, could be proved. The rules of pleading do not require, but condemn, pleading the evidence which a party relies upon to prove his allegations.

9. The court in its charge defined a libel as follows: "A libel is a defamation expressed in printing, tending to injure the reputation of one who is alive and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or financial injury, or to impeach the honesty, integrity, or reputation of any one." The objection assigned to it is that it "was calculated to, and did, lead the jury to believe that plaintiff had suffered financial injury, when * * * no such issue was before the jury, in that there was no sufficient pleading and proof to establish such an issue." The proposition advanced is: "The court, in defining libel, should have limited the definition to the character of the libel made by the case on trial, and not include therein an element of damage, positively excluded by the special charge of appellant, given by the court." Abstractly speaking, it was improper to include in the definition of libel a matter neither alleged nor proved; and, if such inclusion could have prejudiced the defendant, it might afford reasonable ground of complaint. But, as the third paragraph of the court's charge only submitted to the finding of the jury such matters contained in its definition of libel as were pleaded and proved, and the court having, at appellant's request, instructed the jury that "in estimating plaintiff's damages, if any, they should not consider any financial injury suffered by her," we cannot perceive how it was possible for the defendant to have been prejudiced by the definition of libel contained in the charge. For it is clear that, if the jury regarded the evidence and special charge referred to, financial injury to plaintiff did not enter into the verdict, and was necessarily excluded therefrom.

10. The subject of this assignment is the second paragraph of the charge, which is as follows: "If you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the article complained of by plaintiff in her petition and set forth therein, and as published by the defendant, is libelous, as above defined; or if you believe from the evidence that certain parts of said article are susceptible of the meaning or innuendoes placed thereon by the plaintiff and as set out in her petition, and that such innuendoes are legitimate inferences from the words composing such parts of said article, and that such parts of said article with the innuendoes set out by the plaintiff in her petition are libelous; and if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff is the person referred to in said article, or in the innuendoes placed thereon to certain parts of said article by plaintiff—then you are instructed to return a verdict for the plaintiff, unless you find for the defendant under instructions hereafter given you." The objections urged are: (1) That it assumes the alleged libelous article was published by the defendant, is upon the weight of the evidence, and gives undue prominence to claim of plaintiff that the article is libelous. (2) That in again referring to the definition of libel, before given in the charge, it induced the jury to believe the plaintiff was entitled to recover for financial injury, though the court had directed the jury that such an issue was not before them. In answer to the first objection it is sufficient to say that the undisputed testimony shows the alleged libelous article was published, as alleged by plaintiff, in the San Antonio Sunday Light on February 11, 1906, and that the San Antonio Light Publishing Company owned and published said paper at that time. This evidence being undisputed, the court had the right to assume as a fact that the article was published by the defendant, the evidence raising no issue as to such fact. What we have said in disposing of the ninth assignment of error is applicable to the second objection, and requires that it be overruled.

11. This assignment complains of the third paragraph of the charge, which is as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence that the article published in the defendant's newspaper of date February 11, 1906, was calculated to expose the plaintiff to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to impeach the honesty, integrity, and good name of the plaintiff, then you will return a verdict for the plaintiff, regardless of whether you believe said article was true or false. But the defense of privilege, when made out, is a perfect defense to an action for libel; so that if in this case you believe that the government, through its officers, was engaged in an official proceeding for the purpose of forfeiting the goods brought into this country by the plaintiff for nonpayment of duty, and the defendant, through its servants, was informed of such proceeding and published the article complained of, and that the said article is a true, fair, and impartial account of such official proceeding, then you will find for the defendant."

The objection that it unduly emphasizes an issue, and is upon the weight of the evidence, was considered and disposed of in passing upon the two last preceding assignments.

The other, covered by the proposition—"The truthfulness of a publication is a perfect defense to a libel suit"—has no application to the case, as it is presented by the record. While the truth of the matter published is, and has always been, a complete defense to an action of libel, yet it must be pleaded by the defendant in order for it to be available. Cranfill v. Hayden, 97 Tex. 565, 80 S. W. 609; Townshend on Slander, §§ 211, 354, 409; Newell on Slander & Libel, 658. The act of March 26, 1901, p. 30, c. 26, which declares that "the truth of the statement in such publication shall be a defense of such an action," is simply an enunciation of the common law as it theretofore existed, and does not abrogate or affect the rule requiring such defense to be specially pleaded in order that it may be proved. Therefore the defendant, not having pleaded the truth of the matters contained in the publication, cannot complain of the charge by reason of its omission of such an issue.

The phrase, "Good name," as used in the charge, can mean nothing else than reputation, and has always been so regarded, which is illustrated by this quotation: "Good name in man or woman * * * is the immediate jewel of their souls. * * * He that filches from me my 'good name' robs me of that which not enriches him, and makes me poor indeed."

12. The twelfth assignment of error assails the fourth paragraph of the charge which is as follows: "If you find for the plaintiff, then you should award her such compensatory damages as would ordinarily and probably result from the article as published, and in estimating her damages, if any, you may consider plaintiff's mental suffering, if any, caused by the publication of said article, but you cannot allow her any exemplary damages." This part of the charge did not of itself, nor when taken with the entire charge (including the special instruction given at defendant's request), authorize a recovery for financial loss. On the measure of damages, it is in perfect harmony with other decisions of the courts in similar cases. Belo & Co. v. Fuller, 84 Tex. 453, 19 S. W. 616, 31 Am. St. Rep. 75; Forke v. Homann, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 670, 39 S. W. 210; Rosenbaum v. Roche (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 1164. The act of 1901 does not undertake to state the elements of damages in a civil action for a libelous publication in a newspaper, but leaves the measure of damages, save as to certain matters which it provides may be pleaded and proved in mitigation, as it was before the enactment.

13. This assignment complains of the court's refusing this special charge: "If in the article complained of as libelous you find any comments or statements of matters of public concern that are libelous, yet if they were made by defendant upon probable cause, and the defendant published the same for general information, then as to such matters you will find for the defendant"—requested by defendant. This charge was evidently asked in view of subdivision 4, § 3, p. 30, c. 26, of the act of 1901, which privileges "a reasonable and fair criticism of official acts of public officials and of other matters of public concern published for general information." This relates solely to comment or criticism of official acts and matters of public concern. "Probable cause" for making the comment or criticism is not even a factor to be considered in determining whether it is privileged or not. If comment or criticism of such acts and matters is made and published, and it is libelous, the privilege of immunity from the consequences of the publication is not extended by the statute, unless it be shown such comment and criticism is reasonable and fair.

Besides, if it should be conceded that the construction of the statute, as contended for by appellant's counsel, is correct, the charge was properly refused. For it will be noticed from the article that the comment or criticism is not confined to plaintiff, but extends to the customs officers of the government at Galveston. If, then, there were probable cause for the comment or criticism of such officers, although there should be none for the plaintiff, the jury under the requested charge would be required to find for the defendant.

14. The proposition by appellant, under this assignment, that, under the laws of the United States, their agent in the customs service is authorized to enter one's house, search for and seize property without a warrant, if he have reasonable cause to suspect it has been imported contrary to law, is astonishing to any one who has any knowledge of the Constitution, laws, history, and genius of our government. Article 4, Amend. Const. U. S.; section 3066, Rev. St. U. S. (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2008); Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524, 29 L. Ed. 746. Almost as startling is appellant's effort to prove the laws of the United States by the testimony of the officer who made the unwarranted search and seizure. The courts of the several states take judicial knowledge of the laws of the federal government, and no principle of evidence permits them to substitute the testimony of any of its officers, even though he be a revenue agent, for such knowledge.

But if it were possible to conceive that the law regarding the authority of an officer in the custom's service is as contended for in the assignment, we would be unable to perceive its applicability. The comment and criticism is not upon the revenue officer or his acts. He is made the hero of the story.

The public is led to believe from the article that his acts are praiseworthy and in accordance with law, and that he is a "marvelous proper man." It is the widow to whom the chivalric reporter, by his comment and criticism, pays the humble tribute of his respects, in the display of his knowledge of the "value of addition, division," if not of "silence" (which he foregoes in order to avail his paper of the "scoop" he has made on the other newspapers of the city), for the purpose of demonstrating that she has been guilty of smuggling, and, perhaps, of bribing the government's customs officers at the port of Galveston; which is not "a reasonable or fair criticism of official acts of public officials."

15. The special charge, the refusal of which is the subject of this assignment, omits the issue of actual malice, made by the pleadings and evidence, and authorizes a finding for defendant upon the finding of certain facts, without regard to whether the publication was made by it with actual malice. Proof of actual malice on the part of the publisher of a libelous article prevents the publication from being privileged. The law does not permit a publisher to glut his malice against a citizen by publishing matter which, in the absence of actual malice, would be privileged. Besides, as shown in considering a prior assignment, the comments published are not upon "official proceedings," but upon the supposed acts of a private citizen.

16. This assignment complains of the refusal of the following charge: "If, in construing the article complained of as libelous, you find comments upon said official proceedings, if any, which were not fair, true, and impartial statements of said proceedings, you may find such matter or matters of comment privileged, provided they were reasonable and fair comments upon matters of public concern and published by the defendant for general information, and in this event you will find for the defendant upon any such comments." This charge would make comments on official proceedings, which are neither true, fair, nor impartial, privileged, provided they are upon matters of public concern and published for general information. We are not able to perceive how comments upon official proceedings, which are untrue and unfair, can become reasonable and fair by reason of the official proceedings being matters of public concern. Official proceedings, though they may relate to matters of public concern, must be viewed as official proceedings; and if newspaper comments upon them are not fair, true, and impartial, they cannot under the law be deemed privileged. If, as applied to official proceedings, the comments are untrue, they must necessarily be untrue as to the same proceedings when viewed as matters of public concern.

17. This assignment complains of the refusal of the following charge: "If you believe that any of the matters of comment in the article complained of are libelous, still, if they were reasonable and fair inferences in reference to matters of public concern and published in good faith and upon probable cause for the general information, then you will find that such inferences were privileged, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover therefor." What we have said in considering previous assignments, we deem a sufficient demonstration of the fallacy of the requested instruction. We will only add that probable cause for believing the truth of matters contained in a libelous article, while it may mitigate the damages, does not justify its publication.

18. The defendant, having failed to plead the truth of any matter contained in the libelous article, was not entitled to have the question, as to whether the plaintiff was guilty of the offense of smuggling, determined. Therefore the court did not err in refusing the special charge presenting such an issue. Even if such an issue had been presented, the charge should not have been given, for it omits an essential ingredient of the offense.

19. The same may be said of the special charge, the refusal of which is the subject of this assignment. In order to constitute the offense of smuggling, there must be clandestine introduction of goods subject to duty with the intent to defraud the government. These essential ingredients of the offense were not included in the requested charge.

20. The quotation we made from Newell on Slander and Libel in disposing of the fifth assignment of error demonstrates that the requested charge, made the subject of this one, was properly refused.

21. This assignment of error complains of the refusal of the defendant's request to give this special charge: "In determining the existence of probable cause as to any of the issues in which the existence of probable cause is submitted to you, you may look to and may inquire whether plaintiff was guilty of smuggling in bringing into this country, without the payment of duty, any of the articles brought by her." It is enough to say that as the trial court did not submit in the main charge, or in any charge requested by defendant, any question of "probable cause" for the publication of the libelous article, there was nothing to which this instruction could relate, and that, therefore, it was properly refused.

22. As mental suffering on the part of the person defamed is one of the direct results of the publication of libelous matter, and in an action for libel the plaintiff may recover compensation therefor (Sedg. on Dam. § 443; Suth. on Dam. § 1206; Newell on Slander & Libel, 863, 864, § 35), the court did not err in refusing defendant's request to instruct the jury that they could not consider or allow plaintiff any damages for mental anguish.

23. The defendant itself introduced in evidence the judgment of the federal district court in the proceedings to forfeit and confiscate the goods, or some of them, referred to in the libelous article, which was against the United States. It is not shown by the record for what purpose such judgment was introduced as evidence. The defendant here complains of the refusal of the court to instruct the jury at its request that such judgment should have no influence upon them in their deliberations upon the issues submitted to them. The purpose of the charge was to relieve the defendant from what might be the effect of evidence it introduced on its own account. It might as well predicate error upon the plaintiff's permitting it to be introduced without objection as to complain that the court erred in failing to relieve it from the consequences of its own error. One may not deliberately, in the trial of a case, do an erroneous act which may be prejudicial to him, and obtain a reversal of the judgment because the trial court refused his request to give a charge which would nullify the effect of such action on his part. If this were permissible, counsel for a party might exhaust his ingenuity in conjuring up and introducing irrelevant evidence for the purpose of obtaining a reversal of a judgment against his client because the trial court refused his request to charge the jury to disregard it.

24. There was no error in the refusal of defendant's request to charge the jury that it was not required to prove its defense of privilege literally, and that such defense is made out if proven in substance and fact. The charge of the court upon the issue of privilege is in the language of the statute, which clearly defines and enumerates such libelous matter as it makes privileged, and the court could add nothing to nor subtract anything from the law, but it was for the jury to say whether, under the statute and from the evidence before them, the matter contained in the publication was privileged.

25. Special charge No. 15 requested by defendant was properly refused. There is no language in the article so limiting and qualifying its meaning as to make it not libelous when taken as a whole. Its meaning is too clear to admit of any doubt upon this point. The only possible question concerning it is, was it privileged?

26. The special charge made the subject of this assignment is given in substance in the main charge, and for that reason there was no error in its refusal.

27. The special charge referred to in this assignment was properly refused for the reasons stated in our consideration of the thirteenth and fourteenth assignments of error.

28. We can perceive no error in the refusal of the court to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks made in argument by plaintiff's counsel, referred to in this assignment. They seem to us to have been proper and in legiti-mate argument, upon evidence before the jury upon the issue of damages.

29. The defendant having failed to plead as a matter of defense that the plaintiff was guilty of smuggling, there was, as we have intimated in disposing of another assignment, no issue in regard to her being guilty of such offense. Therefore the court properly refused to submit such issue as requested by defendant in the special charge referred to in this assignment.

30. The testimony referred to by us in disposing of the tenth assignment of error was amply sufficient to authorize the admission in evidence of a copy of the San Antonio Sunday Light of February 11, 1906, over appellant's objection that there was no evidence that defendant published and circulated said newspaper. Therefore we overrule the thirtieth as well as the thirty-first assignment of error.

31. The testimony of the witness Smith, referred to in the thirty-second assignment of error, was clearly hearsay and irrelevant to any issue in the case, and for these reasons was properly excluded.

32. The question asked the witness Smith, by defendant's counsel, was obviously improper, in that it sought to elicit the conclusion arrived at by the witness from the conversation he had with the plaintiff; and the court did not err in sustaining plaintiff's objections to it, as is complained in the thirty-third assignment.

33. As the report of Smith to Cummings is not mentioned nor commented on in the libelous article, even if it should be deemed "official proceedings" within the meaning of the statute, we fail to perceive its relevancy as evidence in this case. Certainly it was inadmissible as evidence of the fact stated in it, for as to such matters it was purely hearsay. Therefore we overrule the thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-sixth assignments.

34. There is no merit in the thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth, nor fortieth assignments of error, and all are overruled.

There is no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

FISHER, C. J. There was no error in the trial court admitting the evidence of the witness Barse. His testimony did not come within the rule announced by the Supreme Court in H. & T. O. R. Co. v. Roberts (Tex.) 108 S. W. 808, but it was merely to the effect of the extent of the loss in value and weight of the cattle predicated upon the condition they were in when they arrived at Ft. Worth, and as to what in his opinion was the cause of that condition. Having held this evidence to be admissible, there was sufficient evidence of the amount of damages sustained to support the judgment of the trial court.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

BABCOCK v. LEWIS.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1908.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 46*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—PART PERFORMANCE OF ORAL CONTRACT.

Where plaintiff, a contract purchaser of land, took possession, dug a well thereon, and put in the foundation of a stable, he was in exclusive possession so as to entitle him to specific performance of a parol contract for its sale to him, though he afterwards allowed the vendor to occupy the property with him, if the vendor's possession was subordinate to plaintiff's.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 123, 129; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 97*)—TENDER OF CONSIDERATION—REPUDIATION OF CONTRACT.

Where the contract purchaser of land attempted to settle with the vendor by paying the balance due under the contract, and could have paid it, but the vendor refused to settle on the basis of the contract, his acts constituted a repudiation of the contract and made unnecessary a formal tender by the purchaser of the amount actually due as a condition precedent to suit for specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 294; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 43*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—PART PERFORMANCE OF ORAL CONTRACT—SALE OF LAND.

The payment of $37 of the contract purchase price of $100 for land, and the digging of a well on the premises, and laying of the foundation for a stable by the contract purchaser, is a sufficient part performance to entitle him to specific performance of an oral contract for the sale of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 135, 136, 138; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 43*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—IMPROVEMENTS AND EXPENDITURES.

A payment of one-third of the price of the land and improvements were not so insignificant as to warrant a refusal of specific performance of the contract, even though they did not equal in value what the purchaser had gained by his occupancy of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 136, 138; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—PROCEEDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit by a contract purchaser of land for the specific performance of the contract, evidence held not to show that the purchaser ceased to improve the premises and yielded possession to the vendor, nor that materials and labor furnished by the vendor in making improvements constituted improvements thereon by him and a charge against the land and the purchaser.

Appeal from District Court, Liberty County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Action by Andrew Lewis against J. W. Babcock for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Dabney and E. B. Pickett, for appellant. F. M. Stevens and C. F. Stevens, for appellee.

KEY, J. This is a suit for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. The plaintiff pleaded a written contract which the trial court held did not sufficiently describe the land, and the case was submitted to the jury upon the plaintiff's contention that he had paid such portion of the purchase money, held such possession, and made such improvements as entitled him in equity to a decree for specific performance. Upon a verdict rendered in his favor the court entered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

No complaint is urged by appellant against the court's charge, or any ruling made during the progress of the trial. All the assignments in appellant's brief assail the verdict of the jury. The first contention is that the evidence fails to show such exclusive possession by the plaintiff as is required for the enforcement of a parol contract for the sale of land. This assignment is overruled, because the testimony of both the plaintiff and defendant shows that the plaintiff took possession of the land under the contract of sale, dug a well thereon, and put in the foundation of a building intended to be used as a stable for live stock. According to the plaintiff's testimony, by agreement between him and the defendant the latter was thereafter admitted into joint possession with the plaintiff, and, acting together, they changed the plaintiff's plan and erected a larger stable, which was used for more than a year by both of them, each using practically half of the building. This joint possession of the property by the consent of the plaintiff did not change the fact that the plaintiff took exclusive possession of the land under the contract of sale and made valuable and permanent improvements thereon. In fact, according to his testimony, and that given by the witness Rush, which seems to have been accepted by the jury, the defendant's possession was under contract with and subordinate to the possession of plaintiff. If such was the case, and the defendant occupied toward the plaintiff the relation of tenant, then the defendant's possession was in legal contemplation possession by the plaintiff.

The second assignment challenges the verdict upon the contention that the testimony shows that there was never any tender on the part of the plaintiff to pay the balance of the agreed purchase price for the land. This assignment is not regarded as tenable. The agreed price of the land was $100, of which amount the proof shows the plaintiff had paid to the defendant $37, leaving a balance due on the land of $63. The plaintiff admitted and testified that he was indebted to the defendant $97 more for material used in constructing the stable and paid for by the defendant. His testimony also shows with reasonable certainty that he could and would have paid the defendant these two sums, amounting to $160; that he attempted to settle with him upon that basis, and the defendant refused to do so, and declared that he would not convey the land to the plaintiff or any one else for less than $450. That declaration by the defendant constituted a repudiation of the contract, and rendered it unnecessary for the plaintiff to make a formal tender of the amount actually due.

Under the third assignment two propositions are presented. The first is that the improvements made on the land by the plaintiff and the amount of purchase money paid by him were too slight and trivial to entitle him to hold the land. On that proposition the evidence is clearly against appellant, and that contention cannot be sustained. The second proposition asserts that trivial and insignificant expenditures and improvements which do not equal in value what the vendee has gained by his occupancy of the land do not entitle him to have enforced a verbal contract for the sale of such land. The purchase money paid by the plaintiff and the improvements made on the land by him were not trivial and insignificant, and for that reason we rule against him on the point under consideration. Wells v. Davis, 77 Tex. 636, 14 S. W. 237.

The fourth and last assignment of error asserts that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the plaintiff ceased all effort to place any improvements on the premises in controversy, and yielded possession to the defendant, and agreed that the latter might complete the improvements, which he did, and consequently the plaintiff should not recover the land without refunding to the defendant the value of the improvements so placed thereon by the defendant, which value the evidence shows was $300 or more. The record does not sustain this assignment. The uncontradicted evidence does not show that the plaintiff ceased all effort to place improvements on the land. On the contrary, according to the plaintiff's testimony, after he consented for the defendant to join him in building the stable, he furnished material and aided in person in its construction. It may be conceded that the defendant furnished most of the material that was used in the building, but according to the plaintiff's testimony it was agreed that he was to become liable for only the $97 lumber bill paid by the defendant, and which the judgment of the court below fixes as a charge against the land, and requires the plaintiff to pay in order to recover the land. It may also be conceded that the defendant furnished and paid for most of the labor that was used in constructing the building, but according to the plaintiff's testimony he agreed to do that for the joint use of the building, which he subsequently enjoyed. Such being the case, it constituted no charge against the plaintiff or the land.

This disposes of all the questions presented in appellant's brief, and our conclusion is that upon all the issues submitted to the jury the verdict finding for the plaintiff is supported by testimony.

No error has been pointed out, and the judgment is affirmed.

† Writ of error denied by Supreme Court.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County; W. H. Pope, Judge.

Action by the city of Galveston against the J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit by the city of Galveston to recover of appellee $4,936.40, with interest and penalties, alleged by appellant to be due it for taxes levied and assessed upon certain vessels owned by appellee, which are enrolled and registered in the United States customhouse in the city and county of Galveston.

The trial court held that these vessels were not subject to taxation in the city of Galveston, and rendered judgment in favor of appellee. The court found no conclusions of law, but found conclusions of fact which are as follows:

"(1) That the city of Galveston is a municipal corporation, duly chartered and incorporated by public law of the state of Texas, and that it is a separate and independent school district, and has power, and is bound by ordinances, to annually levy and collect a tax of 20 cents on the $100 valuation, upon the taxable property within the limits of said city, for the support and maintenance of public free schools in said city of Galveston.

"(2) That all the barges, schooners, steamers, and vessels of every kind mentioned in plaintiff's petition are owned by defendant, and were enrolled in the United States customhouse in the city of Galveston on the several dates mentioned in plaintiff's petition.

"(3) That plaintiff was authorized to levy, assess, and collect taxes for the year 1905, and that the levy and assessment of the taxes for the year 1905 made by the city of Galveston, including a school tax, as set forth in plaintiff's petition, were properly and regularly made, and that all requirements for a legal levy and assessment have been complied with.

"(4) That defendant failed to render the said barges, steamers, etc., to plaintiff's assessor for listing and assessment on or before June 1, 1905, and the said assessor thereupon listed the said property for taxation as unrendered; that same was referred to plaintiff's board of equalization, by which, after due notice as required by law, the said property was appraised at the valuation stated in plaintiff's petition.

"(5) That the levy for municipal taxes for the year 1905 was $1.52 on the $100 valuation, and that the levy for school taxes was 20 cents on the $100 valuation for said year.

"(6) That defendant has failed and refused to pay the amount of taxes charged against it by plaintiff, and still fails and refuses to pay the same.

"(7) That the United States customhouse, where said vessels of the defendant are enrolled, is situated within the territorial limits of the city of Galveston in the state of Texas.

"(8) That the defendant is justly indebted to the city of Galveston in the sum of $4,936.40, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of January, 1906, and a penalty of 5 per cent., if the property of said defendant described in plaintiff's petition was subject to taxation by the city of Galveston.

"(9) That it is a fact that each and all of the barges, steamers, schooners, and vessels of every kind described in the plaintiff's petition are owned by the J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company, and no other person or corporation has any interest therein.

"(10) That the J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company is a private corporation, chartered under the laws of the state of Texas, for the purposes of mining for and producing petroleum oil and other minerals. That the principal place of business stated in the charter of the corporation and domicile is the city of Beaumont, Jefferson county, Tex., and that in said city of Beaumont, Jefferson county, Tex., it has and maintains its general offices, and not elsewhere, and that its managing officers and agents reside and have their offices in said city of Beaumont, and not elsewhere.

"(11) That at each and all of the times mentioned in plaintiff's petition, at which the vessels therein described were registered and enrolled at the port of Galveston, said port of Galveston was the only port of entry situated within the collection district in which the city of Beaumont is situated, and said vessels were enrolled at said port of Galveston in compliance with the navigation laws of the United States, because said city was the nearest port of entry at which they could be registered or enrolled to the residence of the owner, to wit, the nearest port of entry to Beaumont, Jefferson county, Tex.

"(12) That each and all of said vessels have painted on the stern, in white letters on black ground, the name of the vessel and the words 'of Port Arthur' in compliance with the navigation laws of the United States, requiring that each vessel shall have its name, and the name of the port nearest to the place where the owner resides, so painted on the stern; it being shown that Port Arthur is situated 20 miles from the city of Beaumont, the residence of the J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company, and that Galveston is some 90 miles from said city of Beaumont.

"(13) That Port Arthur is situated in Jefferson county, Tex., and is a port at which ocean-going vessels receive and discharge freight and passengers doing an interstate and international business, and at which numerous barges, schooners, and water craft of all kind receive and discharge cargo in an interstate and coastwise trade. That Port Arthur is 20 miles from Beaumont and about 90 miles from Galveston, and is situated on Sabine Lake or Sabine Bay, at the north end of Port Arthur Canal, which canal is navigable for vessels drawing 22 feet, and connects the town of Port Arthur with Sabine Pass, and thence through the jetties to the Gulf of Mexico. That Port Arthur is not a port of entry, and vessels cannot be registered or enrolled there, under the laws of the United States.

"(14) That not one of the vessels described in plaintiff's petition has ever been actually or physically in the city of Galveston, or in Galveston bay, and none of them have ever done any business to or from the port of Galveston. But there is nothing to prevent said vessels from entering the port of Galveston, and doing business there, in the event their owners should deem it proper to do so.

"(15) That all of the steamers described in the petition ply between Port Arthur and Philadelphia and New York and other points along the Atlantic seaboard, and are engaged in the business of carrying oil, crude and refined, from Port Arthur to the above-named ports. That when not actually engaged on the seas in carrying oil, or at the port of destination in unloading same, said steamers are at Port Arthur, Jefferson county, Tex., awaiting cargo or taking on cargo, and have never been in the port of Galveston for any purpose whatever.

"(16) That all the barges and vessels, except steamers described in plaintiff's petition, are engaged in the transportation of oil, crude and refined, from Port Arthur, Tex., to points along the coast, and sometimes to points in the interior reached by rivers, but that at all times when said vessels are not engaged in the actual carrying of oil away from Port Arthur they are stationed there and remain at Port Arthur in Jefferson county, Tex., and none of them have ever been in Galveston, or the waters of Galveston Bay, for any purpose whatever.

"(17) It is further agreed that the J. M. Guffey Petroleum Company has and maintains no office or agent of any kind in the city of Galveston, Tex., and conducts no business of any kind or character at or from said city.

"(18) That all the vessels described in plaintiff's petition are specially built and fitted for the carrying of petroleum oil, crude or refined, and could not be used for carrying other kinds of freight without extensive and costly alterations, are engaged solely in said business, and were so engaged during all the times mentioned in the petition; that said vessels take cargo only at Port Arthur, and carry no passengers and no freight, except oil, and always come back to Port Arthur empty, carrying no return cargo."

M. E. Kleberg, for appellant. F. O. Proctor and D. Edward Greer, for appellee.

FISHER, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The Legislature may, in certain instances, give to property an artificial situs for the purposes of taxation; but when the property is physical in character, or of a nature that can acquire an actual situs, it must under our Constitution be taxed in the county where actually situated or located. The finding of the court is to the effect that these vessels so taxed have an actual situs at Port Arthur, in the county of Jefferson, and are not and have never been within waters located within the territorial jurisdiction of the city of Galveston.

That vessels may acquire an actual situs is a proposition too well settled to be questioned, and that the place of enrollment and registration is not controlling, if the actual situs is elsewhere. Old Dominion Steamship Co. v. Virginia, 198 U. S. 299, 25 Sup. Ct. 686, 49 L. Ed. 1059; Ayer & Lord Tie Co. v. Kentucky, 202 U. S. 410, 26 Sup. Ct. 679, 50 L. Ed. 1082; Mayor v. Baldwin, 57 Ala. 61, 29 Am. Rep. 713.

The court having determined by a finding, which is not disputed, that the actual situs of these vessels was at a place other than the city of Galveston, the latter was wanting in jurisdiction to assess the vessels for taxation. Its power in this respect is limited to property within the limits of the city, or that of a nature intangible and personal, which has not acquired an actual situs elsewhere owned by the citizens of that city.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

SLOAN v. McMILLIN.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1127*)—AFFIRMANCE ON CERTIFICATE — TRANSCRIPT — COPY OF JUDGMENT.

Motion to affirm on certificate, not being accompanied by a certified copy of the judgment, as required by law, cannot be granted.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1127*)—AFFIRMANCE ON CERTIFICATE—TRANSCRIPT—SHOWING JURISDICTION.

A judgment for a sum below the original jurisdiction of the trial court cannot be affirmed, even on certificate, the transcript failing to show how the case came into that court; there thus being a failure to show jurisdiction in the trial court, and consequently in the appellate court.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 508*)—APPEAL BOND —SHOWING AS TO TIME OF FILING.

It does not affirmatively appear, as is necessary, that the appeal bond was filed in time to give the appellate court jurisdiction; the statute requiring it to be filed in a certain time after adjournment of the trial court, or, when by law the term may continue more than eight weeks, within a certain time after notice of appeal; and the record, though giving the date of approval of the bond, not showing when the court adjourned, how long the term could dissolves the temporary restraining order which had theretofore been issued at the instance of the appellant, but commands the appellant to remove the obstructions which she has placed within the limits of the streets adjacent to her property, and perpetually enjoins her from further obstructing said streets. While this suit was apparently instituted for the purpose of enjoining the appellees from interfering with certain fences and houses claimed by the city of Texarkana to be obstructions in Oak and Tenth streets, we think it is merely a controversy over a boundary line, and the issue is the location of the lines of the aforesaid streets adjacent to the property of the appellant in block No. 98 of said city.

The record contains 22 assignments of error filed in the court below, but only 9 of them have been copied into the appellant's brief. Numbering these in the order in which they appear in the brief, and not as there numbered, they are as follows:

(1) "The trial court should have held and found that the evidence clearly showed that plaintiff had acquired an absolute title by possession and occupancy through herself and her predecessors in title, of more than thirty-three (33) years, which possession had never been disturbed nor interrupted by adverse claimants or possessors."

(2) "Because the judgment of the court allows the defendants to take the property of the plaintiff, without adequate compensation having first been paid to her, and without ever having condemned the same and paying its value into court (or to her), under the statutes providing for condemnation proceedings. And it virtually permits the defendants to confiscate her property, for the public use, without the due course of the law of the land."

(3) "The trial court should have held that the evidence clearly showed that the defendants had no right to open up a street over plaintiff's property without making adequate compensation therefor, and that all of said defendants were and are joint wrongdoers, and that the plaintiff is entitled to a mandatory injunction, restraining each and all of them from so doing and acting."

(4) "The trial court erred in not deciding that the defendants 'and the city have no right, as a municipal corporation, to take—after 32 years' continuous adverse possession and occupancy—the property of the plaintiff, and confiscate the same, without adequate compensation, and destroy her improvements.'"

(5) "The trial court erred in not finding that the evidence (which was absolutely undisputed) established the fact that the land in controversy was never at any time whatsoever dedicated, used, or occupied by the city or by the public as a street, road, or thoroughfare; that said city has never obtained nor acquired by dedication, purchase, or use, or in any other way, a public street across said land, as shown by the maps, annexed to the affidavit of F. M. Henry, as exhibits, and thereby referred to and which were made a part of her motion for a new trial."

(6) "The trial court erred in not finding and holding that there is absolutely no evidence whatever, by any witness, showing that the land in controversy was ever mapped or platted, or laid out in town lots or blocks, when the land was sold to Mary B. Ake, or was ever so mapped, etc., prior to the year 1886, by any one."

(7) "The trial court erred in not finding and holding that the evidence showed that there was at the present time—and had been for some 8 or 9 years—a 'sufficient street,' known as 'Oak street,' about 25 or 30 feet wide, just west of and in front of plaintiff's land in controversy, facing west, and running almost due north and south, for 'the public use, travel and convenience,' and that there was not such travel upon nor use of said Oak street during all of said time."

(8) "The lower court should have held and found that the undisputed evidence clearly established the fact that the plaintiff and her predecessors had been in the actual, peaceable, and adverse possession of the land and premises, and paying all the taxes thereon, and claiming to own the same, for more than five years next before the defendants filed their answer and cross-action herein, cultivating same and same fenced up and occupied, and should have found for her on her plea of five-year limitation."

(9) "The lower court erred in not holding that appellant had title to the land bounded and described, as shown in her pleadings and hereinafter described, and so as to include all of her improvements, and had had and held peaceable and adverse possession of the same, cultivating, using, and enjoying the same for a period of more than ten years, before the commencement of this suit."

These assignments seem to be mainly directed against what might be termed the court's conclusions of fact incorporated in the judgment as the basis for same. We do not think any of these assignments comply with the rules adopted by our Supreme Court or the statute governing the framing of assignments of error. In addition to being too general, there are many other serious objections to some of them which would be a sufficient justification for a refusal to consider them. But, assuming that they all, when taken and considered together as an entirety, raise the question of whether the judgment of the court is sustained by the evidence, we have reached the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed.

It is evident from the appellant's pleadings that her property is situated within the corporate limits of the city of Texarkana, Tex.; that it consists of lots 1, 2, 3, 10, 11, and 12 of block 98, as shown on the plat of said city; that it is bounded on two sides, the north and the west, by Tenth and Oak streets. She thus recognizes the corporate existence of the city, and these public streets. Under the law, cities and towns have the right to summarily open their streets and clear the same of obstructions. City of Corsicana v. Zorn, 97 Tex. 317, 78 S. W. 924. It therefore devolved upon the appellant to show that the boundaries of her property were not in conflict with the public streets of the city. The appellant began her ownership and possession in 1897, and her deed, which was offered in evidence by the appellees, described the property as follows: "All that certain lot, tract or parcel of land, situated in the county of Bowie, and state of Texas, described as follows, to wit: Lots One, Two, & Three, Ten, Eleven & Twelve, in Block No. Ninety Eight, as laid down, on the map or plat of the city of Texarkana, Texas, said lots fronting 150 ft. on Spruce St., 150 ft., on Oak St., and bounded on the North by 10th St." From this it appears that her property had been platted and mapped, and that the streets in controversy had been designated on the map and plat, even if they had not been actually laid out on the ground. In determining the boundaries of the appellant's purchase, recourse must be had to the plats as shown on the recognized map of the city. While the maps used in the trial in the court below have been brought to us in a very unsatisfactory condition, and without sufficient identification to enable us to consider them, if any question should be raised, we have taken the pains to carefully examine them. All of the maps referred to in the oral argument before us by the attorneys for both parties are now before us. Those which show the platting of the block in controversy show also Tenth street to be 60 feet in width and Oak street to be 80 feet in width, or at least they show that both of those streets were of uniform width for their entire length, and the testimony of witnesses is to the effect that they were 60 and 80 feet in width. It is immaterial that those under whom appellant claims may have owned the land upon which the streets were located, and that their deeds fail to show any allowance for streets. If the appellant, after the opening of Tenth and Oak streets for the full width claimed by the city, has all of the land to which she is entitled under her deeds, clearly she is not entitled to any relief. If her fences and houses at the time of opening those streets extended beyond her lines and into the streets or the grounds that were platted for streets, then the city has the right to affirmative relief against such intrusion.

The appellant seems to insist that the court should have found that she had a prescriptive right to the portion of the street within her inclosure. This claim is based upon the contention that she and those under whom she claims have had adverse possession for more than 30 years before this suit was filed. The pleading upon which this claim is based is as follows: "That on January, 1906, and on February 5, 1907, plaintiff was lawfully seized and possessed of the herein-after described tract and parcel of land and town lots and the improvements thereon situated, owning and holding the same in fee-simple title, and she then being and still is the legal and equitable owner of same and entitled to the possession thereof, and that she has been such owner and possessor of same for more than nine years, and that her predecessors in title to said land and premises were the legal owners and possessors of same for about 15 or 20 years or more or less, and in the actual, exclusive, open, notorious, hostile, and adverse possession thereof for said length of time, before this plaintiff became the owner and possessor thereof (under whom she claims title), and that she is entitled to the possession thereof." The writer does not think this is a sufficient allegation of title by limitation. Where a party relies upon limitation to support a recovery, or as a defense, it must be specially pleaded. Mayer v. Paxton, 78 Tex. 196, 14 S. W. 568. But, admitting that such a pleading might be considered sufficient, in the absence of any exception, where testimony in its support has been received without objection and there has been a finding by the court or a jury in favor of a title by limitation, still no such condition is here before us. Since the enactment of the statute of 1887 no such right can be acquired against any county or town or city to any public road or street. Article 3351, Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897. If any rights existed which would authorize any of the appellant's grantees to hold by limitation the encroachments upon the streets, it must have been perfected prior to the enactment of this statute. There is testimony which will justify a finding that the land upon which the appellant's property is located was mapped and platted as early as 1874 or 1875, but that no streets were ever opened until some time later. The exact time when they were opened is not made clear by the evidence. The only witness for the appellant who seemed to be at all certain as to the inclosures of the property of the appellant says that in 1878 it belonged to a man by the name of Barron, that the latter had a fence on the west side, where Oak street is now, and that the fence was about where it was when the controversy arose between the appellant and the city. Taking this in its most favorable light, it would fall one year short of giving the 10 years' possession, and that is the only period of limitation that is pleaded, if we can regard that as having been sufficiently done. Appellant's attorney, who testified upon the trial of the case, stated that he was familiar with the location of the lots of land in controversy; that he had known them for many years; that in 1878 and 1879 this land was not laid off into lots, blocks, and streets; that the streets had not then been dedicated, and were not dedicated till about September, 1886, about the time of a friendly suit between Trigg, Henry, and Estes. If this be true, and it would appear that the appellant cannot dispute it, limitation could not have been running against the city more than one year till it was terminated by the statute. Limitation could not have commenced till the streets were laid off or dedicated to public use.

We consider it unnecessary to further discuss the facts of this case, and fully concur in the conclusion reached by the trial court. The judgment is affirmed.

FREY v. MYERS et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1908.)

1. TRIAL (§ 35*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—STIPULATIONS.

An admission for the purposes of the suit by the attorneys of record is conclusive of the facts admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 88; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 264*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

It being admitted by counsel that the consideration of a deed to a husband during coverture was cash, and there being no evidence that the money was his separate property, the land in the possession of him and his wife when the marriage was dissolved by his death must, under Rev. St. 1895, arts. 2963, 2969, be deemed community property, as against persons claiming it under devise from him as his separate property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 116*)—WARRANTY DEED—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

Even if B., the purchaser at execution sale under a final judgment, got no title, the same property having been sold to W. at execution sale under a prior judgment, in the same action, for costs, yet the title acquired by B. by quitclaim from M. after, B. had given a warranty deed of the property inured to the benefit of his grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

The grantees in a voluntary deed made pending action against the grantor take subject to the judgment afterwards rendered against her in the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lis Pendens, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

5. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 15*) — ADVERSE POSSESSION.

The possession of a tenant in common, who repudiates the co-tenancy of the other owner, to the knowledge of the other, and whose possession is clearly adverse to and incompatible with her interest as a co-tenant, gives title against the co-tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

6. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 62*)—MATTERS INCONSISTENT.

That community property is inventoried by the executor as the estate of testator is not inconsistent with possession of the devisee of the property being adverse to testator's wife, to the extent of her half interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

7. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 62*)—EFFECT OF ACCEPTING DEED.

The adverse possession of devisees of community property, as against the widow of testator, is not destroyed by their acceptance of a deed from her, they continuing their adverse possession, as it commenced, claiming title as devisees, and their acceptance of the deed being merely to avoid any possible question that might arise because of the grantor being the widow of testator, and his wife when he acquired the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

8. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 25*)—POSSESSION BY ONE FOR HERSELF AND ANOTHER.

For one to acquire title by adverse possession there must have been actual occupancy by him in person, or through a tenant, so that where R., who with her minor brother owns an undivided half interest in land, takes possession and claims the entire property as theirs, without any understanding with or authority from him, her possession gives him no title by adverse possession, and gives her such title only to one-half of the outstanding one-half interest.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Charles E. Ashe, Judge.

Action by B. F. Frey against C. H. Myers and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Mark G. Fakes, for appellant. Fisher, Sears & Campbell and W. G. Sears, for appellees.

NEILL, J. On June 10, 1905, the appellant, B. F. Frey, sued the appellees, C. H. Myers and his wife, J. M. Myers, and W. G. Sears, as executor of the estate of Roberta C. Lankford, in trespass to try title, to recover an undivided one-half interest in lots 1, 2, and 50 by 100 feet off of lot 12 lying next to and adjoining the two lots, all of which property is in block 382 on south side of Buffalo bayou in the city of Houston, Harris county, Tex. The petition contains the ordinary averments in an action of this character, and, in addition, pleads title by virtue of the three, five, and ten year statutes of limitation. It also alleges that the defendant Sears, as executor of his testatrix, holds one or more lien notes against the interest of Myers in said premises. A partition of the lots between plaintiff and defendants is also prayed for. The defendants Myers pleaded not guilty, the three, five, and ten year statutes of limitation and improvements in good faith, and that they had purchased property from W. G. Sears, as independent executor of Roberta C. Lankford, the consideration being $200 cash and two notes, each for the sum of $450, secured by a vendor's lien on the lots, who, as such executor, made them a general warranty deed to said premises, and they prayed judgment against him on such warranty, in the event of a recovery by the plaintiff. The defendant Sears excepted to that part of the Myers' answer making him a party and asking judgment on his alleged warranty, upon the ground that it appeared therefrom that he only warranted the title in his capacity as executor, and that he had no power or authority to make a general warranty of the title to the property. The case was tried without a jury, and judgment, upon findings of fact and law filed by the court, was rendered for the defendants. From the judgment plaintiff has appealed. The defendants have also assigned error upon certain findings and conclusions of the court.

Conclusions of Law and Fact.

1. The plaintiff claims an undivided half interest in the land sued for under certain sales, hereinafter mentioned, made of it as the property of Mrs. Mary F. Boyce, surviving wife of R. P. Boyce, deceased. The defendants claim (1) under the will of R. P. Boyce, and (2) under the 10-year statute of limitations; the contention of plaintiff being that the property was the community property of Boyce and wife, and that, upon his death, his devisees took only an undivided half interest, and his surviving wife being the owner of the other undivided half interest. That of the defendants is that it was his separate property, and that his devisees took the entire estate. If this last contention were established, it would defeat plaintiff's claim and relieve the case of any other question presented by the assignments. The trial court decided it against the defendants, and its ruling is the subject of appellants' cross-assignment of error. The evidence relating to this matter is substantially as follows: On May 19, 1884, Jacob Kilpper, by his warranty deed of that date, conveyed the lots in question to R. P. Boyce; the consideration expressed being $500, which the deed recites as paid by the grantee to the grantor. At the time the property was thus acquired, Mary F. Boyce was the wife of R. P. Boyce. He died February 14, 1890, leaving surviving him his wife and three children, namely, Robert P. Boyce, Jr., Maria Lanier, and Roberta C., who was first the wife of William Howard, afterwards of one Smith, and after his death of one Lankford. In these conclusions she will be called Mrs. Lankford. R. P. Boyce left a will, in which he devised all his property to his son and daughter, Roberta C. (Mrs. Lankford). The will was duly probated; the testator's wife, Mary F., and James A. Breeding, being the executors. Breeding filed an inventory, which included the property in controversy. Neither he nor Mrs. Boyce claimed the same as property of the estate after the inventory was filed, but it was claimed by Mrs. Lankford that it was of the separate estate of her father. There was some evidence introduced by the defendants tending to show that a bounty warrant, issued to Boyce prior to the date of his marriage, was the real consideration paid for the land; but, as it was admitted in writing by counsel for plaintiff and defendants, for the purposes of this suit, "that Jacob Kilpper sold the lots in controversy to R. P. Boyce for a cash consideration of $500, recited in said deed, and that no land certificate or bounty warrant was a part of the consideration," we deem it unnecessary to recite such evidence. The trial court held that the evidence was not sufficient to overthrow the presumption that the lots were the community property of Boyce and his wife.

The burden being upon the defendants to overcome the presumption arising from the facts that the property was acquired during the marriage of the parties and was possessed by them when the marriage was dissolved (articles 2968, 2969, Rev. St. 1895), it was for the trial judge, sitting as a jury, to determine whether defendants' evidence was sufficient to sustain the burden of overcoming such presumption, we have no authority to disturb his decision of the question. Besides, we cannot, in view of the admission of the attorneys of record, above referred to, perceive how the question could have been disposed of any other way. Such admission was conclusive of the facts admitted (1 Ell. Ev. § 256; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 186), and, as there was no evidence tending to show that the money paid for the land was the separate property of the husband, it followed that the land must be deemed community property. And, as it was community, the devisees in the will took title to only the testator's undivided half interest; the title to the other half remaining in his wife.

2. If, then, the plaintiff acquired the half interest of Mary F. Boyce, the surviving wife of R. P. Boyce, and his right of entry was not barred by the 10-year statute of limitation, he is entitled to recover. Both these questions were decided against him in the court below. The facts relating to the first are practically as follows: In a suit then pending in the county court of Harris county, No. 371, styled "Boyd & Boyd v. Mary F. Boyce," an original attachment was, on March 20, 1897, issued against the property of Mary F. Boyce, which was on March 22, 1897, duly executed by levying upon, as well as other property, an undivided one-half interest in the lots in controversy as the property of Mrs. Boyce. The writ of attachment and the sheriff's return thereon, showing the levy, were duly recorded on the same day the levy was made in the record of attachment liens of Harris county, Tex. Upon the first trial of the case a judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant Mary F. Boyce, from which the plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals of the First Supreme Judicial District, which, on October 12, 1889, reversed the judgment and remanded the cause to the county court for further proceedings, adjudging the costs against the appellee Mary F. Boyce. Thereafter Boyd & Boyd procured from said Court of Appeals an execution against Mary F. Boyce for the sum of $68.25; it being the amount adjudged against her for costs on said appeal. This execution was executed by a constable of Harris county by levying upon an undivided one-half interest in the property involved in this suit, which was sold by virtue thereof on April 3, 1900, to N. P. Woodward, to whom the constable executed a deed therefor on April 6, 1900. On December 21, 1900, final judgment was recovered in the county court of Harris county for plaintiffs in said case of Boyd & Boyd v. Mary F. Boyce against the defendant for the sum of $371, with interest and costs of suit, which judgment recited the issuance and levy of the attachment, above referred to, upon the property involved in this suit. On February 9, 1901, an execution on the judgment was issued to the sheriff of Harris county and executed by him on the same day by levying upon said property, which, after duly advertising the same for sale, he, on March 5, 1901, sold to B. F. Boyd, one of plaintiffs in the execution, for $250, and on March 8, 1901, executed to him a deed conveying him all the interest and claim that Mary F. Boyce had therein on November 20, 1900, or at any time since. On September 15, 1899, B. F. Boyd executed to his brother, A. W. Boyd, a power of attorney empowering him to sell and dispose of all property, real or personal, that he (B. F. Boyd) then owned or might thereafter acquire in Harris county, Tex., and to execute deeds and bills of sale to same in his name, etc. On July 14, 1902, B. F. Boyd, by his attorney in fact, A. W. Boyd, acting under the power of attorney just referred to, by his general warranty deed of that date, conveyed the property in controversy, together with other property, to B. F. Frey, who is the plaintiff in this case. On July 15, 1902, N. P. Woodward executed a deed to B. F. Boyd by which he sold and quitclaimed to him all of his (Woodward's) right, title, and interest in the property involved in this suit. On July 12, 1897, Mary F. Boyce conveyed the property in controversy to Robert Boyce and Roberta Smith, afterwards Lankford, in furtherance of their claim that it was their father's separate property, and to settle the affairs of the estate. From these facts, which were found by the trial judge, the court below concluded as matters of law that plaintiff derived no benefit from the attachment levy on the property, for the reason that Boyd & Boyd, plaintiffs in the attachment suit, had the property sold to N. P. Woodward by virtue of the execution issued upon the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals against Mrs.

Boyce, "and that, having sold the same out of the case and from under the attachment lien," such lien became of no effect. The court further concluded that the plaintiff had failed to show the superior title to said property from a common source.

Under our view of the law applicable to these facts, we deem it immaterial whether the court's conclusion was that the effect of the execution sale to Woodward was to relieve or discharge the land from the attachment lien, for, if it should be conceded that such was its effect, the judgment was none the less valid. If its effect was as held by the trial court, B. F. Boyd, who purchased the property at a subsequent sale made by virtue of an execution issued on it, took title subject to the superior title previously acquired by Woodward. If, then, Woodward's title was superior to Boyd's, its superiority could not render the latter any worse than no title at all, and Boyd having on July 14, 1902, made a general warranty deed to Frey, when he had no title to the property, it being outstanding in Woodward, when, on the next day, Woodward by his deed conveyed his title to Boyd, such title passed eo instante by estoppel to Frey by virtue of Boyd's warranty. Jones on Real Prop. in Convey. § 900; Rawle on Cov. § 248. Thus it appears that Frey's unbroken chain of title emanates from the deed of Jacob Kilpper to R. P. Boyce, which is also the source of appellee's title, and that, under this common source, plaintiff's is the superior title, unless it is affected by the deed of July 12, 1897, from Mary F. Boyce to Robert Boyce and Roberta Smith.

As will be seen from our preceding statement of the facts, this conveyance was purely voluntary, and was made pending the suit of Boyd & Boyd against the grantor, after the writ of attachment had been levied upon and became a valid and subsisting lien upon the property, of which the grantees, as well as all others, had record notice. If, then, the effect of the sale of the property under the execution issued out of the Court of Civil Appeals was to render the attachment lien of no further effect or avail in the suit, it would seem that the cause of this effect was the merger of the lien in the deed made to the purchaser at the execution sale, for until the property was sold the lien existed, and if the lien then went out of the case it must have gone into the deed of the purchaser, for it was obtained as much for the purpose of securing the costs in the case as to secure the amount sued for. If, however it be conceded that such lien neither continued in the case nor merged in the judgment nor in the deed to the purchaser at such execution sale, still, as the deed of Mrs. Boyce was made pendente lite and was purely voluntary, the grantees took the grantor's title subject to the judgment afterwards rendered against her in the case. We think therefore that the plaintiff showed superior title under the common source.

8. The question then is, as before intimated, was this superior title of the plaintiff cut off by the 10-year statute of limitation?

The facts found by the trial judge upon this issue are substantially as follows: The day after the death of R. P. Boyce, which occurred on February 4, 1890, Roberta C. Lankford, for herself and her brother Robert, took possession of the property in controversy, claiming the same as theirs under the will of their father, denying that any one else had an interest in it. Her brother was then a minor, and there was no agreement or understanding between them, or with any one else, authorizing her to take and hold such possession for him. Roberta held possession of the property, it being fenced, using and claiming it as her own and her brother's, from that time until May 24, 1898, when she and her brother partitioned it between them; Robert and his wife conveying to Roberta Lankford lot 1 and the adjoining 50 by 50 feet of lot 12, she and her husband conveying to Edith Boyce, wife of Robert, lot 2 and 50 by 50 feet of lot 12, and each deed reciting that it was for the purpose of partition. Actual possession of Robert Boyce never began until the summer of 1897, when he moved a house onto the part of the land afterwards allotted him by the partition. His occupancy of it as a home continued from that time until August 28, 1900, when he and his wife conveyed it to the defendants, C. H. Myers and wife. The possession of Roberta C. Lankford continued from February, 1890, until in March, 1900, the date of her death, which occurred in March, 1900, and has been continued by her executor, W. G. Sears, and the defendants Myers, to whom the executor conveyed the part partitioned to her by his deed of August 28, 1900, from that date until the time of the trial of this case. The defendants Myers also took possession of that part of the property allotted in the partition to Edith Boyce, and have continued in such possession from then until now. From the date of the partition between Roberta Lankford and her brother, neither the possession of the respective parties to the partition extended beyond the part allotted to her or him. During the entire time of Mrs. Lankford's possession, her mother, Mary F. Boyce, knew that she was claiming all of the land under her father's will as the property of herself and brother, Robert, and, consequently, that such possession was taken and continued adverse to her (Mary F.'s) community interest. Upon these facts the trial court found that the defendants acquired title under the 10-year statute to the undivided half interest in the property sued for.

While Mrs. Lankford and Mary F. Boyce were tenants in common, the facts recited bring the case within the exception to the rule that the possession of a tenant in common is presumably not adverse to his co-tenant, by showing the co-tenancy of her mother was clearly repudiated by Mrs. Lankford, and that Mrs. Boyce was fully informed of its repudiation, and that her daughter's possession was clearly adverse to and absolutely incompatible with her interest as a co-tenant. That the property was inventoried as the property of the estate of R. P. Boyce by his executor is not inconsistent with the fact of Mrs. Lankford's adverse possession and claim to the entire property, for its devise to her and Robert was, under the law, subject to the testator's debts, which rendered it the executor's duty to inventory it as a part of his estate. If the fact of its being so inventoried should be taken as evidence, it would militate rather against the plaintiff than operate in his favor, for as an inventory is evidence against an administrator or executor, but is not conclusive if it be shown that the property was not separate or community property as specified in the inventory (Heron's Probate Guide, § 231; Simpkin's Admin. of Estate, 80), such inventory might have been regarded as evidence that the property was of the separate estate of the testator, had it not been shown to have been community.

Again, it is contended by appellant that the acceptance by the grantees of the deed of July 12, 1897, from Mary F. Boyce to Robert Boyce and Roberta Smith, destroyed the adverse possession. The rule seems to be that the fact that the disseisor accepts a deed of conveyance to the land which he previously had in adverse possession does not necessarily destroy the adverse character of the possession. Sanders v. Logue, 88 Tenn. 355, 12 S. W. 722. It is clear from the evidence regarding the conveyance that the adverse possession of the grantees was not affected by their acceptance of the deed in question, but that they continued their adverse possession, as it commenced, claiming title as devisees under the will of their father, and that their acceptance of the deed was merely for the purpose of avoiding any possible question that might arise from the facts that Mary F. Boyce was the surviving wife of the testator, and his wife when the property was acquired by him from Kilpper.

We conclude therefore that Mrs. Lankford's possession, coupled with other acts regarding it, was such as would vest title in her as against the plaintiff, had she entered upon and claimed the land for herself alone during the period of her occupancy; but the entry and adverse holding were made for her brother Robert as well as for herself. They were tenants in common as to an undivided one-half interest only. As to the extent of that interest, her possession was, by operation of law, likewise his possession; but it extended no further, for she took it and held it in hostility to the owner of the other undivided one-half interest, claiming that she took and held the land for her brother as well as for herself. For one to acquire title to land under the statute of limitation, his possession must be an actual occupancy of the premises, which can only be made by him in person, or through a tenant. There was no such possession by Robert, for his possession was not personal until after the date of the partition between him and his sister. The relation of landlord and tenant as to the undivided interest in the land sued for did not exist between him and Mrs. Lankford, for such relation can only arise from contract or by operation of law. There was no contract between the parties which would authorize Mrs. Lankford to take possession of and occupy any part of the land for her brother. Even if there had been, we do not think he could avail himself of her possession under it for the purpose of acquiring title under the statute of limitation. Her possession, notwithstanding her claim that it was for him as well as for herself, could not, as against the owner, by operation of law, be his possession through a tenant of the interest in land he neither owned nor claimed. This possession claimed by her for her brother Robert gave the owner no cause of action against him for recovery of the land. Consequently, limitations did not run in his favor, for the statute cannot operate so as to bar an action until a cause of action exists. As Mrs. Lankford did not claim nor occupy the entire land described in plaintiff's petition as her own, but only a half interest (the other half being claimed and occupied by her for her brother), she could only acquire title by limitation to a one half interest in the land sued for, and to the extent of such interest the defendants have established title against plaintiff by limitations, but they (defendants) have wholly failed to prove such facts as would show an acquisition of the other undivided half by limitation, or in any other manner. Therefore Mrs. Lankford and her brother, Robert Boyce, having been the undisputed owners of an undivided one-half interest in the two lots and the part of the lot described in plaintiff's petition, and Mrs. Lankford having acquired title by limitations to an undivided one-half interest in the other half, she and Robert Boyce were the owners of an undivided three-fourths interest in the entire property. The defendants Myers acquired only from her and Robert such undivided three-fourths interest in all of the property described in plaintiff's petition, title to the remaining undivided one-fourth interest being in plaintiff, which he is entitled to recover, and to a writ of partition in order that the property may be divided between him and defendants according to their respective interests as above adjudged.

The judgment of the district court is therefore reversed, and judgment is here rendered in favor of the plaintiff for one-fourth interest in the entire property described in his petition, with a writ of partition as above indicated, and the cause is remanded for the purpose of making partition between the parties.

McDANIEL et al. v. STAPLES.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 31, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 19, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 185*)—PRESENTATION BELOW—OBJECTIONS—OBJECTION TO JURISDICTION—NECESSITY.

An objection to the jurisdiction of the court is available on appeal, though not raised below; it being fundamental.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1166; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 273*)—FORECLOSURE—JURISDICTION AND VENUE.

In an action in the county court to foreclose a chattel mortgage, allegations that plaintiff and defendant resided in P. county, where the suit was filed, and that the mortgaged property was of the value of $345, were sufficient to show proper venue and sufficient value of the subject-matter to sustain the jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 560; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

3. COURTS (§ 122*)—ALLEGATIONS IN PLEADING—JURISDICTION.

In an action in the county court to foreclose a chattel mortgage, allegations that the property was secreted, or removed from the county, or sold, would not justify the court in assuming that the property had been entirely destroyed, so as to deprive it of jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 427; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. COURTS (§ 122*)—JURISDICTION—VALUE—ALLEGATIONS IN PLEADING.

In actions to foreclose chattel mortgages, jurisdiction depends upon the value of the property as alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 427; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

5. COURTS (§ 19*)—JURISDICTION—LOCATION OF PROPERTY.

Jurisdiction to foreclose a chattel mortgage is not determined by its present locality, and the failure to allege the present locality of the property, the other jurisdictional facts being alleged, would not defeat jurisdiction, since the seizure and sale of the property is merely a part of the relief decreed, and it is not essential that the property remain in the county or be reduced to possession and retained in order to give the court jurisdiction to foreclose the lien; this conclusion being confirmed by Rev. St. 1895, art. 1840, providing that, if the mortgaged property cannot be found, upon the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, the debt may be satisfied out of other property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 47-52; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

6. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 217*)—REMOVAL OF PROPERTY—EFFECT.

The mere change in the locality or possession of a mortgaged chattel would not discharge or affect the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 221, 466; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

7. COURTS (§ 19*)—JURISDICTION—JURISDICTIONAL FACTS.

In proceedings to foreclose a chattel mortgage, the existence of the lien, the value of the property, and the amount of the original debt, are the essentials to give the court jurisdiction, and not the present locality of the mortgaged property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 47-52; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

8. COURTS (§ 2*)—JURISDICTION—ALLEGATION OF JURISDICTION—SUFFICIENCY.

A petition is sufficient to give jurisdiction which states material facts necessary to empower the court to hear and determine the cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

9. COURTS (§ 122*)—COURTS OF GENERAL JURISDICTION—VALUE OF PROPERTY IN CONTROVERSY—FICTITIOUS DEMAND—ALLEGATION.

In an action in the county court to foreclose a chattel mortgage, that the proof showed that the value of the property was less than $200 would not deprive the court of jurisdiction to render judgment, where it was not alleged and proved that the amount was fraudulently or fictitiously alleged so as to give jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 427; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

10. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 283*)—FORECLOSURE—ACTIONS—PERSONAL JUDGMENT.

In proceedings to foreclose a chattel mortgage, where it is impossible to reach the property so as to satisfy the debt, the court may in the exercise of its equitable powers decree a personal judgment against defendant without foreclosure.

11. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 228*)—CONVERSION—DAMAGES—EXPENDITURES—DEDUCTION.

If there was any evidence to sustain a finding of fact by the jury, or inferences from the evidence that would authorize such a finding, it cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Panola County Court; J. H. Lang, Judge.

Action by F. N. Staples against T. W. McDaniel and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appealed. Affirmed.

W. R. Anderson, for appellant, T. W. McDaniel. H. N. Nelson, for appellant, H. C. McDaniel. Brooke & Woolworth and W. R. Jones, for appellee.

LEVY, J. By his petition appellee sought to recover against the appellant T. W. McDaniel on open account for $184.05, together with a foreclosure of a chattel mortgage on 10,500 pounds of seed cotton given to secure the account, and which was alleged to be of the value of $345; and against the appellant H. C. McDaniel, the value of his debt, because of the alleged conversion of the mortgaged property by him. The appellants each and separately filed answers, and the cause was tried to a jury. In accordance with the verdict of the jury, judgment was rendered in favor of the appellee against the appellants, and each appellant appeals from the judgment.

Appellants, by assignment of error, challenge the jurisdiction of the county court to try the case and render judgment on the petition. Waiving the question as to whether appellants invoked any action on their exceptions by the court below, we think they could avail themselves of such error on appeal by assignment of error, as it is fundamental. Grant v. Whittlesey, 42 Tex. 320.

The objection raised by the appellants to the original jurisdiction of the county court over the case rests in the allegations of facts stated in the petition with respect to the conversion of the property by H. C. McDaniel, coupled with the particular allegation therein that "plaintiff says he does not know, and cannot positively state, whether said seed cotton is in Panola county, or whether it has been carried out of said county." The contention in respect thereto is that the facts alleged do not show a cause of action to foreclose the chattel mortgage lien, because there is not affirmatively averred the present locality of the property or its existence, and for that reason it is eliminated as a subject-matter of controversy from the case, leaving only the question of original indebtedness as the subject-matter of controversy between the parties, which is an amount below the original jurisdiction of the county court. It is the subject-matter of the mortgage in this case that would confer jurisdiction upon the court to try, as the debt sued for is below the amount of its original jurisdiction. The petition avers that the residence of both the plaintiff and the defendants is in Panola county, where the suit was filed, and that the mortgaged property is of the value of $345. This would appear to show proper venue and subject-matter in amount. Referring to the allegations in the petition relating to the manner of conversion of the mortgaged property, we do not think more could reasonably be said in respect thereto than that the intendment was to show a course of wrongful dealing with the property on the part of one of the defendants through means of either secreting same, or removing from Panola county, or selling same; the plaintiff being unable to state which. Because mortgaged property is stated to be secreted, or removed from the county, or sold, would not justify the court, on exception to jurisdiction, in assuming that there had been utter destruction of the property, like being burnt up by fire. By the allegations, however, the present locality of the mortgaged property is rendered uncertain. It is involved in the contention that the present locality of the mortgaged property must be affirmatively set forth in the petition as a necessary jurisdictional fact in the foreclosure of the chattel mortgage, and the absence of such averment would operate to deprive the trial court of the power to hear and adjudge the subject-matter of the foreclosure, and thus, in effect, eliminate the foreclosure as a controversy between the parties, leaving the original debt as the only question in controversy, which is below the jurisdiction of the trial court. It is well settled that, in suits to enforce a lien upon personal property, the value of the property determines the jurisdiction of the court. Cotulla v. Goggan, 77 Tex. 32, 13 S. W. 742. "The value of the property" therefore is what empowers the particular court to entertain and try the case. "Value" is considered and made the basis of jurisdiction because the jurisdiction of the particular court is confined to amounts in controversy as defined in the law. In chattel mortgage suits the value of the property is made the basis to determine the "amount in controversy" as to jurisdiction of the particular court, because of the fact that there is the existence of a lien in controversy besides the debt, and the lien on the property reaches the full value of the property. In order to exercise jurisdiction over the lien covering the value of the property, the amount of value of the property must be within the proper jurisdiction of the court. The power of the court to try the case being dependent upon the value of the property, and the value of the property being alleged to be within the proper amounts of its authority, it would seem to follow that the trial court had jurisdiction to entertain this case. The statute does not confine the venue of the suit to foreclose the chattel mortgage to the county where the property is situated, though it authorizes suit in such county. There is no statute which requires the mortgaged property, as between the parties to the mortgage, to remain in the county where the mortgage is executed. Nor is it required that by some process the mortgaged property be reduced to possession and retained before the power of the court attaches and can be exercised to foreclose the lien. It is a recognized fact that personal property is movable. Article 1340, Rev. St. 1895, which provides for the foreclosure of chattel mortgages, states, "and if the property cannot be found," then the debts adjudged can be made out of any other property, as under ordinary execution. This language contemplates the probable loss or destruction or removal of the property, and supports the conclusion that it is not the mere present locality of the property mortgaged, but its value, that confers jurisdiction upon the court to try the controversy. Seizure and sale of property is after judgment rendered, and results from the power of the court to entertain the case, and is merely the relief decreed. If reducing the property to possession is not essential to the power of the court to entertain and try the case in the first instance, then it follows that the failure to allege in the petition with certainty the present locality of the mortgaged property, the proper jurisdiction otherwise being alleged, would not interfere with nor defeat the power of the court over the case. Neither could the contention be sustained, as involving a jurisdictional question in this case, that, because the petition failed to show with certainty the present locality of the mortgaged property, the subject-matter of foreclosure would be eliminated as a controversy between the parties, thus leaving the amount in controversy on original debt. It could not be asserted in sufficient reason as a legal contention that, where a chattel mortgage lien has rightfully attached to the property described, mere change of locality, as between the parties to the mortgage, or a conversion with notice, would displace the lien. If change of locality would not displace or affect the lien between the parties, then the question of mere present locality of the property, as raised in these pleadings, would not relate to a substantive right of the parties. The existence of the lien, the value of the property, and the amount of the original debt, are the defined issues presented in the petition in the "subject-matter" in controversy, and not the present locality of the property, so far as the power of the court to entertain the case is concerned. None of these defined issues would legally be "eliminated," because of the failure to allege the present locality of the property, which affects the remedy only. A petition is sufficient to sustain jurisdiction which states material facts necessary to empower the court to hear and determine the cause. Brown on Jurisdiction, § 2. Where the court has jurisdiction of the parties in interest, it is not necessary, to decree a foreclosure, that the property be within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. Means v. Worthington, 22 Ohio St. 622.

Appellants complain, by assignment, that the court erred in not granting a new trial, because the evidence showed that the court was without jurisdiction to hear and finally try the case. This assignment cannot be sustained on the ground that the proof showed the value of the property to be less than $200, even if the record would sustain the contention, because there were no pleadings attacking the jurisdiction on the grounds of fraudulent or fictitious allegation of the value of the mortgaged property in the petition. Courts may render judgment for any amount below jurisdiction, in the absence of pleading and evidence that the amount giving jurisdiction in the petition is fraudulently or fictitiously alleged to obtain jurisdiction. Dwyer v. Bassett, 63 Tex. 274; Ratigan v. Holloway, 69 Tex. 469, 6 S. W. 785. The assignment cannot be sustained upon the ground that the evidence showed in the trial that the property was beyond the limits of the court's jurisdiction. The statute, in providing for judgments of foreclosure, contemplates that "the property cannot be found." We do not think that there could reasonably be founded a legal contention that the power and jurisdiction of the court over the case to finally try the same was destroyed and defeated by proof, in the trial, of the removal of the property from the confines of its jurisdiction, occasioned by conversion. The proof would only affect the remedy of the party as to seizure and sale of the property. If the power of the court in the first instance existed on the petition to entertain the case because of the alleged value of the property, its power continued to finally try the case and award such decree and relief as would be proper in the case. Where, by the unlawful or wrongful acts of others, it is made impossible for the plaintiff to reach the property within his lien, it is then the equity power of the court to decree a personal judgment against the defendants, without foreclosure. Moore v. Masterson, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 308, 46 S. W. 855. Under the equity power of the court, under such proof, the relief of a strict foreclosure, without order of sale, might be awarded. We do not think that the Tufts Case cited can be made applicable in any view to this case.

The remaining assignments are overruled. The verdict found by the jury cannot be set aside by this court as to the appellant H. C. McDaniel. There is some evidence to support the amount found in the verdict. The jury properly allowed his rent claimed and the $40 money and such other expenses connected with the gathering and preparing for market as would be authorized under the evidence. How much gathering was paid for by this particular appellant, and the value, was for the jury to find. If there is any evidence to sustain their finding in this respect, or inference from the evidence that would authorize them to make the finding, we could not be justified in disturbing such finding. There is no evidence, and inferences from the evidence, that would authorize the jury to find that this appellant did not pay for the picking of all the cotton. There is evidence that as much as two bales were paid for, probably, by this appellant. The plaintiff testified that he let the other appellant have some money with which to pay for picking cotton. All this evidence and inferences to be drawn therefrom are matters for the jury alone to settle, and their finding is not without some support in testimony. If they found in their province that this particular appellant did not pay for the picking, and that there were seven, instead of five, bales of cotton, and that the seven bales were of the value that they fixed, then, after deducting this appellant's proper account and rent for such total value, the amount they allowed is sustained.

The case was ordered affirmed.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 24, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 21, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 664*)—RECORD—CONFLICTING PARTS.

Where the bill of exceptions shows that certain testimony was excluded by the court, and the statement of facts agreed to by counsel for both parties and approved by the judge shows that said testimony was admitted, the assignment of error to the exclusion of the evidence will not be considered.

2. WILLS (§ 164*)—SETTING ASIDE—ISSUES AND PROOF.

In an action to annul a will for mental incapacity and undue influence, plaintiff's testimony that her brother died a few days before their father died, that her brother's death was unknown to her father at his death, that their father bequeathed certain property to his three children, and that testatrix, plaintiff's mother, took the interest of the deceased child, was properly excluded as irrelevant to the issues.

3. WILLS (§ 165*)—SETTING ASIDE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action to set aside a will for mental incapacity and undue influence, there being an absence of testimony on such issues, testimony as to declarations by testatrix prior to making her will as to her intentions was properly excluded.

Appeal from District Court, Johnson County; O. L. Lockett, Judge.

Action by Florence Helsley and another against J. S. Moss and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Davis & Davis and Cleveland & Haynes, for appellants. Brown & Lomax, Poindexter & Padelford, Odell & Johnson, and Ramsey & Odell, for appellees.

RAINEY, C. J. This suit was brought by Florence Helsley and husband against J. S. Moss, W. H. F. Moss, Mrs. Fannie Barnes, Mrs. L. B. Taylor and husband, A. L. Taylor, Eula Holdman and husband, James Holdman, and Roy Hedges, to set aside the last will and testament of Mrs. L. E. W. Moss, on the ground of undue influence and mental incapacity. On the trial the court instructed a verdict for defendants, and plaintiffs appealed the case to this court.

The evidence shows that when Mrs. L. E. W. Moss married J. S. Moss, about 1865, she was a widow Pearce, and had two children, Florence Pearce and Mollie Pearce. The latter died, leaving two children, Eula and Roy Hedges. Florence Helsley, née Pearce, and husband, are the plaintiffs herein. Mrs. L. E. W. Moss had three children by Moss, who survive her, to wit, W. H. F. Moss, Fannie E. Barnes, and Mrs. L. B. Taylor. Her two grandchildren, Eula and Roy Hedges, also survive her. At the time she executed her will she was of sound mind, and the evidence fails to show that any undue influence operated upon her in the execution of the will.

Appellants' first assignment complains of the court in excluding the testimony of Mrs. Helsley, as follows: "She proposed to prove by her own evidence that about 1886 her mother, Mrs. Moss, was sick, and that she was there, and that J. S. Moss brought a gentleman in the room that her mother was in, and gave him a seat by the stove, and after he had been there a short time her mother opened her eyes and looked at the man, and asked who the man was, and that J. S. Moss answered it was Col. Oatis, and told her mother that he (J. S. Moss) wanted her to make a will and fix it up, and her mother told J. S. Moss to take Col. Oatis back as quick as he had brought him there." The bill of exceptions shows that said testimony was offered, but that the court excluded and refused to admit it. The statement of facts shows that said testimony was admitted. The statement of facts is agreed to and signed by counsel for both parties and approved by the trial judge. This being the condition of the record, we are unable to say which is correct, and the assignment will not be considered by this court. Ramsey v. Hurley, 72 Tex. 194, 12 S. W. 56; Wiseman v. Baylor, 69 Tex. 63, 6 S. W. 743; Scott v. Childers, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 349, 60 S. W. 775.

Appellants' second complaint is that the court erred in not admitting the testimony of Mrs. Helsley, to the effect "that her brother Jackson Hill Pearce died a few days before their father died, and that her brother's death was unknown to her father at his death." The will of George M. Pearce, the first husband of Mrs. Moss, bequeathed his interest in certain property to his three children; but one of the children, the boy, died before George M. Pearce did. The appellants insist that, as her mother took that interest, she was entitled to prove the facts stated, as she was entitled to an interest in the estate that had been willed to the boy.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

We do not think the evidence pertinent to the issue raised by the pleadings. The suit was to annul Mrs. Moss' will on the ground of mental incapacity and undue influence. The testimony did not bear on that issue. Mrs. Helsley had sued for her part of the property that had been left by her father, which she had received. Pearce died in 1863, and more than 40 years had elapsed before this claim was asserted by her.

Appellants' third assignment of error complains of the court in refusing to admit the testimony of Mrs. Helsley, to the effect: "That her mother, Mrs. L. E. W. Moss, was at her house in 1900, and that a buggy came in at plaintiff's pasture gate, and witness said she wondered who that was. That she had never seen that rig go through there before, and her mother said she guessed it was somebody that the Driskill's folks had sent for. That the Driskills were trying to get Mr. Driskill's mother to make a will, and they were dingdonging the life out of her, and said it was not right, and she said they wanted the old lady's property, and that she did not think that it was right to do that way, and cut Mollie Scroggins out, and if she was Mollie, and they did, she would fight them as long as she had a dollar. And a few minutes after this conversation her mother said: 'I thought something of making a will. I don't know how to fix it up.' That she had thought about leaving her home place to Mr. Moss for his lifetime. She wanted to leave him plenty, and she thought that ought to be enough to keep him up as long as he lived. She wanted to fix it so her children should have what she had; that she did not want no woman to come there and enjoy it." We think there was no error in this action of the court. Mrs. Moss' will was executed in 1900. There was no evidence of mental incapacity on her part to make her will at that time, nor was it shown that the will was made under undue influence, or that it was not her voluntary act.

Appellants' fourth assignment is, in effect: "That plaintiff offered to prove by Mrs. Helsley, while she was on the stand, and after it had been shown that her father was dead and had left considerable property and had disposed of same by will, giving certain property to his wife and to his children, and that her mother had married one J. S. Moss, and the witness had married, that she, the witness had brought suit against her mother and J. S. Moss for the property that was coming to her from her father's estate, and that during the pendency of said suit the same was compromised, and that leading up to the compromise, her mother came to her and told her, if she would compromise and take what was left in the will—that is, the land—she would make same as the balance of her children at her death, but, if she did not, she would debar her. And that witness accepted her mother's proposition, and the suit was settled on said basis. The evidence was objected to because it was irrelevant, and did not tend to prove any issue in the case, etc., and the same was excluded." "This evidence was offered, as appellants claim, to show the state of Mrs. Moss' mind at that time, 1884 or 1885, and the obligation of Mrs. Moss morally to carry out her promise to witness." The testimony was rightfully excluded. The purported compromise and promise were made 15 years before the will was executed, and 18 years before Mrs. Moss died. It was subject to the objection of being too remote. Besides, if it was sufficient upon which to base a right, there is no pleading alleging such a ground as a cause for setting aside the will.

It was not error to exclude the statement of Mrs. Moss, made during her last illness "that she felt like she had all with her when she had Henry and the witness." It tended to prove no issue in the case.

The court did not err in excluding the testimony of O. L. Bonham and J. Q. Bonham, to the effect that J. S. Moss was a very determined man, and when he undertook anything he did not let up until he accomplished it. This evidence was immaterial, unless there was some evidence tending to show that Moss had exercised undue influence upon Mrs. Moss in making her will.

Appellant offered to show by O. L. Bonham: That he had heard J. S. Moss say, soon after he went on the Moss place, and at different times and places during the entire time that he remained on said place, that Mrs. Helsley had gotten all her estate, and all that she would get; that she had received her part and would get no more. And also offered to prove by J. Q. Bonham that in 1891 he was at J. S. Moss' house, and was sitting with Moss and wife on their front gallery, and that Mrs. Moss stated that she intended for all of her property that she had left at her death to be equally divided among her children, and that Moss objected to it and said that the Pearce heirs would not get any more, if he could help it. The matter was discussed between Moss and wife, could not tell how long, might have lasted half of an hour. Moss kinder got mad, like he generally did in conversation, and left. This testimony, on objection, was not admitted, and exceptions reserved. O. L. Bonham had lived on the Moss place about 16 years, leaving there about 5 years before the trial. The conversation heard by J. Q. Bonham was in 1891, 9 years before the will was made. This evidence we think too remote to be admissible on the question of undue influence. McElroy v. Phink, 97 Tex. 147, 76 S. W. 753, 77 S. W. 1025; Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 65-79.

The evidence as to both Bonhams as to the declarations of J. S. Moss was inadmissible. Moss at the time of trial was dead, therefore not a party to the suit. There was no collusion shown to have existed between him and the other legatees to use any influence whatever upon Mrs. Moss as to how she should make her will. The testimony therefore, as to the other legatees, was not admissible to affect their interest. This applies also to appellants' tenth assignment of error, and said assignment is overruled. Selbert v. Hatcher, 205 Mo. 83, 102 S. W. 962.

The evidence of Mrs. Driskill, offered to show that Mrs. Moss said that, if she ever made a will, each of her children should share alike, that she would never leave out one of her children, was properly excluded.

The appellant complains of the action of the court in instructing a verdict. We do not think the court erred in this respect. The evidence admitted by the court utterly failed to show that Mrs. Moss at the time was mentally incapacitated to execute a will, or that undue influence was exercised upon her in the execution thereof. We also think that, if the testimony excluded had been admitted and considered, it, with the testimony adduced, was insufficient to have set aside the will. Therefore no harm resulted by the exclusion of the evidence complained of. There is no direct evidence of any fact that Mrs. Moss was unduly influenced to make her will as she did. To show undue influence, the evidence must be direct, or the circumstances showing such "must be of a reasonably satisfactory and convincing character." Underhill on Wills, vol. 1, § 132. Evidently Moss and the other legatees desired that the will be made as it was, but that Mrs. Moss did not exercise her own volition of mind in its execution the evidence fails to show. She lived three years after its execution, and there is nothing to show that she desired to revoke it.

If it could be said that appellant did not receive as much through the will as she thought she should, it raises no presumption of undue influence. Id., § 135. The will purported to dispose of property owned by Mrs. Moss. The legatees, besides J. S. Moss, were the children and grandchildren of Mrs. Moss, and she probably considered that the disposition of the property made by her would make the legatees equal in amount to that possessed by appellant, and this of her own volition.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Davis, Windsor Pipes, Jack Redhead, Joe Redhead, Julia Redhead, Ella Redhead, E. K. Street, Thos. R. Street, Mary Lyons, Tom Lyons, Joe Norwood, A. D. Norwood, A. J. Norwood, I. D. Norwood, Louisa S. Klumpp, Kate Klumpp Stahl and her husband, Mr. Stahl, C. C. Klumpp, Julius G. Klumpp, F. B. Enochs, Felice Enochs, and Mrs. W. N. Parks, to recover the lands described in plaintiff's original petition, which said lands were patented to J. B. and J. E. Therrell by the state of Texas, in which suit Mrs. Mary E. Therrell intervened, claiming that she was entitled to an undivided one-half interest in the lands described in intervenor's petition, as against both plaintiffs and defendants. The defendant G. W. Burkett answered by a plea of not guilty, and also pleaded for a repartition in case the deed from M. A. Stanley et al. to A. J. Norwood should from any cause be declared to be a forgery. The defendants Norwood, Klumpp, and Singer Sewing Machine Company pleaded not guilty. There was a trial in which a jury was impaneled and sworn to try the cause and heard the evidence, or a part of it; but the jury was withdrawn, and the court rendered judgment as follows, to wit: Plaintiffs M. A. Stanley and T. B. Brandin own an undivided one-fourth interest. The defendants G. W. Burkett, W. E. Beene, W. T. Mattison, Isriel Fulsom, and J. W. Beene own an undivided one-fourth interest. That the defendant the Singer Sewing Machine Company owns an undivided one-seventeenth interest, and the defendants L. Higgins, W. W. Higgins, Jas. Fulsom, and W. Harmes own an undivided one-eighth interest, and that the intervener, Mary E. Therrell, owns an undivided five-sixteenth interest in the lands described in plaintiffs' petition, and that all the other parties hereto, both plaintiffs and defendants, own no interest in the lands in this suit. The land in controversy was patented to J. B. and J. E. Therrell, both of whom are dead; the latter having died prior to January 23, 1873, and his undivided one-half interest in the premises having descended by inheritance to plaintiffs M. A. Stanley, T. B. Brandin, J. E. Therrell, and to Sarah E. Irvin, deceased, who was the mother of the plaintiff Earnest Irvin. On the date stated M. A. Stanley was the wife of C. A. Stanley, and T. B. Brandin was the wife of S. B. Brandin, and Sarah E. Irvin was a widow.

There is no controversy in regard to the one-half interest in the lands of the patentee, J. B. Therrell; it being held by defendants, or some of them, and the only controversy in the court below being as to the interest of J. E. Therrell inherited by plaintiffs, and that controversy is confined on this appeal to the interests of M. A. Stanley and Theresa B. Brandin. Their interest is claimed by appellants under a certain instrument or deed, generally designated as a "protocol," made on January 23, 1873, in the state of Louisiana, East Feliciana parish, by M. A. Stanley in person, and by Theresa B. Brandin by her agent, C. A. Stanley, and Sarah E. Irvin to Abel J. Norwood, before Tony M. J. Clark, the recorder of said parish, purporting to convey their interest in the lands sued for, which instrument was recorded in Leon county, Tex., February 2, 1873. The original, as well as the record thereof on the deed records of Leon county, was introduced in evidence by the appellants over certain objections of the appellee, not necessary to mention or consider here. This document, together with the power of attorney made by Theresa B. Brandin, appointing C. A. Stanley her agent to sell and convey the land to A. J. Norwood and other writings attached thereto, appear at length in the trial court's conclusions of fact. It is deemed sufficient to say: That such instrument and the certificates attached to it are in the ordinary form of a protocol, or such as are employed in the state of Louisiana for conveying land situated in that state; that it appears upon its face that M. A. Stanley and Theresa Brandin were at the time it was made both married women; that it does not appear, either from the face of the protocol nor from any certificate attached to or accompanying it, that either Mrs. Stanley or Mrs. Brandin appeared before an officer authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds affecting lands situated in this state and acknowledged the execution of the instrument in the manner required by the act of April 30, 1846 (Laws 1846, p. 156), in order to make a deed of a married woman, conveying her separate property, effective. Paschal's Dig. arts. 1003, 1004. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears that no such acknowledgment was taken of either of these women, nor of Mrs. Brandin, to the power of attorney by virtue of which C. A. Stanley, as her agent, sought to convey by such instrument in the property.

The trial court held, as a matter of law, as follows: "The so-called deed or act between Sarah E. Irvin, M. A. (or M. M.) Stanley, and Theresa B. Brandin, on the one part, and A. J. Norwood, on the other part, was admissible in evidence as an ancient instrument, but was not sufficient to convey the title of the married women, M. A. Stanley and T. B. Brandin, and they are therefore entitled to recover a one-fourth interest in the lands in controversy." The assignment of error attacks this conclusion upon the ground that the act of April 23, 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 308, c. 165), amending article 2312 of Revised Civil Statutes of 1895, operated upon the deed so as to convey the title of these married women. The act referred to was not intended to have any such effect, nor could it, if such were the legislative intent, be given any such force by the courts. The instrument, as to these married women, was, from its inception, absolutely void (Berry v. Donley, 26 Tex. 737; Zimbleman v. Portwood [Tex. Civ. App.] 107 S. W. 584), and no act that could be passed by the Legislature would give it any validity at all. When the instrument was executed, title remained in Mrs. Stanley and Mrs. Brandin just as it was before and could not be taken from them by the Legislature if it wanted to; but no such assault was intended or contemplated by the Legislature upon the rights of individuals. It was simply intended by the act to render, in certain cases, instruments and copies of them, which had been recorded a designated period of time, admissible in evidence which could not be introduced in evidence before under the article amended, but would otherwise have to be proved as at common law. The effect of such evidence was not changed, nor intended to be. If the instrument was invalid before, it remained so, and would so remain forever, unless validated by the parties themselves.

The judgment is affirmed.

McDONALD et al. v. HANKS et al.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 30, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 19, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 181*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—LETTERS—CARBON COPIES.

Where a carbon copy of a letter is taken and filed by the sender, the original being signed and mailed to the addressee, the carbon was not an original, but a copy, and inadmissible without accounting for the nonproduction of the original.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 600; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 186*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—ORIGINAL—COPY.

If a writer, desiring to preserve a copy of a letter, writes two copies at the same time exactly alike, one of which he proposes to send and the other to keep, it is immaterial which copy he sends, as the one sent becomes the original and the other the copy, regardless of the force of the evidence showing it to be an absolutely accurate copy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 667; Dec. Dig. § 186.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 378*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—LOST DEED—EFFORTS TO DISCOVER—LETTERS.

On an issue as to the execution and delivery of a lost deed which it was to plaintiff's interest to produce, letters to and from persons expected to have knowledge of the deed and its whereabouts were admissible to show plaintiff's efforts to discover it, without proof of the signatures of the persons by whom the letters on their face purported to have been written.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1648; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 372*)—LOST DEEDS—COUNTY CLERK'S CERTIFICATE—ANCIENT DOCUMENTS.

Where an alleged lost deed, if executed at all, was executed prior to 1847, supposed to have been in 1840, and plaintiffs had every motive to search for and produce the deed, the court did not err in admitting a county clerk's certificate dated October 17, 1847, reciting that there was a record in the clerk's office of a deed conforming to that alleged to have been lost, the records having been destroyed by fire in 1871 and the deed never having been re-recorded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1614; Dec. Dig. § 372.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 187*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—PREDICATE—SUFFICIENCY.

The sufficiency of the proof offered as a predicate for the admission of an alleged lost deed is within the judicial discretion of the trial court under all the circumstances of the particular case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 675; Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 231*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE—RECORDS.

Deeds from H. to C. described the land as one-half of the tract sold jointly to R. H. and W. H. by H., Sr., attorney in fact of S., duly recorded, etc. The latter deed described the land as 640 acres out of the north half of the F. headright, being the east end of 1,700 acres sold by F. to S. All the deeds were of record in the county when defendants purchased the land in controversy, the deed from F. being a necessary part of defendants' title. Held, that a judgment under which defendants deraigned title, describing the land as 320 acres conveyed to C. by H., together with such deeds, was sufficient to charge defendants with notice of the existence of the F. deed to S.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 513; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

7. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 10*)—POWER OF ATTORNEY—SUFFICIENCY OF DESCRIPTION OF LAND—CERTAINTY.

A power of attorney described the land as part of a larger tract situated in L. county and a part of the F. headright, the grantor's interest being about 2,000 acres, as would more fully appear by reference to the county records of L. county. It was shown by the record that such interest was 1,700 acres off the north side of the league. Held, that, the description being sufficient with the aid of extrinsic evidence to identify the land, the power was not void for uncertainty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 372*)—ANCIENT DOCUMENTS.

Where a deed more than 30 years old purported to have been executed under a power of attorney, and possession was shown under the deed, the execution of the power would be presumed without proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1613; Dec. Dig. § 372.*]

9. DEEDS (§ 38*)—DESCRIPTION—CERTAINTY.

A deed describing the land as 640 acres situated in Liberty county, east of the Trinity river, about 25 miles above Liberty and out of the north half of the Isaiah Fields headright league, being the east end of 1,700 acres sold by Fields to Smith and conveyed to the grantor by power of attorney, irrevocable by Smith as appeared from the records of Liberty county, described the land with sufficient certainty to be identified by the aid of extrinsic evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 65, 66; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

10. LOST INSTRUMENTS (§ 23*)—DEEDS—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In trespass to try title, evidence held to sustain a finding of the execution and delivery of a lost deed under which defendants claimed title.

Appeal from District Court, Liberty County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Suit by Wyatt Hanks and others against Roderick McDonald, Sr., and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. B. Moody, for appellants. Baldwin & Christian, for appellees.

REESE, J. This is a suit in trespass to try title by Wyatt Hanks et al. against Roderick McDonald, Sr., Roderick McDonald, Jr., and Arch McDonald for a tract of 640 acres of land, a part of the Isaiah Fields league, and a part of a tract of 1,700 acres on the north side of said league claimed to have been sold by said Fields to one W. D. Smith. The defendant Roderick McDonald, Jr., disclaimed. The other two defendants pleaded not guilty.

Plaintiffs are heirs of Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks, to whom the land was conveyed by Wyatt Hanks, Sr., under an irrevocable power of attorney from W. D. Smith in 1857. On the trial plaintiffs undertook to establish by circumstantial evidence the execution, about 1840, of a deed from Isalah Fields, the original grantee, of the 1,700 acres. Defendants undertook to show, besides other defenses, by like evidence the execution by R. S. Hanks to J. K. Hanks, under whom they claim title, of a deed for his interest in the tract. They also defend on the ground that plaintiffs fail to show title out of the original grantee, and that they are innocent purchasers without notice. The case was tried without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiffs, from which defendants appeal.

The following conclusions of fact of the trial court, prepared and filed at the request of appellants, are adopted as a substantially correct finding of the facts as established by the evidence:

"(1) In December, 1874, all the records of Liberty county, Tex., affecting the title to lands were destroyed by fire, and the present public records of said county consist solely of such instruments as have been recorded subsequent to the date of said fire.

"(2) Some time prior to the 13th day of June, 1838, Isalah S. Fields and wife, Sarah Fields, settled in this government, and by reason of said settlement became entitled to a league of land, which was granted to them on the 13th day of June, 1838, and said headright league is located in Liberty county, Tex., and the land in controversy is carved out of said land.

"(3) Some time prior to the 23d day of March, 1847, Isalah S. Fields conveyed to Wm. D. Smith, 1,700 acres off of the north side of his headright league of land. This deed is not of record in Liberty county, Tex., neither was the original offered in evidence on the trial of this cause, but from the recitals in other conveyances read in evidence, as well as from other facts established on the trial of this cause, I conclude that said deed was executed, and was sufficient to pass to Wm. D. Smith the title to 1,700 acres off of the north side of the Isalah S. Fields league. This embraces a strip of land 1,025 varas wide, north and south, extending across the entire league from the east to the west.

"(4) On March 23, 1847, Wm. D. Smith executed an irrevocable power of attorney to Wyatt Hanks, Sr., authorizing said Hanks to sell, convey, and dispose of all his interest in the Isalah S. Fields league of land, and to appropriate the proceeds thereof, etc.

"(5) On September 25, 1857, Wyatt Hanks, Sr., as attorney in fact for Wm. D. Smith, executed a general warranty deed to Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks, by which he conveyed to them 640 acres of land out of the north one-half of the Isalah S. Fields headright league, 'it being the east end of 1,700 acres sold by the aforesaid Fields to Wm. D. Smith, and conveyed to me, Wyatt Hanks, by the aforesaid Smith, as will appear by records of Liberty county, Tex.' This deed was sufficient also to pass to Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks, the title to 640 acres of land off of the east end of the 1,700-acre tract which is the 640 acres involved in this suit and described in plaintiffs' petition.

"(6) Wyatt Hanks, Jr., died in the year 1863, Richard S. Hanks died in the year 1873, and the plaintiffs in this case are their descendants and the legal heirs of said Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks, except the plaintiff, Laura Cox, who is the surviving wife of Wyatt Hanks, Jr.

"(7) Isalah S. Fields and his wife, Sarah Fields, settled upon their league of land in a very early day, and they were living upon their league as early as 1854. He continued to live upon the same up to the time of his death, which occurred some time in the 60's. His wife, Sarah Fields, continued to live upon the same up to the time of her death, which occurred after the year 1890. They neither lived upon nor claimed the 1,700 acres off of the north side of the league, and they never at any time, asserted any title, or claim to this tract of land. They knew it was being claimed by Wyatt Hanks, Sr., and those deraigning title through him. They recognized and acquiesced in the claim made by Wyatt Hanks, Sr., to this tract of land.

"(8) Isalah S. Fields and wife had born unto them six children, their names being Sophronia Fields, Serena Fields, Selina Fields, Randolph R. Fields, Vernal Fields, Harrison Fields. Harrison Fields was never married, and died without issue. Sophronia Fields married John W. Stevens, and had two children, J. R. Stevens and O. H. Stevens. Serena Fields married H. V. Akins. Selina Fields married Pipkin. The family history of these people is set out fully in the agreement of the attorneys filed herein, but I only deem it necessary to point out the above facts with reference to this family history in disposing of this case. Sarah Fields, the surviving wife of Isalah S. Fields, and two of her children, Serena Akins and Randolph R. Fields, and a grandchild, J. R. Stevens, were parties to the suit of Sarah Fields et al. v. S. B. Cooper et al., hereinafter mentioned. The other legal heirs of Isalah S. Fields were not parties to that suit. However, Selina Pipkin executed a deed to A. B. Green to the 1,700 acres described in that judgment, and A. B. Green conveyed the 640 acres involved in this suit to one of the plaintiffs, John F. Hanks, but in disposing of this case I do not consider these conveyances, as will appear from my other findings that the plaintiffs were the legal owners of the 640 acres of land at the time of this conveyance.

"(9) In the year 1854, Wyatt Hanks, Sr., who was then claiming to be the legal owner of the 1,700 acres of land that had been conveyed by Isalah S. Fields to Wm. D. Smith, went into actual possession of said tract of land. He built a house thereon and made other improvements thereon, putting a part thereof in cultivation. He claimed to be the legal owner thereof, and used and cultivated the ground up to the time of his death, which occurred in about the year 1863. During all of this time Isaiah S. Fields and his wife, Sarah Fields, lived upon the same league of land within about a mile or a mile and a half of the home of Wyatt Hanks, Sr. They knew he was living upon the land, and was claiming the same. They recognized his title thereto.

"I find in paragraph 5 hereof that on September 25, 1857, Wyatt Hanks, Sr., conveyed to his two sons, Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks 640 acres of said 1,700-acre tract off of the east end thereof; and afterwards, to wit, on August 25, 1859, Wyatt Hanks, Sr., conveyed to another one of his sons, George T. Hanks, 703 acres off of the west end of the 1,700-acre tract, described it by metes and bounds, and this deed recites that it is a part of the tract of land conveyed by Isaiah S. Fields to Wm. D. Smith by deed bearing date the 9th day of September, 1840, and recorded in Liberty county, Tex., in Book E, p. 88, more fully described by metes and bounds as follows, to wit: [Then follows description by metes and bounds.] This description, together with the description given of the 1,700 acres in the judgment rendered in the case of Sarah Fields et al. v. S. B. Cooper et al., and other facts in evidence, is sufficient to fully identify the 1,700 acres of land conveyed by Fields to Smith. George T. Hanks took actual possession of this tract, continued to live upon the same, use and cultivate the same from that time down to the time of his death, and his son, George T. Hanks, Jr., who was his sole and only heir, was in possession of a part thereof at the time of this trial.

"Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks never took actual possession of their 640 acres, and the same has never been actually occupied since it was severed from the 1,700-acre tract by the conveyance from Wyatt Hanks, Sr., to them, but they paid taxes upon the same during their lifetime. Wyatt Hanks, Jr., having died in 1863, and the plaintiff in this case, Laura Cox, who was the surviving wife of Wyatt Hanks, Jr., paid the taxes upon this land for a long number of years after her husband's death. Richard S. Hanks died in 1873. They and their heirs have always asserted title to this 640-acre tract, and their title was always recognized by George T. Hanks.

"(10) On the 14th day of August, 1890, there was rendered in the district court of Liberty county, Tex., a judgment in the cause of Sarah Fields et al. v. S. B. Cooper et al. by which the plaintiffs in that cause, Randolph R. Fields, J. R. Stevens, Sarah Fields, and Serena Akins, recovered a judgment against George T. Hanks, W. B. Denson, and S. B. Cooper for all of the Isaiah S. Fields league, except 1,700 acres off of the north side of said league, which was decreed to the defendants and is described by metes and bounds as follows, to wit: 'Beginning on the E. bank of the Trinity river, at the N. W. corner of the Isaiah Fields league, a mound and a post, from which a sweet gum 20 in. dia. brs. S. 10 deg. E. 7 ⁵/₁₀ vrs. dist. and a white oak 20 in. dia. brs. N. 31 deg. W. 7 vrs.; thence down said river, with its meanderings to the N. R. cor. of a survey of a tract of land deeded by Isaiah Fields to his wife and children, a post from which a white oak 16" in dia. brs. S. 33 deg. a white oak E. 1 vr. mkd. thus L. S. F. and a white oak 12" in dia. brs. S. 20 deg. W. 2 vrs. dist.; thence N. 89 deg. E. with said sur. a part of the distance to the E. B. line of said league; thence north 1 deg. W. with said E. line 1025 vrs. to the N. E. cor. of said league; thence with the N. line of said league and part of the distance with Pierre Blanchette league. to the beginning, containing 1700 acres, more or less and of the 1700 acres there is allotted to the defendant, W. B. Denson 250 acres, being the same heretofore conveyed to him by G. T. Hanks; and of the said 1700 acres, there is allotted to the defendant S. B. Cooper 320 acres, being the same conveyed to him by J. K. Hanks on the 16th day of August, 1881 and the balance of said 1700 acres is allotted to the defendant, George T. Hanks.'

"(11) On August 16, 1881, John K. Hanks executed a deed to S. B. Cooper, which is the one mentioned and recited in the judgment described in paragraph 10 hereof, by which he conveyed to Cooper 320 acres of land, part of the Isaiah S. Fields league. He described the land in that deed as follows, to wit: 'Being one-half of the tract of land sold jointly to R. S. Hanks and Wyatt Hanks, Jr., by Wyatt Hanks, Sr., attorney in fact for Wm. D. Smith, by deed bearing date the 17th day of September, 1857, and duly recorded in the office of the county clerk of Liberty county, Texas, on the 20th day of August, 1858, the same land herein conveyed being the one-half of said 640 acres conveyed as aforesaid, and being the same conveyed to me by R. S. Hanks by deed bearing date, the 19th day of December, 1860.'

"I find that the deed recited in this conveyance from Richard S. Hanks to John K. Hanks was never executed, as recited therein, but that the deed recited from Wyatt Hanks, Sr., to Richard S. Hanks and Wyatt Hanks, Jr., was duly executed, as therein recited, all of which is fully shown from the deed which was read in evidence on the trial of this cause. In conveyance from Wyatt Hanks, Sr., to Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks, there is a recital to the effect that the 1,700 acres had been sold by Isaiah S. Fields to Wm. D. Smith, and conveyed by Wm. D. Smith to Wyatt Hanks, Sr. I find that the deed recited in this conveyance from Isaiah S. Fields to Wm. D. Smith was executed, as therein recited. I further find that in view of the fact of the destruction of the deed records of Liberty county, Tex., by fire in 1874, the recital made in the judgment rendered in the case of Sarah Fields et al. v. S. B. Cooper et al., to the effect that the land decreed to S. B. Cooper was 320 acres, which was conveyed to him by J. K. Hanks on the 16th day of August, 1881, and the recital made in the deed from J. K. Hanks to S. B. Cooper, which is dated the 16th day of August, 1881, to the effect that it was the same land conveyed to Richard S. Hanks and Wyatt Hanks, Jr., by Wyatt Hanks, Sr., attorney in fact for Wm. D. Smith, by deed bearing date the 17th day of September, 1857; and the recital made in the deed from Wyatt Hanks, Sr., to Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks, which is dated the 17th day of September, 1857, to the effect that the 1,700 acres had been conveyed by Isaiah S. Fields to Wm. D. Smith and by Wm. D. Smith to Wyatt Hanks, Sr., were sufficient to put all persons deraigning title through Cooper, and through any party to this judgment, upon notice of the existence of the deed from Fields to Smith; at least, these recitals were sufficient to put them upon inquiry as to whether or not such a deed had ever existed, and, if this inquiry had been properly pursued, it would have led to the discovery of the facts that the plaintiffs were legal owners of the land in controversy; and inasmuch as the defendants deraign their title through S. B. Cooper and through this judgment, they cannot claim to be innocent purchasers for value without notice.

"(12) There is a regular chain of transfers from S. B. Cooper down to and into the defendants.

"(13) There is a regular chain of transfers from G. T. Hanks, one of the defendants in the case of Sarah Fields et al. v. S. B. Cooper et al., down to and into the defendants; but, there being no title in either Cooper or Hanks, I find that no title passed to the defendants.

"(14) I find that, at the time the defendants in this case, and those through whom they deraign title, acquired title to the land in controversy they then had notice of the deed from Isaiah S. Fields to Wm. D. Smith, and had notice of the plaintiffs' claim to the land in controversy, and had notice of facts sufficient to put them upon inquiry with reference to the plaintiffs' right to said land, and that by reason of these facts they cannot be purchasers for value without notice, and are not entitled to be protected as such."

Plaintiffs, in proving their title, undertook to establish the execution of a deed, alleged to have been executed in 1840, from Isaiah Fields, the original grantee, to W. D. Smith, under whom they show title. In laying the predicate for the introduction of secondary evidence to establish the execution and contents of this deed, plaintiffs offered in evidence carbon copies of certain typewritten letters written by their attorneys to surviving members of the family and relatives of W. D. Smith making inquiry as to said deed. It was shown by the attorney who wrote the letters that it was his custom in preserving copies of business letters to prepare carbon copies of the originals, which were filed away. The carbon copies in question were not signed, but it was shown that the copies offered were such carbon copies of letters signed and mailed to the addressees. No effort was made to procure from such addressees—all of whom lived in this state but in distant counties—the originals of the letters sent, and no evidence was offered tending to show that such originals could not have been procured. Objection was made to the introduction of each of the copies on this ground, which was overruled and defendants excepted, and make the ruling the basis of their first four assignments of error.

We are of the opinion that the assignments should be sustained. The copies of the letters signed and forwarded and those kept by the addressers cannot be considered duplicate originals. There can be no logical difference between such copies and the letterpress copies, which have always been held to be copies which are not admissible in evidence without accounting for the nonproduction of the originals. 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1234; Hubbard v. Russell, 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 404; 3 Enc. of Ev. p. 540. If a writer, desiring to preserve a copy of a letter, writes at the same time two copies exactly alike, one of which he proposes to send and the other to keep, it is a matter of indifference which copy he sends, but the one sent becomes the original and the other a copy, no matter by what force of evidence it is shown to be an absolutely accurate copy. The court was in error in overruling the objection and admitting the copies, but in the view we take of the case such error does not require a reversal of the judgment, for the reasons hereafter shown.

The letters above referred to were addressed to Sidney A. Smith, Gonzales, Tex., grandson of W. D. Smith; Dr. Elisha H. Smith, Victoria, Tex., son of said Smith; Mrs. Matilda Jobe, Gatesville, Tex., a daughter; and J. C. Burns, Goliad, Tex., who seems at one time to have had some connection as an attorney with an investigation by plaintiffs of their title. Plaintiffs offered in evidence original letters which Baldwin testified had been received by him from Sidney A. Smith. Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of these letters, on the ground that they were ex parte unsworn statements of the parties, and also that it was not shown that they had been signed by the parties respectively by whom they were written. No evidence was offered as to the signatures. The objections were overruled, and the evidence admitted, to which defendants excepted, and the point is made the basis of the fifth and sixth assignments of error.

Baldwin, witness for plaintiffs, testified that his firm made an effort to locate the deed from Isaiah Fields to Wm. D. Smith, and, as a part of that effort, on December 31, 1906, wrote Sidney A. Smith, who was a grandson of Wm. D. Smith, deceased, with reference to this deed, and who, they thought at that time, might give them some information with reference to it, and that they received in reply the letter offered in evidence. The letter is as follows:

"Gonzales, Texas, January 7, 1907. Baldwin & Christian, Attys. at Law, Houston, Texas: Gentlemen: Yours of recent date in regard to papers belonging to my grandfather, W. D. Smith, was received several days ago, and in reply will say that if the deed about which you inquire is in existence, it is probably in the possession of my uncle, Dr. Elisha H. Smith, of Victoria, Texas. He is the only one of the administrators now living, and I think has nearly all papers. Sorry I am unable to give you more information. Very truly yours, Sidney A. Smith."

The witness further testified that they then wrote to Elisha H. Smith, and received from him a reply which is as follows:

"Victoria Co., Tex. Jan. 16th, 1907. R. F. D. Route No. 7. Mr. J. C. Baldwin, Houston, Texas: Dear Sir: A letter of inquiry concerning title to part of Isalah Fields survey in Liberty Co. Tex. came to me some days since when I was quite busy and lost or mislaid the answer, so I write this to say W. D. Smith was my father, he owned several tracts of land in Liberty and in other East Tex. Counties though I do not recollect ever hearing him speak of the Isalah Fields and am sure he would have given over to purchaser all papers concerning any land which he ever sold. Father after moving to Gonzales Co. lived with my oldest brother, J. R. S. until after the war, then with the youngest, F. G. Smith at San Anton, several years and finally with Mrs. Jobe my youngest sister at Gonzales where he died, his papers were with F. G. Smith, father of Sid A. Smith of Gonzales, some with Mrs. Jobe's husband and some with J. E. Smith at Corsicana and it was not until after the death of those three, Dr. John R. Smith, Dr. John Jobe and Felix G. Smith that I came into the possession of papers which W. D. Smith left and there was nothing to show that he ever owned any part of survey mentioned in your letter. Please tell me on postal enclosed if you get this, etc. Yours, Dr. E. H. Smith. P. S. Mrs. Matilda Jobe now of Gatesville, Tex. would tell you if she knows of such a paper, she was with W. D. Smith nearly all the latter part of his life. Address to her at Gatesville, care of Mr. Royalty. Yours etc., E. H. S."

Plaintiffs were laying the predicate for the introduction of secondary evidence to establish the execution and contents of the deed from Fields to W. D. Smith, afterwards shown to have been executed in 1840 or about that time. In doing so it was required that they show that they had used reasonable diligence in searching for the original deed and were unable to produce it on the trial. It was material and competent in showing such diligence to prove, in connection with the testimony that letters of inquiry had been written to persons who might be supposed to be able to give some information with regard to the missing deed, that replies had been received purporting to be from the persons addressed containing the information shown in the letters quoted.

Plaintiffs (or their attorney) had a right to assume that the letters so received and purporting to be signed by the persons to whom his own letters had been addressed came from those persons. The exercise of reasonable diligence on their part in searching for the deed did not require further exploration of this source of information after receiving the answers to their letters, and this would be true regardless of whether the letters were, in fact, written and signed by the persons referred to, and whether the information given was true or not. The question is not whether these parties knew anything about the whereabouts of this deed, but whether plaintiffs had used reasonable diligence in exploring this source of information. He had every reason to believe that the letters received were in reply to the letters sent, and he had no reason to suspect that the contents were not true. He was not required to go further as to this source of information. The fact that he got the information in letters purporting to be in reply to his own letters asking it was the material thing in determining whether reasonable diligence had been used to get the missing deed. White v. Burney, 27 Tex. 50; Walker v. Pittman, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 519, 46 S. W. 117; Johnson v. Arnwine, 42 N. J. Law, 454, 36 Am. Rep. 527; 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1194.

The trial court did not err in overruling the objections and admitting the evidence. The assignments are overruled.

In proof of the missing deed, plaintiffs offered in evidence a certificate of the county clerk of Liberty county dated October 17, 1847, under his official seal, to the effect, in substance, that there was of record in his office a deed from Isalah Fields to Wm. D. Smith for 1,700 acres of land, a part of the headright of said Fields, also that he has in his office (filed for record) a power of attorney (with power to sell) from said Smith to Wyatt Hanks, of said lands. The deed records of Liberty county were destroyed by fire in 1874, and this deed was never re-recorded. Objection was made to the introduction of this certificate upon the ground: "That it is irrelevant and immaterial, and, if offered for the purpose of proving the existence of a lost deed, no predicate had been laid for its introduction." The objection was overruled, and the document admitted, to which defendants excepted, and the point is made the basis of the seventh assignment of error.

In addition to writing to Sidney Smith, the grandson, and Elisha Smith, the son, of W.

D. Smith, plaintiffs' attorney wrote to Mrs. Jobe, a daughter, to which he received no reply, and to J. C. Burns, an attorney who had at one time investigated the title for Wyatt Hanks, who replied that he had never seen this deed. Baldwin afterwards saw Elisha Smith, who was a son of W. D. Smith, and was told by him that he was administrator of his father's estate, and that he did not have the deed and did not know where it could be found. He stated that he had made a search for the paper and could not find it. The deed, if executed at all, was executed at some date prior to 1847, supposed to have been in 1840. The grantor had been dead many years. Wyatt Hanks, Sr., had also been dead about 40 years, as well as Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and Richard S. Hanks. Plaintiffs had every motive to search for and find and produce the deed. "A material inquiry in such cases is whether or not there was a probable motive for withholding this highest and best evidence." Jernigen v. State, 81 Ala. 60, 1 South. 72. The whole matter of the sufficiency of the proof offered as a predicate is left to the sound (though not uncontrolled) discretion of the trial court under all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Cheatham v. Riddle, 8 Tex. 167; Mays v. Moore, 13 Tex. 88; 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1194. The evidence introduced, to our minds, conclusively established the execution and contents of this deed. The trial court did not err in overruling the objection and admitting the evidence. The assignment is overruled.

The eighth and ninth assignments are without merit. The evidence abundantly sustains the finding by the court, in the eleventh and fourteenth paragraphs of the conclusions of fact, that the recitals in the judgment in the case of Sarah Fields et al. v. S. B. Cooper et al., under which defendants deraign title, and in the deeds in the chain of title, were sufficient to affect defendants with notice of the deed from Fields to Wm. D. Smith. The judgment in Fields et al. v. Cooper et al., describes the land allotted to Cooper as 320 acres conveyed to him by J. K. Hanks. The deeds from J. K. Hanks to Cooper describes it as one-half of the tract of land sold jointly to R. S. Hanks and Wyatt Hanks, Jr., by Wyatt Hanks, Sr., attorney in fact of Wm. D. Smith, duly recorded, etc. This latter deed describes the land as 640 acres out of the north half of the Isaiah Fields headright, being the east end of 1,700 acres sold by the aforesaid Fields to Wm. D. Smith. All of these deeds were of record in Liberty county when defendants purchased. One of defendants testified that he had no notice concerning the title except such as appears from the records of Liberty county. At least one of the deeds in his chain of title on record recited the execution of the deed from Fields to Smith as the basis of the title, and other deeds in his chain of title referred to the former deed. This Fields deed was in fact a necessary part of their own title, as shown by the judgment and by the various deeds under which defendants claim. We think this evidence was sufficient to affect them with notice, not only as to the 320 acres they got from Cooper, but of the entire 640 acres which came through this deed. It is incorrect to say that these recitals in their chain of title were sufficient to put defendants upon inquiry. They gave them positive and unequivocal notice of the existence of the Fields deed. The assignments and the various propositions thereunder are overruled. Willis v. Gay, 48 Tex. 469, 26 Am. Rep. 328; Wimberly v. Pabst, 55 Tex. 592.

There was no error in admitting in evidence the power of attorney from W. D. Smith to Wyatt Hanks, over the objection urged that it does not describe the land in controversy. The power of attorney dealt with the larger tract of which the tract in controversy is a part. It is described as a certain tract situated in Liberty county, a part of the Isaiah Fields headright, "my interest in said survey being about 2,000 acres as will more fully appear by reference to the county records of Liberty county." It sufficiently appears that the land conveyed was Smith's interest of about 2,000 acres in the survey as shown by the county records, which showed at that time the deed from Isaiah Fields to Smith, identifying the land as 1,700 acres off the north side of the league. The deed was not void for uncertainty of description. Extrinsic evidence might have been resorted to to show what land was owned by Smith in the Fields league. Hermann v. Likens, 90 Tex. 448, 39 S. W. 282. It would not, however, have affected plaintiffs' case if this power of attorney had been excluded. The deed of Wyatt Hanks, Sr., to Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and R. S. Hanks, conveying the 640 acres of land, was more than 30 years old. Possession was shown under the deed, and it purported to be made under a power of attorney from W. D. Smith. The execution of the power of attorney would be presumed without other proof.

The deed from Wyatt Hanks, Sr., to Wyatt Hanks, Jr., and R. S. Hanks was also objected to for uncertainty of description. The land is described in this deed as "640 acres situated in Liberty county east of the Trinity river about 25 miles above Liberty, and out of the north $\frac{1}{2}$ of the Isaiah Fields' headright league, it being the E. end of 1700 acres sold by the aforesaid Fields to W. D. Smith and conveyed to me, Wyatt Hanks, by power of attorney irrevocable by the said Smith, as will appear from the records of Liberty county." This described the land with sufficient certainty to be identified by the aid of extrinsic evidence, which is sufficient. Camley v. Stanfield, 10 Tex. 550, 60 Am. Dec. 219; Hermann v. Likens, supra. Assignments of error 10 and 11 presenting the questions are overruled.

The finding of the court that Fields had executed to W. D. Smith the deed referred to was, we think, conclusively established by the evidence. This evidence consisted of recitals in deeds conveying the land, all more than 40 years old, claim of title and actual possession, cultivation and improvement, payment of taxes, etc., under this deed, with the knowledge and acquiescence of Isaiah Fields in his lifetime and of his heirs after him, proof of the actual record of such a deed in Liberty county as early as 1847, and the testimony of one witness that Fields told him that he had "given the land to Smith," which could only have meant that he had conveyed it to him. The assignments of error that the court erred in its findings on this point because they are unsupported by the evidence as set out in the thirteenth and fourteenth assignments are without merit. Brewer v. Cochran (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 1033, and cases cited.

In view of the fact that the trial was before the court, the admission of the letters referred to in the twelfth assignment cannot be held to be reversible error, if error at all.

The court did not err in the 3rd, 5th, 7th, 9th, and 11th conclusions of fact, as set out in the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th assignments of error. We will not discuss or repeat here the evidence in support of these conclusions. It is amply sufficient to support the court's findings.

What has been said sufficiently disposes of the remaining assignments of error, which attack the conclusions of law that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and the judgment in their favor. The facts found can result in no other legal conclusion than that the plaintiffs are entitled to the land.

Finding no reversible error, the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

In an action against a railroad for damage to adjacent property, caused by excavating in a road which the company claimed was a part of its right of way, evidence held to show that the property had been actually damaged by the excavation.

15. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 70*)—COMPENSATION—INJURING PROPERTY—PURPOSE OF LAW.

18. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 90*)—COMPENSATION—INJURY TO PROPERTY—NATURE OF INJURY—RENDERING PROPERTY UNATTRACTIVE.

The construction by a railroad of a deep cut on its right of way would not entitle adjacent property owners to compensation for damage to their property, even though it had depreciated in value by reason of the proximity of the cut, if its construction did not render unsafe the street on which the property was situated; any injury because of the unsightliness of the cut not being actionable.

Appeal from District Court, Bowle County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

Action by Louis Heilbron and another against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hart, Mahaffey & Thomas, for appellants. Glass, Estes & King, for appellee.

HODGES, J. On the 12th day of June, 1907, the appellants, Louis Heilbron and M. C. Wade, began this suit in the district court of Bowle county, seeking to recover of the appellee damages in the sum of $10,000, which, it is alleged, resulted from the deepening and widening of a cut in the appellee's right of way adjacent to their property. The J. W. Johnson survey is a tract of land near the city of Texarkana, and was originally patented to Mrs. Ball and Mrs. Estes, both of whom were married women at the time. Some time thereafter, and during the year 1881, Mrs. Ball, joined by her husband, conveyed to the Texas & St. Louis Railway Company, for a recited consideration, a right of way 100 feet in width, running practically east and west through the Johnson survey. For some reason Mrs. Estes did not join in this deed, nor does it appear that she ever, at any time thereafter, conveyed any of her interest in the right of way. We think, however, the record will justify the conclusion that she acquiesced in the conveyance made by Mrs. Ball, and never at any time thereafter made any claim to any part of the railway right of way. The remainder of this survey was held in common by Mrs. Ball and Mrs. Estes till about the year 1891, when they made a partition of this property between themselves. In making the division the joint owners seem to have recognized the conveyance theretofore made by Mrs. Ball to the railway company, and the boundaries of the property which they divided among themselves were made without any conflict with the railway right of way. The deed made by Mrs. Ball conveying the right of way was duly recorded, and thereafter all of the taxes were regularly paid upon the property by the grantee and its successors. The Texas & St. Louis Railway Company constructed a narrow gage line upon the right of way soon after, and about the time it was conveyed, and that line has been continuously operated up to the present time. Some time after its construction the gage was broadened, so that it is now what is called a “standard gage road”; and the appellee, the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, has succeeded to all of the rights and franchises of the railway company to which the land was originally conveyed by Mrs. Ball. In 1904 the appellants for a valuable consideration acquired title to a portion of the Johnson survey, through Mrs. Estes, to whom that portion had been allotted in the partition before mentioned. The tract which they so acquired was located a few miles west of the city of Texarkana, on the north side of the appellee's right of way, at a point called Red Cut; this being on an elevation sloping from the north to the south, and where the railway entered a cut. This cut was variously estimated as being at that time from 4 to 6 feet deep at the deepest point. At the time of this purchase there was an old road that ran along on the north side of the appellee's right of way at Red Cut. Some of the witnesses testified that it was partly or wholly on the right of way of the railway company at that point. After the purchase of this tract of land by the appellants, they laid it off into blocks and town lots, providing for streets and alleys in the usual way, and designated it the "Red Cut Addition to the City of Texarkana." In platting the land the appellants laid off and dedicated, as one of its streets or highways, a strip 20 feet in width on the south side of their tract and adjacent to the north line of the railway right of way and parallel therewith. This was called Britton avenue. In June, 1905, the appellee railway company determined to lower the grade of its roadbed at that point, and for the purpose of carrying that into execution made considerable excavations on its right of way, both in the depth and the width of the cut. The testimony shows that after the work was completed the cut was about 15 feet deep at the deepest place, and that it had been widened on the north side until it was approximately from 36 to 42 feet from the center of the track, and was within from 8 to 12 feet of the north boundary line of its right of way. The wall on the north side, after the excavation, was left in a perpendicular condition. It is also shown that practically all of the old road which formerly ran along on the appellee's right of way had been destroyed by the excavation. It is also shown by the evidence that this excavation was reasonable and necessary; that the grade of the railroad at that point was too high, and that the company determined to lower it; that it became necessary to widen the cut in order to lay a temporary track while the roadbed was being lowered, in order to prevent interference with travel. The appellants claim that the old road which ran along on the south side of their property, and which, together with the strip 20 feet wide, constituted Britton avenue, was a public highway; and their recovery is based upon the depreciation in the value of their property occasioned by the destruction or serious interference with this highway. It is alleged by the appellants that the old road had long been dedicated to public use; that in making the excavations before mentioned the railway company had destroyed that road, and rendered the use of Britton avenue, or that portion which remained, dangerous, and that the cut, as it then existed, was a nuisance. At the conclusion of the testimony the court instructed a verdict for the railway company, and from the judgment so entered this appeal is prosecuted.

The only assignment of error presented in the record complains of the peremptory instruction directing the verdict for the defendant. The owners of the property testified upon the trial that, since the excavations made by the railway company at Red Cut, the market value of their property has greatly depreciated, estimated at about one-third of its original value. In order, therefore, to sustain the judgment of the trial court, it is essential that the facts show this to be a case of damnum absque injuria. As a basis for their right of recovery, the appellants urge that the old road on the north side of the railway right of way was a public highway, in which they, together with the general public, had an easement, and that its destruction seriously interfered with the travel to and from the addition which they had platted. They also claim that Britton avenue, the strip which they had dedicated, was menaced and rendered unsafe by the proximity of the cut and the process of caving of the banks since the cut was made. It is contended by them that the evidence adduced upon the trial which tended to establish those facts was of such weight that the issue made should have been submitted to the jury. If the old road before mentioned had been dedicated to the public, as claimed by the appellants, and was a public highway in the sense that the public generally had an absolute right to have it kept open and free from obstructions, the testimony showing as it does that it had been practically destroyed by the railway, then it must be admitted that the appellants had a cause of action, because we think the testimony would support a finding that the property had been damaged by reason of that fact. The issue, therefore, is whether or not the railway company had the right to destroy the old road. Owners of property abutting upon a public highway have a vested right in the easement created by the existence of the highway; and, when this highway is obstructed or destroyed, and the obstruction or destruction causes a special injury to the property owner beyond that which results to the public generally, such owner has a cause of action against the aggressor. Dooley Block et al. v. S. L. Rapid Transit Co., 9 Utah, 31, 33 Pac. 229, 24 L. R. A. 610; Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 403. There are various methods by which a public highway may be created or established. It may be by dedication by the owners of the fee, or it may be acquired by long use by the public, carried on in such a manner, and persisted in for such a length of time, as to give a right by prescription or limitation, or by being laid out and established by the municipal authorities, in accordance with statutory provision. In this action the appellants have specifically alleged that the road had been "dedicated" to the public use, but in their arguments they also insist that it became such by prescription. These two methods of acquiring an easement over the land of another are essentially different. Dedication is a setting apart by the owner for public use, while prescription is based upon a hostile use. Ramthun v. Half- man, 58 Tex. 551; Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 175. We have failed to find in the record any evidence of a dedication of this old road to public use.

Assuming that the deed from Mrs. Ball to the railway company had the effect of conveying only her undivided one-half interest in the strip of land designated, still it had the effect of vesting that interest in the railway company, and of making it a tenant in common with Mrs. Estes as to that portion of the land. No one could complain of the railway company's entering upon and making exclusive use of this land, except Mrs. Estes. After that conveyance no valid dedication could have been made, even by Mrs. Estes, of any part of the land upon which this right of way was located, without the consent of the railway company. It does not appear that any such attempt upon her part was ever made. There was offered in evidence by the appellants a map or plat of the Johnson survey, made at the time of the partition between Mrs. Ball and Mrs. Estes, showing the various subdivisions into which the tract had been divided. This plat shows two parallel lines marked across it, which, though not designating what it is intended to represent, may be regarded as indicating the railway right of way. On each side of these marked lines is written "narrow gage street," showing that the owners intended that there should be a space for streets on each side of the railroad. There is nothing to indicate what width they intended those streets to be, nor is there anything to show that they intended to locate them upon the railroad right of way. In the absence of proof to the contrary, we think it may be safely assumed that, if they intended to dedicate a strip of land on each side of the railway for public use, it was such land as they could lawfully dedicate, and hence was not upon the right of way. In order to constitute a dedication of private property for a public use it must clearly appear that the owner of the property intended to absolutely and irrevocably set apart the land for public use. Ramthun v. Halfman, 58 Tex. 551; Worthington v. Wade, 82 Tex. 28, 17 S. W. 520, and cases cited. The record fails to disclose any such evidence in this case, and we have therefore concluded that there was no evidence of the old road's having been dedicated to public use.

Neither do we think there was sufficient evidence to warrant a finding that a right of way had been acquired by the public by prescription, as is insisted by appellants' counsel. The testimony tended to show that this old road was merely a neighborhood road; that it had never been worked as a public road, and no authority was exercised over it by the municipal government; that it had been there since about 1881; that it was traveled by any one who wanted to do so; and that no objection was ever made to its use. It is further shown that the railway property was not fenced at that point, but that on the north side of the railway right of way embankments of dirt had been thrown up, variously estimated at from four to six feet in height, when the original cut was excavated. How much travel passed over this old road is not shown. There is nothing to indicate that it was more than a neighborhood passway, and used as a matter of convenience merely by the inhabitants of that particular locality. In this situation the record presents the case of a portion of the uninclosed right of way of the railway company being used, without objection, by the public in a manner that did not interfere with its use by the railway company itself. The question then is, is this sufficient to sustain a finding that the public had acquired a road by prescription? We think not. It is a well-established principle of law in this state that the permissive use of a road or way for any length of time does not ripen into a right. Ramthun v. Halfman, 58 Tex. 551; Worthington v. Wade, 82 Tex. 28, 17 S. W. 520; Gilder v. City, 67 Tex. 346, 3 S. W. 309; Stewart v. Frink, 94 N. C. 487, 55 Am. Rep. 618; Jones on Easements, § 282; Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 130. In this instance we feel that the testimony was sufficient to show only that the roadway had been used by the acquiescence and permission of the railroad company. To hold that the mere use by the public, without objection, of a portion of a railway right of way, and continued during the statutory period of limitation, or for 20 years, would cause the railway company to lose the use of its property, which it may need for legitimate purposes connected with its operation, would cause unutterable confusion, and bring about in this state a condition of affairs which would seriously interfere with railway traffic. A railroad is itself a public highway, constructed and operated for the public benefit; and some courts have gone so far as to hold that a right by prescription or limitation cannot be acquired against a railroad to any portion of its right of way. S. P. Ry. Co. v. Hyatt, 132 Cal. 240, 64 Pac. 272, 54 L. R. A. 522; N. P. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 171 U. S. 260, 18 Sup. Ct. 794, 43 L. Ed. 157; Jones on Easements, § 281, and authorities cited in note. There are many portions of railway tracks and rights of way, especially around and near depots in cities and large towns, where the public use the right of way for passing to and fro continuously, and where such use has been kept up, in some cases, far beyond the period of time necessary to create an absolute easement, yet no court in this state has ever treated such persons, when injured while using the railway right of way, as more than licensees. To hold that they had the same rights there which they would have if they had acquired a right by prescription to the use of the right of way would be to enlarge the liability of railway companies beyond that which any court in this state—or in any other state, so far as we have been able to ascertain—has ever gone. If, then, the old road located upon the appellee's right of way was not a public highway which the railway company was precluded from disturbing, the company had a right to destroy it, especially if in doing so it was using its property in a lawful manner.

If we are correct in holding that the old road was not a public highway, in the sense that the public had an absolute right to its continued use, then there is but one other issue involved, and that is, Were the excavations made by the railway company of such a character as to interfere with the free use and safety of Britton avenue? We are not unmindful of the rule that private property cannot for a public purpose be taken, damaged, or destroyed without compensation, and that this has been extended so as to protect the rights of an adjacent owner, whose land is not actually invaded by railway companies, from certain damages incident to the proximity of the railroad to his premises. Gainsville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Hall, 78 Tex. 172, 14 S. W. 259, 9 L. R. A. 298, 22 Am. St. Rep. 42. It has been held that, in the absence of some legislative or constitutional provision similar to that which is incorporated in ours, corporations, organized and acting for a public purpose, having legal authority to construct lines of railway, might be immune from liability for consequential damages inflicted upon private property. 4 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) § 1061. To place railways and other corporations exercising public, or quasi public, functions, upon the same plane, as to liability for such damages, with private persons was the purpose of our constitutional provisions prohibiting the taking, damaging, or destroying private property for a public purpose without compensation. Since the adoption of that provision railways and other such corporations stand in the same attitude as to liability with private persons. Gainsville, etc., v. Hall, supra; Jordan v. Benwood, 42 W. Va. 312, 26 S. E. 266, 36 L. R. A. 519, 57 Am. St. Rep. 859. We understand the rule to be that in order to constitute a damaging of private property, within the meaning of our constitutional provision, there need not be actual invasion, but there must be an interference with its free use and enjoyment, the production of some physical inconvenience, discomfort, or detriment. Aldrich v. Met. West Side Ry., 193 Ill. 456, 63 N. E. 155, 57 L. R. A. 237; 15 Cyc. 656, and cases cited in note 16. One of the appellants, testifying in answer to the question as to how his property had been injured by the deepening and widening of the cut, stated that it was unsightly and dangerous. We do not think it will be seriously contended that the unsightly appearance of adjacent premises can give a property owner any right of recovery.

Whatever the appellants' property may have derived in point of value by reason of the beauty of the scenery or the attractiveness of the surroundings occasioned by the condition of the appellee's property was not derived legitimately from the use of their own, but, to that extent, from the use of the adjacent property. One property owner is not bound to keep his premises attractive for the delectation of his neighbor, nor is he compelled to refrain from making them unattractive lest he might offend his neighbor's æsthetic sense. So long as his use of the premises does not interfere with the use by his neighbor of the latter's own premises, then there can be no actionable damage. In his testimony the above-mentioned witness did not state in what respect the excavation was dangerous. He did not say it rendered travel along Britton avenue dangerous; and it may be that he considered it dangerous to one only who went upon the appellee's premises. There were quite a number of witnesses who testified for the appellants upon the trial, and none of them gave it as their opinion, or stated facts which would justify us in reaching the conclusion, that Britton avenue was dangerous for those who traveled it. It is true one or two of the witnesses stated that the road was not now being traveled, but they gave as a reason that the water had been turned into a ditch running across the avenue, and this ditch had been so washed out that vehicles could not pass over it. In the absence of testimony showing that Britton avenue had been rendered unsafe for travel, and in that way ingress and egress to and from the property of the appellants had been interfered with, we do not think there is any well-grounded basis for damages, even though the property had depreciated in value by reason of the proximity of the cut. If the evidence had been sufficient to sustain a finding upon the trial that these excavations had substantially interfered with travel upon Britton avenue, or had rendered it dangerous, and in that way had affected injuriously the value of appellants' property, it would have been error to instruct a verdict for the appellee.

We have concluded, therefore, that the judgment should be in all things affirmed.

ANDREAS v. CITY OF BEAUMONT et al.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 17, 1908.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 11*)—MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS—SALOON LIMITS—VALIDITY.

Beaumont City Charter (Acts 29th Leg. Sp. Laws 1905, p. 435, c. 49, § 104), conferring on the city council the right to prescribe by ordinance in what part of the city saloons shall not be conducted, but providing that the city may not prohibit the business in the whole city, and an ordinance in pursuance thereof, specifying territory in which saloons shall not be allowed, and providing that the ordinance shall not affect liquor licenses from the federal, state, county, or municipal authorities then in force within the city limits, are not in conflict with the Baskin-McGregor Act (Acts 30th Leg., Laws 1907, p. 260, c. 138, § 10), a general state law providing that one desiring a retail liquor dealer's license may petition therefor, stating the place where the business is to be conducted, and, if the place be in any block of any city where there are more bona fide residences than business houses, the petition shall be accompanied with the written consent of the majority of bona fide householders in the block, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 63*)—DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER—MUNICIPAL REGULATION—POWER TO CONTROL TRAFFIC—SPECIAL CHARTER.

The Legislature can by special charter authorize a city council to prescribe saloon limits, and such an act is not unconstitutional as a delegation of its power to suspend a general law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 108-114; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 15*)—MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS—PRESCRIBING SALOON LIMITS—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE—DISCRIMINATION.

A city ordinance, fixing saloon limits, and providing that licensees conducting saloons outside the limits might continue until the expiration of their licenses, was not invalid as unreasonably and unjustly discriminating among different liquor dealers outside the limits, because one whose license expired before those of other dealers was prevented from conducting his saloon for the same length of time as the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 15*)—MUNICIPAL REGULATION PRESCRIBING SALOON LIMITS—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE—AMENDMENT—INEQUALITY OF TAXATION.

An ordinance, fixing saloon limits, and permitting dealers outside the limits to continue in business until the expiration of their licenses, was not invalid because a subsequent amendment to an occupation tax ordinance operated to exact a higher tax from saloon keepers inside the saloon limits than that paid by those outside, since, if there was an inequality of taxation, it alone affected the legality of the amended occupation tax ordinance.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County; L. B. Hightower, Jr., Judge.

Mandamus by J. H. Andreas to compel the city of Beaumont, through its tax collector, T. C. King, to issue relator a retail liquor license. From a judgment refusing the writ, relator appeals. Affirmed.

Teagle & Conley, for appellant. Marvin L. Curlock and Smith, Crawford & Lonfield, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. Appellant, J. H. Andreas, applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the appellee, city of Beaumont, through its tax collector, T. C. King, to issue to him a license to engage in the occupation of retail liquor dealer at a place without the limits prescribed by the city council of the city of Beaumont wherein saloons and grogshops could be conducted, which said limits were prescribed by ordinance under and by virtue of express power conferred upon the city council of the city of Beaumont by special charter granted by the Twenty-Ninth Legislature (Sp. Laws 1905, p. 435, c. 49, § 104). Appellant alleged compliance by him with all the requirements of what is popularly known as the "Baskin-McGregor Act," passed by the Thirtieth Legislature (Laws 1907, p. 260, c. 138, § 10), regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, the procurement by him of state and county license to carry on the business of retail liquor dealer without said limits, the refusal of T. C. King, the city tax collector, to issue him a license to conduct retail liquor business without said limits, upon tender of the amount of occupation tax assessed by the city council, and attacked the ordinance in question as being void because in conflict with the Baskin-McGregor act. He further alleged, in effect: That the city council of the city of Beaumont, by an ordinance adopted May 7, 1907, levied an annual occupation tax of $150 on the occupation of retailing spirituous and vinous liquors in said city, which ordinance was amended July 19, 1907, wherein, in conformity to the Baskin-McGregor act, the levy was increased to $187.50; that the saloon districting ordinance specially excepted from its provisions the increase of occupation taxes upon all persons engaged in such business without the district; there being several persons thus engaged, and as to them the annual occupation tax of $150.00 remained; and that the ordinance is therefore unconstitutional and void because the force and effect of same results in unequal and nonuniform taxation on persons engaged in the same occupation. He further alleged, in substance: That under the terms of said ordinance all licenses held by persons engaged in the saloon business without the district, which were in force when the ordinance went into effect, were not affected thereby and were specially excepted therefrom; that there were two such licenses other than his in force when the ordinance was adopted, one of which would not expire until January, 1908, and the other not until May, 1908 (appellant's license expired August 6, 1907); and that by the terms of said ordinance the anomaly is presented of permitting two retail liquor dealers to conduct and operate saloons without the saloon limits for six years and ten months, respectively, after his license had expired, and his right to conduct his business without the district had been denied him, and for this reason the ordinance discriminates against him, is arbitrary, unreasonable, and void. The facts alleged in the application were substantially proved. The court, after hearing the evidence, entered judgment refusing to grant the mandamus prayed for, and from that judgment appellant has presented this appeal.

The charter of the city of Beaumont, granted by the Twenty-Ninth Legislature (Sp. Laws 1905, p. 435), provides that: "The city council shall have the right by ordinance, to prescribe in what portion of the city of Beaumont saloons, grogshops or other places for retailing intoxicating liquors shall not be conducted and provide penalties for violation of such ordinance; provided the city shall not have the right to prohibit such business in the whole city." In pursuance of the authority thus conferred by the charter, the city council of the city of Beaumont passed an ordinance prescribing certain territory within the city in which the business of selling intoxicating liquors should not be conducted, providing penalties for the violations thereof, and providing, further, that the ordinance "should not be so construed as to affect, violate or vitiate any valid liquor or beer license issued by any federal, state, county or municipal authorities now in force within the limits of the city." Appellant, at the time of the adoption of the ordinance, was engaged in the business of retail liquor dealer within the territory in which such traffic was prohibited, as were two other persons, and their business was not interfered with during the life of the licenses held by them, nor attempted to be interfered with; and appellant continued in the business of selling liquors until his license expired on the 6th day of August, 1907, when, as before stated, he complied with all the requirements of the Baskin-McGregor act, tendered to the city the amount levied by the city as an annual occupation tax on such business, demanded of the tax collector a license to further carry on his business within the district in which it was prohibited, and the license was refused him. The Baskin-McGregor act provides that the place of business of a person desiring a license as a retail liquor dealer or malt liquor dealer shall be described in his application with reasonable certainty, and, "if the place of business be in any block or square in any city or town where there are more bona fide residences than there are business houses in said block or square, or in any block where there is a church or a school, then the petition shall be accompanied with the written consent of a majority of bona fide householders of the residences in said block or square."

Appellant contends that the charter provisions above quoted and the ordinance referred to are in conflict with and repugnant to the Baskin-McGregor act, and especially to the section quoted. We cannot so hold. Williams v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 107 S. W. 1123, was an appeal from a fine imposed for retailing liquors without the limits of territory prescribed by the charter of the city of Dallas in which the sale of liquors was prohibited. In that case, as in this, it was claimed that the charter and ordinance were contrary to the Baskin-McGregor act, and therefore void. Judge Brooks, speaking for the Court of Criminal Appeals, says: "We hold not. It is a well-known rule of statutory construction that, where two statutes can be given a construction to uphold both, it must be done, and we take it that the language clearly imports that, before one can get a license for the retail sale of whisky in any block where there are more bona fide residences than business houses, he must secure the consent of the majority of the bona fide householders. This in no sense conflicts with the saloon limit law embodied in the charter of the city of Dallas. * * * And further: " * * * It has been one unbroken policy of this state, where a local option does not prevail, to license the retail sale of whisky as well as the wholesale of intoxicating liquors; that the Baskin-McGregor bill is simply a continuation of the policy existing in this state almost since its earliest history; that there was no attempt on the part of the Legislature, in adopting said bill or law, to interfere with the pre-existing condition in cities and towns in this state with reference to saloon limit laws, and the Baskin-McGregor bill, being a general law, would not repeal by implication the pre-existing special law, to wit, the city charter of the city of Dallas, under a provision of which special law saloon limits are established." It is true that the saloon limits were fixed by the charter granted by the Legislature to the city of Dallas, while only the power to fix by ordinance such limits were conferred upon the city council of the city of Beaumont; but we cannot see that this difference affects in any way the question now under discussion.

Ex parte King (Tex. Cr. App.) 107 S. W. 549, was a case in which the relator was arrested by virtue of a warrant issued on a complaint charging him with a violation of the city ordinance of the city of Ft. Worth, which prohibited the conducting of saloons without the limits prescribed by the board of commissioners of the city of Ft. Worth, acting under a special charter which in terms authorized the commissioners, and made it their duty, to fix saloon limits within said city. In that case it was contended, as in this, that the power conferred by the charter upon the commissioners to fix saloon limits was repealed and superseded by the subsequent act known as the "Baskin-McGregor Liquor Law." Judge Ramsey, rendering the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeals, in overruling this contention, says: "The contention and claim of relator that the provisions of the special charter of Ft. Worth, authorizing the fixing of saloon limits, were repealed and superseded by what is known as the Baskin-McGregor bill, was passed on, in effect, in the case of Williams v. State, this day decided, in which this question was carefully considered and elaborately treated in the opinion of the court in that case. The opinion * * * is believed to be both well reasoned and well sustained by authority."

Paul v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 106 S. W. 448, quoted with approval in State v. Williams, supra, was an appeal from a judgment enjoining the defendant from selling liquors without the territory prescribed by the charter of the city of Dallas in which the saloon business might be conducted. In that case it was also contended that the provisions of the charter were inconsistent with the general or Baskin-McGregor law, and therefore the charter provisions must yield to the general act. Justice Talbot, of the Court of Civil Appeals of the Fifth District, speaking for the court, says: "We cannot agree with this construction of the law. It is well settled that special legislation or local laws are not repealed by a later general act, unless specially mentioned in the general law, or such purpose is made manifest from the plain provisions of the general law. Ex parte Neal, 47 Tex. Cr. R. 441, 83 S. W. 831; State v. Connor, 86 Tex. 133, 23 S. W. 1103; Ellis v. Batts, 26 Tex. 703; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 739, and note 3. In the authority last cited, after stating the rule substantially as we have above, though more elaborately, it is said: 'The reason which has been given for this rule is that in passing a special act the Legislature has its attention directed to the special case which the act was made to meet, and considers and provides for all the circumstances of that special case, and, having done so, it is not to be considered that the Legislature by a subsequent general enactment intended to derogate from the special provisions previously made, when it was not mentioned in such enactment.' Fitzgerald v. Champneys, 2 Johns. & H. 54. There is no mention made in the Baskin-McGregor law of the act granting the Dallas charter, nor to any of its provisions. If therefore the Baskin-McGregor act effects a repeal of any of the provisions of said charter, it is by implication, and not by expression. In his work on Statutory Construction (section 157), Mr. Sutherland says: 'It is a principle that a general statute without negative words will not repeal by implication from their repugnancy the provisions of a former one which is special or local, unless there is something in the general law or in the course of legislation upon its subject-matter that makes it manifest that the Legislature contemplated and intended a repeal.' Mr. Black, on this subject, says: 'When the provisions of a general law applicable to the entire state are repugnant to the provisions of a previously enacted special law applicable in a particular locality only, the passage of such general law does not operate to modify or repeal the special law, either wholly or in part, unless such modification or repeal is provided for in express words or arises by necessary implication. A local statute enacted for a particular municipality for reasons satisfactory to the Legislature is intended to be exceptional and for the benefit of such municipality. It has been said that it is against reason to suppose that the Legislature, in framing a general system for the state, intended to repeal a special act which the local circumstances made necessary.' Black, Interp. Laws, 116. It is also a well-established rule that when a general intention is expressed, and also a particular intention which is incompatible with the general one, the particular intention shall be considered as an exception to the general one. In such cases full effect may be given to the general law beyond the scope of the local or special law, and by allowing the latter to operate according to its special purposes and aims the two acts can stand together. The application of these principles seems clear. If it be admitted, which is not done, that the provisions of the Baskin-McGregor act and the provisions of the charter of the city of Dallas relating to the subject-matter of this controversy are repugnant to each other, yet we see nothing in the former act or in the course of legislation touching such provisions that renders it manifest that the Legislature contemplated and intended a repeal. The Baskin-McGregor law is intended as a general system for the state in dealing with the whisky traffic; whereas, the provisions of the act constituting the charter of the city of Dallas and relating to the same subject are local laws in their operation and enactment for the benefit of said city, which local conditions and experience dictated were necessary. * * * No such conflict in our opinion exists, and the provisions of the charter conferring upon the city of Dallas authority to license, tax, and regulate saloons and places where intoxicating liquors are sold, etc., and prohibiting the sale of such liquors and the establishment of such places outside of certain defined limits, must be considered as having been excepted by the Legislature out of the operation of the general statutes commonly known as the 'Baskin-McGregor Law.'" See, also, Garonzik v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 533, 100 S. W. 374.

Appellant further contends that the grant of power in the charter of the city of Beaumont to enact the saloon limit ordinance was an attempt on the part of the Legislature to delegate its power to suspend a general law, which, under the Constitution, it could not do; that therefore that provision of the charter and the ordinance passed under its authority were unconstitutional and void. This question was fairly presented for the consideration of the Court of Criminal Appeals in Ex parte King, supra, and in passing upon the point Judge Ramsey says: "The Legislature of this state is authorized to empower city councils by special charter to prescribe the boundaries and limits within which the sale of liquor shall be prohibited by law, and such local authorities may define and limit the area within which alone such sale may be lawful. This was distinctly ruled in the case of Cohen v. Rice, 101 S. W. 1052, by the Court of Civil Appeals of the Fifth Supreme Judicial District, in which case writ of error was refused by our Supreme Court. This is in accord with and is well sustained by authorities. 1 Abbott on Municipal Corporations, § 130; People v. Cregier, 138 Ill. 401, 28 N. E. 812; Mayor of Val Verde v. Shattuck, 19 Colo. 104, 34 Pac. 947, 41 Am. St. Rep. 208." This decision is by a court having jurisdiction over cases arising out of a violation of the ordinance under consideration, and not only meets our approval, but is by a court of final jurisdiction in such cases, and binding on us. The assignments of error raising the question are overruled.

Appellant attacks the ordinance on the further ground that, inasmuch as, by its terms, it did not interfere with two other persons who were also engaged in the saloon business without saloon limits, for the period of six and ten months, respectively, after the adoption of the ordinance, while he was denied the right to continue the business after a little less than three months after the ordinance was passed, at which time his license expired, was such unjust and unreasonable discrimination against him as to render the ordinance void. The facts disclose that, at the time of the adoption of the ordinance, appellant and two others were conducting saloons in the territory without the prescribed limits under licenses theretofore procured. The ordinance expressly undertook to protect alike all persons who, in good faith, had paid for and obtained license to conduct saloons without the limits, in order to avoid a forfeiture. No license has been issued to any person to sell without the limits since the ordinance went into effect. The ordinance applied to and affected all those not in the saloon limits alike, in that it permitted each to carry on his business as long as the license permitted him to do so. When appellant's license expired, he was bound to quit. When the licenses held by the two others expire, they are bound to quit; and the fact that the ordinance, instead of working a forfeiture of the license, as it probably could have done, permits each licensee to continue his business until his license expired by its own limitation, does not unreasonably discriminate against appellant because his happened to expire first. Commonwealth v. Petri, 90 S. W. 987, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 940. The assignment presenting the point is overruled.

It is complained, in the fourth assignment of error, that the provision of the ordinance that permitted dealers without the prescribed limits to continue their business until the expiration of their respective licenses results in unequal and nonuniform taxation, because such dealer had paid $150 occupation tax while dealers within the saloon limits, under an amendment passed after the districting ordinance was adopted, were required to pay an occupation tax of $187.50, so that those who were without the district were operating under a license which required the payment of a less amount than those operating within the limits; that therefore the ordinance was unconstitutional and void. The contention is without merit. Even if, under the facts stated, inequality of taxation resulted, it in no wise affected the validity of the saloon districting ordinance, but of the amended occupation tax ordinance only. The districting ordinance does not levy an occupation tax and is entirely separate and distinct from the amended ordinance levying the tax. The assignment is overruled.

The record discloses no reversible error, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Affirmed.

HESS v. WEBB et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 26, 1908. On Rehearing, Nov. 19, 1908.)

1. PARTITION (§ 46*)—PARTIES—NECESSARY PARTIES.

Where it becomes apparent that there are part owners of the property sought to be partitioned, who are not parties to the suit, the trial must be suspended until they are brought before the court, or a decree for partition will be reversed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 114, 115, 118-125; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 70*)—PARTIES—NECESSARY PARTIES.

Whether or not the persons named in a petition for partition as the only heirs of the deceased ancestor were the only heirs held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

3. DEATH (§ 4*)—PROOF OF DEATH—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Proof that according to family history a daughter and her husband and her children perished at sea, and that none of the family had heard of them since their embarkment on such voyage, though 50 years had elapsed, was sufficient, in the absence of contradictory proof, to show that they perished during the voyage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 6; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

4. DEATH (§ 4*)—PROOF OF DEATH—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A member of a family proved that another member had three children, two daughters and a son, that the son lived in another state, that the daughters married, that they had not been heard from for 12 years, and that it was not known whether they or their families were living or not. Held, insufficient to establish the death of the families of the two daughters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

5. PARTITION (§ 63*)—PARTIES—RECOVERY.

To entitle plaintiffs suing in partition for the entire interest remaining in the heirs of the deceased ancestor, they must show that they are the only heirs of the deceased ancestor, which is not done where the evidence discloses the existence at one time of other heirs not shown to be dead without other heirs than plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

6. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 3*)—RIGHTS OF CO-TENANTS.

One holding the title of one of the heirs of a deceased ancestor is a tenant in common with the other heirs and is not a mere trespasser so as to authorize some of the heirs to recover from him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1029*)—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

The error in allowing one to recover along with other plaintiffs in partition against a defendant claiming title by adverse possession does not affect the rights of defendant who was found not to have acquired title by adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1029.*]

8. PARTITION (§ 75*)—NECESSARY PARTIES.

Where in partition it did not appear that plaintiffs were the only heirs of the deceased ancestor, it was error to permit them to recover any more than their respective interests in the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

9. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 71*)—AUTHORITY—OBJECTIONS.

A defendant in partition, relying on title by adverse possession, cannot defeat a recovery by plaintiffs by showing that the suit was brought by an attorney without authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

10. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 71*)—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY—STATUTES.

The authority of an attorney to bring a suit can be attacked by defendant only in the manner prescribed by Rev. St. 1895, arts. 272, 273, authorizing a defendant by motion to require the attorney to show his authority, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

11. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ACTUAL POSSESSION.

A charge so worded as to make a party's right to recover on his plea of limitation in partition depend on his "cultivation, use, and enjoyment" in connection with his possession, is affirmatively erroneous and prejudicial; the law only requiring cultivation, use, or enjoyment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

12. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF DISPUTED FACT.

In partition in which the question whether plaintiffs were the only heirs of the deceased ancestor was in issue, an instruction that unless defendant, relying on a plea of limitation, had held actual and hostile possession for a specified time, the verdict must be for plaintiffs, was erroneous as assuming that plaintiffs were the only heirs of the ancestor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

13. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 13*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING POSSESSION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In order to constitute adverse possession there must be actual, visible, notorious, distinct, and hostile possession of the premises, cultivating, using, or enjoying the same for the statutory period.

14. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 15*)—RIGHTS OF CO-TENANTS—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

A purchaser of the interest of an heir in a tract of land of the deceased ancestor becomes a tenant in common with the other heirs, and after his purchase his possession is not adverse to them, unless notice is clearly brought to them that he claims the entire tract as exclusive owner, and unless his previous actual possession and cultivation of a small part of the tract was such as to support the statute of limitations as to the entire tract.

15. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)—HOSTILE CHARACTER OF POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

The evidence did not show 10 years' possession of a tract by a purchaser of the interest of an heir therein prior to his purchase, nor did it show that his possession and cultivation of a part of the tract was accompanied with a claim of ownership of the entire tract. The evidence was not clear as to any inclosure accompanied with use, enjoyment, or cultivation of any part of the tract by one acquiring title from such purchaser. Held not to establish adverse possession as against the other heirs of the ancestor.

16. PLEADING (§ 36*)—CONCLUSIVENESS OF ADMISSIONS.

The allegation, in a trial amendment filed by plaintiffs in partition setting up their claim for rents, that defendant had been in exclusive possession since a specified time, was not evidence of the fact of exclusive possession on the issue of limitation pleaded by defendant and denied by a supplemental petition.

An assignment of error, which presents several distinct propositions of law, and which does not in itself present a proposition, cannot be considered.

19. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 750*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—QUESTIONS RAISED.

A party complaining of the refusal of the court to give a charge, which erroneously assumed the existence of a fact contradicted by the testimony of witnesses, cannot complain of the refusal of the court to give a correct charge, on the ground that the requested charge sufficiently called the court's attention to the point, and the failure of the court to give a correct charge, after its attention had been called to a 21. PARTITION (§ 75*)—JUDGMENT—ERRORS—EFFECT.

Where, in partition, the evidence showed that the premises descended in equal shares to the nine children of the deceased ancestor, and that one of the children and her husband and children were dead, and the proof established beyond dispute that designated persons before the court were heirs and entitled to designated shares in the premises, the judgment should give to such persons their proper shares, and the judgment against defendant relying solely on title by adverse possession should stand, though the court erred in proceeding to decree a partition without having all of the parties in interest before it.

Appeal from District Court, Fayette County; L. W. Moore, Judge.

Action by R. C. Webb and others against Mrs. E. C. Hess and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant Mrs. E. C. Hess appeals. Reformed and affirmed in part. Reversed and remanded in part.

Brown & Lane, for appellant. John T. Duncan and Will A. Morriss, for appellees.

REESE, J. In the original petition filed in this suit, R. C. Webb and 25 others sought to have partitioned between themselves and Mrs. E. C. Hess and husband, Ida Smith and husband, F. E. Young, W. R. Young, Ernest Young, Jennie Young, and Mary Young (the last three minors), named as defendants, a tract of 100 acres of land, described as the Polly Webb tract in a partition of a larger tract among the children of John Sorrell. It is alleged in the petition that the plaintiffs are descendants and heirs of the said Polly Webb, long since dead, and as such own eight-ninths of said tract, being the shares of eight of her said children, and including the whole tract, less one-ninth interest belonging to defendants, being the interest of one of the children of said Polly Webb acquired by purchase by Wm. Young, the former husband of Mrs. Hess, and the father and grandfather of the other defendants. The suit was instituted in 1897. In 1905, the original petition having been lost, plaintiffs had leave to substitute, under which they filed a new pleading in lieu of the last petition, and also making several new plaintiffs whose rights had not therefore been asserted. The defendants F. E. Young and W. R. Young disclaimed any interest in the land. Defendants Ida Smith and husband and Ernest, Mary, and Jennie Young, minors, disclaimed as to all of the land except 17.4 acres, described by metes and bounds, as to which they pleaded not guilty and limitation of three, five, and ten years. Defendants Mrs. Hess and husband disclaimed as to all of the 100 acres, except 73.8 acres, which they describe by metes and bounds, as to which they pleaded not guilty, denied that plaintiffs had any title to any part thereof, and pleaded also the three, five, and ten years' statute of limitations. The case was tried with a jury May 3, 1907, who returned a verdict in favor of all of the defendants except Mrs. Hess and her husband, and as to them found in favor of plaintiffs for the "amount of 73 acres of land held by Mrs. E. C. Hess, less her one-ninth interest." Upon this verdict judgment was rendered quieting the title of Mrs. Smith and her husband and Ernest, Jennie, and Mary Young to the 17.4 acres claimed by them. F. E. and W. R. Young were dismissed on their disclaimer, and judgment for plaintiffs against Mrs. E. C. Hess and husband for eight-ninths of the 73.8 acres, with decree of partition, and appointing commissioners to set off eight-ninths to plaintiffs and one-ninth to Mrs. Hess. Her motion for a new trial having been overruled, Mrs. Hess and husband prosecute this appeal from the judgment.

As proper for a clear comprehension of the points at issue in the controversy, the following facts, substantially established by the undisputed testimony, are stated: Polly Webb was one of the nine children of John Sorrell, who died prior to 1850, owning a tract of land on the Colorado river embracing the Thomas Alley quarter league, and 122½ acres of another survey, in all 1,229½ acres. In 1850 this tract was partitioned among his children; Polly Webb receiving as her share the 100 acres in controversy, being a long narrow tract abutting, at the north end, on the Colorado river, and running back from the river south about 2,500 varas. Polly Webb died in 1851, and this tract of land descended to her nine children, to wit, Minerva Hughes, Sarah Rebecca Butler, Elisha Webb, Matilda Clemens, Mary Brown, Emily Terry, Caroline Risher, John Webb, and Robert Webb. William Young, the husband of Mrs. Hess, the father of F. E. and W. R. Young, and the grandfather of the other defendants, children of Robert Young, a son of William Young, acquired title to all of the lands divided among the heirs of John Sorrell in the partition aforesaid, except the 100 acres allotted to Polly Webb, and by purchase acquired also the title of Elisha Webb, one of her children, to his one-ninth interest in the Polly Webb tract. William Young died in 1873 leaving surviving as his heirs his widow, Mrs. Hess, and three children, to wit, F. E., W. R., and Robert (or R. W.) Young. Robert died leaving his widow, Mrs. Ida Smith, and children the minors, Ernest, Jennie, and Mary Young. Adjoining the Polly Webb tract on the east along its entire length is another tract of 100 acres, which, in the partition among the heirs of John Sorrell, was allotted to the heirs of Kitty Barnes, one of the children of John Sorrell. The title to this tract was acquired by William Young, and it formed a part of the body of land owned by him at his death, which included the entire John Sorrell tract of 1,229 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres, except eight-ninths undivided of the Polly Webb tract. In 1874 the widow and children of William Young by reciprocal deeds partitioned among themselves this body of land, in which partition 188 acres was allotted to each of the children, and 564 acres to Mrs. Hess; the land being community of William Young and wife. The sum of the different tracts was 1,128 acres, but in the several deeds it is stated that the land so partitioned was: "1,129 acres of land out of the Thomas Alley one-fourth league and the N. Woods tract, being the home tract of the community property of William Young, dec'd." The different tracts are described by metes and bounds, from which it appears that no part of the Kitty Barnes 100 acres was included in the partition deed, except 15 acres off of the south end, but that the entire Polly Webb 100 acres was embraced in the partition; 73.8 acres thereof being given to Mrs. Hess, and included in the field notes of the land conveyed to her, 17.4 to Robert Young, and 8.8 to F. E. Young. This 8.8 acres was sold by F. E. Young before suit, and his vendee was not a party, and that portion is not affected by the judgment. The heirs of Robert Young had judgment for the 17.4 acres, and that portion is not affected by this appeal. These two tracts were off the south end of the tract. The partition deeds were not filed for record until October 7, 1885.

Unless Mrs. Hess has title by limitation, the undisputed evidence shows title in the heirs of Polly Webb to an undivided eight-ninths of the 73.8 acres in controversy upon this appeal. It is contended by appellants that the uncontroverted evidence established Mrs. Hess' title by limitation of both five and ten years. On the other hand, it is strenuously insisted by appellees that the evidence was not sufficient to raise this issue. The court instructed the jury that "plaintiffs have shown a legal title, and should recover in this suit, unless the same be defeated by the pleas of limitation of the defendants."

The first assignment of error is based upon the action of the court in proceeding to judgment and decreeing partition of the land between Mrs. Hess, as the owner of one-ninth, and the plaintiffs, as the owners of the balance, after it was shown that certain persons, naming them, not parties to the suit, were part owners. Under this assignment, the following proposition is stated: "Whenever in the trial of a partition suit it becomes apparent that there are part owners of the property sought to be partitioned, who are not parties to the suit, the trial should be suspended until such part owners are brought before the court, and, unless this be done, no valid partition decree can be made, and one entered without such parties will be reversed." This proposition is undoubtedly correct and sustained by the unbroken current of authorities in this state and elsewhere. Holloway v. McIlhenny, 77 Tex. 637, 14 S. W. 240; Black v. Black, 95 Tex. 627, 69 S. W. 65; Maverick v. Burney, 88 Tex. 560, 32 S. W. 512; De la Vega v. League, 64 Tex. 212. It remains only to make application of this principle to the facts as shown by the record. The title of Polly Webb descended at her death to her nine children, and the plaintiffs named in the petition are clearly shown to be descendants of those nine children. The issue presented is whether the evidence disclosed the existence of other heirs of Polly Webb, not parties, or presented an issue on that point which should have been submitted to the jury.

The persons named in the assignment, not parties to the suit, who, it is claimed, were shown to be part owners of the land, are Catherine, Cynthia, Owen, John, Gibb, Sophronia, S. A., and J. Pat Butler, children of Sarah Rebecca Butler, one of the children of Polly Webb, Mary Brown, daughter of Polly Webb, Ella Tabor and her husband, and the two daughters of Emily Terry, a daughter of Polly Webb, also the seven children of Elisha Webb, a son of Polly Webb. Mrs. Butler was one of the nine children of Polly Webb, and was shown to have been long since dead. As to her heirs, A. T. Hughes, one of the plaintiffs and a witness in their behalf, testified that certain persons named in the petition as plaintiffs were the children of Mrs. Butler, and that they were all of said children that he knew of that were living; that there were some other children, but he thinks they died in infancy. R. C. Webb, a grandson of Polly Webb, whose deposition was read in evidence by defendants, when asked to give the names, ages, and places of residence of each of the children of Mrs. Butler, answered: John, W. P., Robert, Gibb, Sophronia, Catherine, Cynthia, Josephine, and Owens. The persons named by the witness Hughes as children of Mrs. Butler, and who are parties to the suit, are S. A., J. A., R. J., and Calidonia Butler, S. V. Brooks, S. H. Defee, and J. H.

Tabor; the three latter married women. Where only the initials are given, some of the persons named by R. C. Webb might be the same as some of those named by Hughes, as, for instance, Sophronia might be the same as S. A., or John or Josephine might be the same person as J. A. or R. J. Going as far as we can, however, in reconciling these two statements of the two grandsons of Polly Webb, it is clear that some of the persons named by R. C. Webb as the children of Mrs. Butler are not parties to the suit. The only inference to be drawn from his statement is that he is referring to the children of Mrs. Butler then living. No attempt is made to reconcile these two statements, and they raise an issue of facts as to who are the heirs of Mrs. Butler, and whether those named in the petition are her only heirs and entitled in this suit to recover her one-ninth interest. We think the court was not warranted in assuming upon this evidence that the persons named in the petition were the only heirs of Mrs. Butler. The issue should have been submitted to the jury.

As to Mary Webb, who married Brown and had two children, the evidence of the witness Hughes that, according to family history, she, with her husband and two children, perished at sea in 1855 or 1856, and that none of them had been heard of since their embarkation upon such voyage, was sufficient, when not in any way controverted, to establish not only that they were all dead, but that they perished at the time and under the circumstances stated. Johnson v. Merithew, 80 Me. 111, 13 Atl. 132, 6 Am. St. Rep. 162; Estate of Williams, 128 Cal. 552, 61 Pac. 670, 79 Am. St. Rep. 69.

This also disposes of the objection that the heirs of Elisha Webb were not parties to the suit. He sold his interest in 1858, and, if Mrs. Brown and her children were then dead, there was left in him no interest, as an heir of Mrs. Brown, to descend to his children. The death of Mrs. Brown and her children is established not solely as an inference from the fact that they had not been heard of in 50 years, but by the general reputation in the family that she perished in the particular manner and at the time referred to.

One of the plaintiffs named in the petition is Ella Taylor, one of the descendants of John Webb. The record shows that Hughes testified that Ella Tabor was one of the children of John Webb. He makes no reference in his testimony, as shown by the stenographer's notes, to Ella Taylor. We think that it may be assumed that this is a mistake of the stenographer in copying his notes, and that Ella Taylor was meant, which, however, should have been detected and corrected by appellees' counsel.

As to the two daughters of Emily Terry, who, it is objected, were shown to be entitled to an interest in the land, and who are not parties to the suit, the evidence shows that Emily Webb was a daughter of Polly Webb, that she married a man named Terry, that they are both long since dead, leaving as their only heirs a son, Robert Terry, and two daughters, both of whom married. Robert Terry is made a party, but neither of the daughters, nor any one representing their interest, except Robert. Appellees contend that the evidence was sufficient to show that they were both dead without issue or descendants, in which event Robert Terry would be entitled to their interest. The only evidence upon this point is the testimony of A. T. Hughes, who stated, speaking of Mrs. Terry: "She left three children. I only know one of them that is now living. She had a son, Robert Terry. He was living the last I heard of him a year ago. I think the balance of them are dead. Could not say positively, but I tried to find them, and I could not. Lived in Union Parish, La. They married and went away somewhere, I heard, but am not positive about that. Do not know where they are now. Have not heard of them in 12 years." Testifying by deposition, he said: "Emily Webb Terry had three children, two girls and one boy. The son, Robert Terry, lives near Farmersville, Union Parish, La. The two daughters both married. We have not heard from them for 12 or more years, and do not know whether they or their families are living or not." It seems that this branch of the family lived at the time of Mrs. Terry's death, in Union Parish, La. This evidence seems to have been taken as establishing the entire extinction of the families of these two married women, not only that they were both dead, but either that they had no issue, or, if they had, they were all dead. The evidence is entirely insufficient for such purpose. It amounts to nothing more than that Hughes, and possibly those of the family with whom he had communicated, had not heard of them in 12 years. No attempt was made to get the testimony of Robert Webb on this point. Turner v. Sealock, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 54 S. W. 358; Johnson v. Johnson, 170 Mo. 34, 70 S. W. 247, 59 L. R. A. 748; Francis v. Francis, 180 Pa. 644, 37 Atl. 120, 57 Am. St. Rep. 668; Latham v. Tombs, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 73 S. W. 1060; Martin v. Royse, 52 S. W. 1062, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 775.

Appellees contend that this failure of parties should affect only the decree for partition, and not the judgment establishing their title to the land; but this contention cannot be sustained. Plaintiffs sue for the entire interest remaining in the heirs of Polly Webb to the land, and the court instructed the jury that they had the legal title to this entire interest, which they recovered. To entitle them to recover in this measure, it was incumbent upon them to show affirmatively, not only that they were heirs of Polly Webb, but the only heirs. This could not be where the evidence disclosed the existence at one time of other heirs who were not shown to be dead without other heirs than plaintiffs. Mrs. Hess, holding the title of one of Polly Webb's heirs, was a tenant in common with the others, and not a mere trespasser in such sense as to authorize some of the heirs to recover from her the entire estate. She has as much right, as such tenant in common, to the possession of that part belonging to the other joint owners, not parties to the suit, as have the plaintiffs. Boone v. Knox, 80 Tex. 642, 16 S. W. 448, 28 Am. St. Rep. 767.

The first assignment must be sustained, and what has been said necessarily disposes of other assignments hereafter referred to.

The error, if any, in allowing John Sherman to recover, along with the other plaintiffs, it not having been shown that he was one of the heirs of Polly Webb, did not affect any right of appellant, and the same may be said as to Ella Taylor, if, in fact, the failure to show her heirship is not due to a mere clerical error on the part of the stenographer as heretofore referred to. The second assignment, presenting these questions, is overruled.

We have said it was error to permit the plaintiffs to recover anything more than their respective interests in the land. If any of the parties to the suit were barred of their right by the statutes of limitation, such right did not inure to the benefit of the other plaintiffs; but appellant should have recovered such interest upon her plea. In so far as these principles were violated, as set out in the fourth and fifth assignments, they are sustained. It is not clear that they were violated. As to other matters complained of by the assignments and the various propositions thereunder, they are overruled.

The sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth assignments present the same general question and cannot be sustained. During the trial appellant attempted to show that certain of the plaintiffs had not authorized the bringing of the suit in their names. The court excluded the evidence upon objection of appellees. This and the action of the court in allowing a recovery for these plaintiffs are assigned as error. In this connection it is proper to state that on the day of the trial, and before it began, appellant filed a motion to abate the suit as to these parties, which was overruled, and the ruling is made the basis of the twelfth assignment of error. We do not think that defendant should be allowed to defeat a recovery by plaintiffs by showing upon the trial that the suit was brought by the attorney without authority, nor can such authority be attacked except in the manner prescribed by the statute. Articles 272, 273, Rev. St. 1895. The motion referred to came too late, and was properly overruled.

The court charged the jury as follows: "You are charged that the plaintiffs have shown a legal title and should recover in this suit, unless the same is defeated by the pleas of limitation of defendants." This charge is objected to on various grounds, as set out in the fourteenth assignment of error. All of these objections have been disposed of and held good by what has been said in disposing of the first assignment, except that the charge eliminated the right of recovery by appellant on the issue of a presumed deed from Polly Webb or her heirs to William Young. We do not think that the evidence was sufficient to raise this issue, and the court did not err in failing to submit it.

The seventeenth and eighteenth assignments do not present affirmative error. If the charge objected to had been so worded as to make appellant's right to recover on her pleas of limitation depend upon her "cultivation, use, and enjoyment" in connection with her possession, it would have been affirmative and prejudicial error. The law only requires cultivation, use, or enjoyment. Railway Co. v. Hill, 95 Tex. 629, 69 S. W. 136. The error was, no doubt, inadvertent, and will not occur on another trial.

The following portion of charge No. 2, given to the jury at the request of appellees, as set out in the nineteenth assignment, is objectionable: "Unless you further believe from the evidence that the defendant Mrs. E. C. Hess for five years or more before the institution of this suit, and after the 7th of October, 1885, had and held actual, visible, notorious, distinct, and hostile possession of the particular portion of the land included in her said deed of partition embraced within the Polly Webb tract, cultivating, using, or enjoying the same, why then, in that event, you are instructed to return a verdict in favor of plaintiffs and against the defendant Mrs. Hess for that portion of the land in controversy now claimed by her." This charge contains one prejudicial error, not cured by other portions of the court's charge, in that it assumes that the plaintiffs named in the petition were the only heirs of Polly Webb. The first part of the charge, which seeks to apply to the case the principles announced in Turner v. Moore, 81 Tex. 206, 16 S. W. 929, is correct. See, also, Falson v. Primm (Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 834; Polk v. Beaumont Pasture Co., 26 Tex. Civ. App. 242, 64 S. W. 58, 2 Tex. Ot. Rep. 786. In this connection, however, in view of another trial, we will state that, if we are limited to a consideration of the evidence on the statute of limitation to which we are referred in appellant's brief, it is not clear that it raises the issue of the statute of limitations of either five or ten years.

By the purchase by William Young of the interest of Elisha Webb, he became a tenant in common with appellees of the land, and after that date his possession was not adverse to them, unless notice was clearly brought to them that he claimed the entire tract as exclusive owner, and also unless his previous actual possession and cultivation of the small portion at the south end was such as to support the statute as to the entire tract. This status continued until the record of the deed to Mrs. Hess conveying to her the 73.8 acres in controversy, unless notice was sooner, in some way, brought home to appellees that the possession, hitherto of a tenant in common, had become that of a claimant of the entire title. As we understand the evidence, it fails to show ten full years' possession by William Young of any part of the Polly Webb tract prior to the acquisition by him of the Elisha Webb interest in 1862. Nor does it show that his possession and cultivation of the few acres on the extreme south end was accompanied with a claim of ownership of the entire 100 acres. The evidence is not clear as to any inclosure accompanied with use, enjoyment, or cultivation of any part of the 73.8 acres by appellant after she acquired the title in 1874. The allegation in the so-called trial amendment filed by appellees, setting up their claim for rents, that appellant had been in exclusive possession since 1895, was not evidence of that fact upon the issue of limitation. The allegations of the answer setting up the defense of limitation was denied by a supplemental petition, and the statement in the trial amendment of appellees in connection with their claim for rents cannot be taken as an admission of exclusive possession on this issue, in the face of the express denial of that fact in the supplemental petition. Railway Co. v. DeWalt, 96 Tex. 121, 70 S. W. 581, 97 Am. St. Rep. 877, 5 Tex. Ct. Rep. 1006; Duncan v. Magette, 25 Tex. 246.

The twenty-second assignment is not so presented in the brief that it can properly be considered. It presents several distinct propositions of law, and cannot be considered in itself as a proposition. It does not, however, present reversible error.

What has been said sufficiently disposes of the twenty-third assignment. The facts did not raise the issue of presumption of a deed.

We think it hardly necessary, in view of what has been said, to discuss the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth assignments. The charge of the court on the issue of limitation of ten years was hardly as full, clear, and distinct as it should have been, in view of the different aspects in which the issue was presented.

The twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth assignments of error, complaining of the action of the court in refusing certain charges, cannot be considered. There is no statement properly showing that the evidence authorized the giving of these charges. In view of the disability of certain of the plaintiffs set up in the supplemental petition, if the evidence raised the issue of possession during the lifetime of their ancestors, or before the coverture of the plaintiffs pleading coverture, the jury should have been instructed as to the legal effects of such facts.

The charge requested and refused and made the basis of the thirtieth assignment assumes that Robert Terry was dead, but the evidence referred to in the statement shows that two witnesses testified that he was living, and one that he was dead. The charge was properly refused. Appellant cannot object, under this assignment, that, if erroneous, it was sufficient to call the court's attention to the point and require a correct charge. Such error should have been specifically assigned. El Paso El. Co. v. Harry, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 90, 83 S. W. 735.

It was error to permit the witness Reeves to testify, as set out in the thirty-second assignment. The statement was too general and indefinite to be entitled to consideration.

The third, thirteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, and thirty-first assignments, with their various propositions, are overruled without discussion.

It may be difficult in this case to show the names and residences of all of the heirs of Polly Webb so as to have a partition of the land. In case this cannot be done, resort may be had to the statute authorizing service by publication upon unknown heirs. All such heirs must be made parties in some way before partition can be had, but without this plaintiffs would be entitled to recover the title and right of possession to such part of the land as they may respectively show themselves entitled to, but no more.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

On Rehearing.

As will appear from the opinion in this case, the judgment of the trial court was reversed, and the cause remanded, for errors in proceeding to decree a partition of the property without having all of the parties in interest before the court.

On motion for rehearing, it is urged that the judgment in favor of some of the parties before the court for their respective interests in the land should be allowed to stand, and the judgment should be reformed to that extent and affirmed. Upon a careful consideration again of the whole case, we are of the opinion that this should be done, as none of the errors assigned are sufficient to require a reversal of the judgment in so far as it establishes the title of some of plaintiffs against the defendant Mrs. Hess for their respective interests. The verdict of the jury, which in this regard should not be disturbed, was against Mrs. Hess on her plea of limitation, and she has no other title.

Polly Webb's estate descended to and vested in equal shares in her nine children. Minerva Hughes, Sarah Rebecca Butler, Elisha Webb, Matilda Clemens, Mary Brown, Emily Terry, Caroline Risher, John Webb, and Robert Webb. By the death of Mrs. Brown, her husband, and children in 1855 or 1856, there were left only eight children to inherit the Polly Webb tract. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the persons so named as plaintiffs were sole heirs of Sarah Rebecca Butler, and Mrs. Emily Terry, and as to whether Robert Terry, named as her sole surviving heir, was alive. The evidence establishes beyond dispute that A. T. Hughes and J. D. Hughes are the sole heirs of Minerva Hughes; that Mary Brantley is the sole heir of Matilda Clemens; that Cora Durbridge, Carrie Rossiter, and Howard Risher are sole heirs of Caroline Risher; that William Webb, John Webb, Robert Webb, Ora West, Ella Taylor, and Minnie Woodward are sole heirs of John Webb; and that R. C. Webb, Rufus Webb, and Hattie Everett are sole heirs of Robert Webb. We are of the opinion that the judgment should be reformed so as to adjudge to said parties the one-eighth interest, respectively, of their ancestors, and, as so reformed, should be affirmed. In so far as the judgment disposes of the interests of those claiming to be heirs of the other children of Polly Webb and decrees a partition, it should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Upon the death of Mrs. Brown, one-eighth of her one-ninth interest was inherited by Ellisha Webb, and, when he conveyed to Sorrell, he, had in addition to his one-ninth interest, as one of the nine children of Polly Webb, this one-eighth as one of the heirs of Mrs. Brown, making his entire interest one-eighth. If his deed to Sorrell conveyed only his one-ninth interest, this left the balance of his interest, or one-eighth of one-ninth, to descend to his heirs, who are not parties. If his deed conveyed his entire interest, then Mrs. Hess owns one-eighth, instead of one-ninth. At all events, this one-eighth of one-ninth does not belong to the other plaintiffs.

Let the judgment be reformed and affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part, accordingly. Costs of the appeal will be adjudged against appellees.

Reformed and affirmed in part. Reversed and remanded in part.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. MORAN.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1908.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 74*) — DEATH MESSAGES — DELAY — IDENTITY OF SENDER — MATERIALITY.

In an action for delay in delivering a death message to a wife which prevented her from attending the funeral, she alleged decedent's employer's agent had sent the message in the employer's name, that if defendant had delivered it without delay plaintiff would have answered it and had decedent's remains sent home for burial, or would have telegraphed the employer to delay the burial until her arrival. Held that, in the absence of special exceptions, the allegations authorized submission of an issue whether, if plaintiff had sent a message, the "person or persons" having charge of the body would have postponed the burial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*) — DEATH MESSAGES—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to show that, if a death message had been received without delay, the addressee would have telegraphed the sender to delay burial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*) — DEATH MESSAGES — DELAY IN DELIVERY — EVIDENCE.

In an action for delay in delivering a death message, thereby preventing addressee from delaying, by a reply telegram, the burial until her arrival, she could show that the message was sent in the name of the person whose name was signed to the message by his employe, and that his employes were authorized to and did receive messages directed to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*) — DEATH MESSAGES—DUTY OF COMPANY.

That a telegraph company accepted and transmitted a death message implied an obligation to make prompt delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

5. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*) — DEATH MESSAGES — IDENTITY OF SENDER — MATERIALITY.

That the employer whose name was signed to a death message by his agent was in another state does not prevent the addressee from recovering for delay in its delivery on the theory that, if it had been delivered promptly, by sending a reply she could have had the burial postponed, where the agent who sent the message would have received any messages directed to the employer and would probably have postponed the burial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. L. Camp, Judge.

Action by C. Moran against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Webb & Goeth, for appellant. C. S. Robinson, for appellee.

FLY, J. This is a suit for damages instituted by appellee, alleged to have accrued by failure to deliver within a reasonable time a certain message delivered to appellant, in which was contained information as to the death of her husband in Louisiana, and requesting instructions as to the disposition of the body. The cause was tried by jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for $1,400.

On the evening of September 7, 1906, the following telegram was delivered to appellant at Grosse Tete, La.: "Mrs. C. Moran, North Olive St., San Antonio, Texas: Mr. Moran dead. Advise disposition of remains. details by letter. W. O. Robertson. 10:35 p. m." That message was delivered to Mrs. Moran between 11 and 12 o'clock on the morning of September 9, 1906. The body of Mr. Moran was buried at 6 o'clock p. m. on September 8, 1906. The deceased, husband of appellee, was working for W. O. Robertson at the time of his death, near Grosse Tete, La., which could be reached by railroad in 24 hours from San Antonio. The message was sent by Kendall, who was working for Robertson. Appellee immediately sent a telegram to W. O. Robertson on September 9th, asking as to what disposition had been made of the remains, and next day received a message that they had been buried at Rosedale, La. A reasonable time for the delivery of the message to appellee would have been 2 hours, and it was delivered in about 40 hours. Robertson was not in Louisiana at the time of the death of appellee's husband, and knew nothing about the message which was sent in his name to appellee. Mrs. Moran would have telegraphed for a postponement of the funeral had she received the message promptly, and the funeral would have been postponed.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

† Writ of error denied by Supreme Court.

The following allegations appear in the petition:

"And plaintiff further says if defendant had delivered the message to her at any time during September 7th, or on the morning of September 8th, she would have at once answered the same by telegram and had her husband's remains at once shipped to San Antonio, plaintiff's home, and the same could and would have reached San Antonio in time for plaintiff to have viewed and looked upon the face of her husband, and to attend and be present at his funeral, and the children of plaintiff and deceased to have viewed and looked upon the face of their father once more; or that plaintiff would have promptly telegraphed to W. O. Robertson to hold the body of her husband, that she would come to the burial, and she would have at once gone to Grosse Tete, La., with the children, and been present at the funeral and burial of her husband, and the remains would have been withheld from burial until she, together with the children, could be present at the burial of her husband in Louisiana. Or plaintiff would have gone to Grosse Tete, La., and directed the disposition of her husband's remains, or wired advice and made proper arrangements for his burial. But not receiving any answer from plaintiff to the aforesaid telegram, plaintiff's husband was buried by strangers at Grosse Tete, La., at about 6 o'clock p. m., September 8, 1906.

"That plaintiff desired to see her husband's face once more and to be present at his funeral, and desired that the children should once more look upon the face of their father and be present at the funeral. But when plaintiff received said message it was impossible for her to have gone to the burial of her husband or have his remains shipped to San Antonio; the said message having been received too late. Plaintiff further says that had a message been telegraphed by her to W. O. Robertson in answer to the one sent to her under his name and received, stating that plaintiff desired the remains of C. Moran, her husband, shipped to San Antonio, that the same would have been promptly shipped as directed by plaintiff, and she would have had the funeral of her husband take place in San Antonio from her home, and she, together with the children, could have attended the same, and they would have done so, or the body of her husband would have been kept out of the grave till she arrived in Louisiana and was present at the burial."

It is the contention of appellant that it was fundamental error for the court to instruct the jury as to their verdict if they found "that if she had sent such message the person or persons having charge of said body would have been advised of the contents of said message, if any, and would have postponed said burial." What appellant deems to be a fundamental error in the charge copied does not clearly appear, but we conclude from the statement that "the charge with reference to all other persons, except W. O. Robertson, submits an independent, material, and indispensable question of fact not found in the petition," that it is the ground upon which claim of fundamental error is based. The claim is untenable. The allegations of the petition, while general, justify the charge.

The message to appellee was sent by one Kendall, the timekeeper of W. O. Robertson. In the name of the latter, who was at the time in San Antonio, Tex., and could not have received any reply to the message sent to him at Grosse Tete, La., and through the first assignment of error the claim is made that appellee should not recover because she could not, as alleged, have sent a message to Robertson in Louisiana. The assignment is without merit. If the message sent to appellee in the name of Robertson had been promptly delivered, and if a message sent to him in reply would have been the means of keeping the remains of the deceased husband out of the ground until appellee could have reached them, it is utterly immaterial whether Robertson sent or authorized the sending of the message or not, or whether he would ever have seen a message in reply or not. The only question in this connection was whether, if a message sent in the name of W. O. Robertson had been promptly delivered, appellee would have wired a reply which would have had the result of causing the body of her husband to be held until she could have seen it. It would not matter if W. O. Robertson was the veriest myth that the imagination could create, still, if some one under that name was sending and receiving messages bearing on the death and burial of Christopher Moran, the allegations of the petition were answered by proof of such facts. When appellee did telegraph to W. O. Robertson, a prompt answer was returned.

We cannot sustain the contention, embodied in the second assignment of error, that there is no evidence that the plaintiff would have telegraphed to W. O. Robertson to hold the body of her husband as alleged in the petition. Mrs. Moran swore: "I would have sent them a telegram that I was coming at once, notified them, for the purpose of seeing his remains, to be at his funeral," and "I would have wired them to hold the remains; that I wanted to be present at the funeral. I would have gone immediately. I had the means to go, and I would have gone." It is clear that appellee meant by "them" the person who had sent her the message, and the jury was fully justified in so finding.

The court did not err in charging the jury as to whether, if the message had been promptly delivered, appellee would have promptly notified W. O. Robertson by telegram to hold the body of her husband until she could reach the place where the body was held and be present at the funeral. She so alleged, and she sustained the allegation by proof, which was not militated against by the fact that the real W. O. Robertson was in San Antonio. The man using his name was in Louisiana, and he, to all the intents and purposes of this case, was W. O. Robertson.

The allegations of the petition were sufficient, in the absence of special exceptions, to justify the charge complained of in the fourth assignment of error. It was entirely proper, under the allegations and evidence, for the court to submit the issue as to whether the "person or persons having charge of said body would have been advised of the contents of said message." It was developed by the evidence that other persons than Robertson had charge of the body, and the issue was as to whether a message to W. O. Robertson would have reached the person or persons, and whether he or they would have heeded the message. The petition was full and explicit enough to withstand a general demurrer and to justify the evidence upon which the charge was based. The authorities cited by appellant do not militate against the propriety of the action of the court below.

Appellee alleged that one W. H. Kendall had sent the message on which the suit is based, and had signed it "W. O. Robertson," and had paid the toll, and that appellant had contracted to deliver it promptly and had not done so, and that had she received that message promptly, she would have telegraphed W. O. Robertson and the remains would have been held. It will be seen that appellee put appellant upon notice that Robertson had not sent the message, but that another in his name had sent it, and that a message to Robertson would accomplish what she desired. If appellant desired a more definite allegation as to who would have received a message directed to W. O. Robertson, it should have invoked it through the medium of special exceptions. It is useless to argue that it would have been the duty of appellant to have delivered the message to W. O. Robertson in person and to no one else, in view of the fact that when the message was sent to Robertson it was delivered to some one else, and, when the service message was sent, it went to Kendall. It seems that it was customary to deliver messages directed to Robertson to his employés. Appellant was fully informed by the petition as to what evidence it would have to meet. Appellant seeks by assignments in this court to reach supposed defects in the petition which could only be reached, in the usual and orderly course of practice, through special demurrers. There is nothing in the petition that would lead to the conclusion that the holding of the body would depend upon W. O. Robertson; but, on the other hand, it clearly appeared that he did not send the message, and would not receive it in any other way than through the person sending the message. There is no allegation that W. O. Robertson would have held the remains, as is contended by appellant.

The objection to the testimony of H. C. Lewis is based on the predicate that the petition alleged that W. O. Robertson would in answer to the message have delayed the funeral, and, there being no such allegation in the petition, there is a necessary collapse of the objection. It was not definitely alleged that any certain person would have held the body, but the allegation was broad and general, and sufficient to justify proof that Lewis would have held the body.

It was proper to prove that the message was sent by Kendall, and that the employés in Robertson's camp were authorized to, and did, receive messages directed to him. Appellant is in no position to claim any surprise on these points, when it is shown that, in connection with the very message on which this claim for damages is based, it delivered two messages, addressed to Robertson, to his employés. It shows that it was following an established custom, and, if not, that it would have delivered any reply to the message from appellee to any employé of Robertson who applied for it, and Lewis did apply for the reply.

The circumstances tend to show that Kendall sent the message, and it appears from the telegram itself and from the fact of its delivery that appellant had accepted it and was cognizant of its importance. The facts were sufficient to show a contract to deliver with promptness. The very fact that the message was accepted and transmitted by appellant carried with it an obligation of prompt delivery.

The issue was not raised by allegation or proof as to appellee's ability to reach Grosse Tete in time for the funeral, but the issue was, would appellee have been able to have postponed the funeral until she could have gotten there, if the message had been promptly delivered? The evidence tended to show that she could have postponed the interment until she reached Grosse Tete. The whole of appellant's argument is based on the fallacious premise that appellee's case is destroyed by proof that Robertson was not in Louisiana and could not have received any messages. As the case was developed, it did not matter where he was, nor that he would not have received any message sent to him in Louisiana. The man who sent the message was there, and would have received any messages directed to Robertson, and would probably have postponed the burial.

The judgment is affirmed.

TEXAS & N. O. R. CO. v. JACKSON.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 25, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISKS.

A railroad employé assumes the risks ordinarily incident to the service he engages to perform, and such others, including negligence of the company's servants chargeable to it, as he knows of or must necessarily have known of in the ordinary discharge of his duties.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ASSUMED RISK.

In a personal injury action by a servant against the master, where it was not shown that the servant knew or should have known that the appliance which caused the injury was defective, there was no evidence to sustain the defense of assumed risk.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FAILURE TO OBEY RULES.

The violation of a railroad company's rule forbidding a servant from going between moving cars to couple them, etc., would not of itself preclude the servant's recovery for resultant injuries.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 882*)—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR—REFUSAL OF REQUESTS FOR INSTRUCTIONS.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; C. E. Ashe, Judge.

Personal injury action by Everett C. Jackson against the Texas & New Orleans Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a personal injury suit, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $8,000, and the defendant has appealed. The case was submitted to the jury upon the following instructions given by the trial judge.

"(1) Negligence, as a law term, means the want of ordinary care; that is, the want of such care as an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances.

"(2) Contributory negligence, as a law phrase, means such act or omission on the part of a plaintiff as an ordinarily prudent person would not do or suffer to be done under the same or similar circumstances, which, concurring with the negligent act or omission of a defendant, becomes a proximate cause of an injury.

"(3) By proximate cause is meant an efficient cause without which the injury would not have happened, and from which danger of injury might reasonably have been anticipated as a natural and probable consequence.

"(4) A railroad corporation operating a railroad, the line of which is situated in whole or in part in this state, is made liable by a statute for all damages sustained by an employé thereof while engaged in the work of operating the cars or trains of such corporation by reason of the negligence of any other servant or employé of such corporation; and the fact that such servants or employés were fellow servants with each other would not impair or destroy such liability.

"(5) An employer, such as a railroad company, is not required to furnish absolutely safe appliances, but owes to an employé the duty of exercising ordinary care to maintain the appliances with which he is called upon to work in a reasonably safe condition for the use of which they are designated; and negligence of any employé or servant charged with the performance of that duty, no matter what his rank or grade, is deemed in law the negligence of the employer.

"(6) An employé of a railroad company is held in law to assume such risks as are ordinarily incident to the service he engages to perform, and such others as he knows of or must necessarily have known of in the ordinary discharge of the duties of his service; but risks arising from negligence of the company's servants or employés that is chargeable to it are not assumed by an employé, unless he knows of them or must necessarily have known of them in the ordinary discharge of the duties of his service, and until then he has a right to assume that risks arising from such negligence do not exist.

"(7) An employé, in law, is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety in the discharge of the duties of his service, and if by negligence on his own part he contributes to the injury of which he complains, he cannot recover therefor.

"(8) If you believe from the evidence (a) that plaintiff, on the occasion in question, was in the employment of defendant as switchman, and as such engaged in the work of operating its trains or cars at Echo, and that, while so employed and engaged, he undertook to adjust the drawbars between two cars, and that he was, in so undertaking, acting in the ordinary discharge of the duties of his service, and (b) that, while so engaged and undertaking, he was injured by the bounding back of one of the cars, substantially as alleged, and that such bounding back was on account of the car striking another in which the knuckle of its coupling appliance was closed, and (c) that defendant had failed to exercise ordinary care to maintain the coupling appliance of which said knuckle was a part in a reasonably safe condition, and that on account thereof such coupling appliance was in a condition that kept the knuckle from being open, or (d) that said knuckle was not in such condition, but that some employé or servant of defendant, in the course of his service for it, left the knuckle closed, instead of open, and that he, in so doing, failed to exercise ordinary care, as before defined, and (e) that in either event such want of ordinary care was a proximate cause, as above explained, of plaintiff's alleged injuries—then let the verdict be for plaintiff, unless you find for defendant on the issue of contributory negligence or on the issue of assumed risk as submitted by the court.

"(9) The burden is upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence, to be considered in its entirety, no matter by which side adduced, the facts necessary to make out a case for his recovery, as submitted by the court in the next preceding paragraph, and unless such facts are so established, the plaintiff cannot recover.

"(10) Therefore, if you do not believe from the evidence that the car in question bounded back and injured plaintiff substantially in the manner alleged, or if you do not believe that the bounding back of the car, if it did so, was on account of the knuckle of the car it is alleged to have struck being closed instead of open, or if you do not believe that such knuckle being closed, if it was, was due to negligence of the defendant or of one of its servants or employés in that behalf, as before explained, or should believe that the company had used ordinary care to see that same was in a reasonably safe condition, or if you do not believe that such negligence, if shown, was a proximate cause of plaintiff's alleged injuries—that is, an efficient cause without which they would not have happened, and from which danger of injury might reasonably have been anticipated as a natural and probable consequence—then let the verdict be for the defendant.

"(11) Although you may find that defendant was negligent in the particular submitted, and that such negligence was a proximate cause of plaintiff's alleged injuries, yet if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff on the occasion in question, in shoving or attempting to shove the drawhead or drawbar to the car attached to the engine, if he did so, he placed his hand in a dangerous position, and that in either or both particulars such conduct, on account of its being contrary to the rule of defendant in evidence, if it was, or independent of such rule, was a failure on his part to exercise such care for his own safety as an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances, then let the verdict be for defendant on account of plaintiff's contributory negligence.

"(12) If you believe from the evidence that plaintiff's alleged injury was the result of a risk ordinarily incident to the service in which he was engaged as an employé of defendant, or that it resulted to him from a risk that was known to him or must necessarily have been known to him in the ordinary discharge of the duties of his service, then let the verdict be for the defendant on account of plaintiff's having assumed the risk.

"(13) In determining the issue submitted in the next preceding paragraph, you are instructed that if plaintiff's alleged injury was the result of defendant's negligence, or that of one of its servants or employés, chargeable to it as submitted by the court, then if plaintiff had no knowledge of the danger or risk thence to him arising until he was injured, and if he would not necessarily have known thereof in the ordinary discharge of the duties of his service until injured, the defense of assumed risk is not sustained.

"(14) The only alleged ground of negligence upon which plaintiff relies is that the knuckle on the east end of the stationary car in question was closed instead of being open, and to that ground alone must your inquiry be confined.

"(15) If your verdict is in favor of the plaintiff, then assess his damages at such sum as you believe from the evidence will fairly and adequately compensate him for the alleged injuries which you may find he sustained, taking into consideration as elements of damage, so far as shown by the evidence to result, naturally and probably, from such injuries, the following: First, mental anguish and physical suffering to him therefrom, if any, including such, if any, as you may believe from the evidence will in reasonable probability ensue to him therefrom in the future; second, the reasonable value of his lost time therefrom, if any, until now; and, third, the reasonable value, if paid now.

of his diminished earning power from such injuries in the future, if any.

"(16) You will, on the issues submitted, consider the court's instructions to you in their entirety, and not in isolated or detached parts alone, and be bound by the law as given you herein; but you are the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence and credibility of the witnesses, and by your conclusions thereon, under the law as given you in charge by the court, let the verdict be determined."

Special charges given at request of defendant:

"(1) You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, E. C. Jackson, while engaged in coupling and uncoupling the different cars in the yards at Echo on the evening of the accident complained of, at and prior to the time of said accident knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care in the discharge of his duties would have known, of the defective condition of the coupling apparatus on the east end of the stationary car against which the car he was attempting to couple bumped (if you believe such apparatus was defective), and that plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have known, of the location of said car, and that an ordinarily prudent person under the same or similar circumstances would not have attempted to make the coupling of the cars in the manner plaintiff did, and that such want of ordinary care on his part was the direct and proximate cause of his injuries, then he is not entitled to recover in this case, and if you so find you will return a verdict for defendant."

"(6) You are charged that if you believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, in going between the cars in the manner and under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, violated one of the rules of the company in that regard, but that such rule was habitually violated by the employees of such company; but that, notwithstanding such habitual violation of said rule, such act on the part of plaintiff was one which a person of ordinary prudence would not have performed under the same or similar circumstances, and was a want of ordinary care on his part, and that such want of ordinary care was the direct and proximate cause of his injuries then he would not be entitled to recover in this case, and, if you so find, you will return a verdict for defendant."

"(8) You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the knuckle on the drawhead on the east end of the car, against which the car which plaintiff was attempting to couple struck and rebounded, was closed, and if you further believe from the evidence that if said knuckle had been open there is a probability that said cars would not have coupled, and that said car which struck the stationary car would have rebounded so as to have caught plaintiff's hand, and that plaintiff in the ordinary discharge of his duties as a switchman knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have known, that such rebound might occur whether said knuckle was open or closed, and that plaintiff's attempt to couple said cars under such circumstances was a lack of ordinary care on his part, and that such want of ordinary care contributed to his injuries, then you will find for defendant, although you may believe that the company was guilty of negligence in leaving the knuckle on the stationary car closed."

Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood and Lane, Jackson, Kelley & Wolters, for appellant. Ewing & Ring, for appellee.

KEY, J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant's first assignment of error challenges the correctness of the sixth paragraph of the court's charge, and the proposition asserted thereunder is that an employee assumes such risks as arise from the negligence of his master as he has knowledge of, or might know and avoid by the exercise of ordinary care. The proposition asserted is too broad, and the charge of the court stated the law correctly. Ry. Co. v. Hannig, 91 Tex. 347, 43 S. W. 508; Ry. Co. v. Davidson, 107 S. W. 949, 20 Tex. Ct. Rep. 643; Ry. Co. v. Vizard (Tex. Civ. App.) 88 S. W. 461; Ry. Co. v. Stoy (Tex. Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 135; Ry. v. Englehorn, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 324, 62 S. W. 561; Ry. v. McClane, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 321, 62 S. W. 566. Furthermore, it was not shown that the plaintiff knew or should have known that the appliance which caused his injury was not in proper condition. This being the case, it may be doubted if the question of assumed risk should have been submitted to the jury. At any rate, there was no evidence which would sustain that defense.

Under the eighth assignment the appellant criticizes the court's charge upon the contention that it submitted an issue not raised by the testimony and too remote to be considered in deciding the case. We overrule that assignment, and hold that all the issues presented in the paragraph of the charge referred to were presented by the testimony and proper to be considered by the jury.

The third assignment is addressed to the action of the court in refusing a special instruction requested by appellant, stating to the jury that there was no evidence to sustain the second count in the plaintiff's petition, and therefore to find for the defendant upon that issue. In view of instructions given in the charge of the court, and especially the fourteenth paragraph thereof, it must be held that no error was committed in refusing the requested instruction. We must assume that the jury was composed of men of average intelligence and fairness, and, in view of the court's charge, there can be no reason to suppose that the jury was misled and decided the case upon any ground of negligence charged against the defendant, except the one specifically submitted in the court's charge, and to which the charge in express terms limited the jury's consideration. The plaintiff admitted that before the accident in question he was served with a copy of the rule issued by the defendant, which among other things, warned employees not to attempt to go between cars while in motion to couple them, to open, close, or arrange the knuckles or coupling, and that persons guilty of the violation of that rule would be discharged and not reinstated. There was some testimony tending to show that at the time the plaintiff was injured he was between two cars, one of which was in motion. There was testimony to the effect that the rule in question was, with the knowledge of the defendant, habitually disregarded, and that the plaintiff, in going where he did and doing as he did on the occasion in question, did that which was usual and customary on the defendant's road. Appellant requested three special instructions in regard to the rule in question, one of which the court gave and the other two were not given. The two that were refused were to the effect that a violation of the rule referred to by the plaintiff would constitute a defense, while the one that was given did not have that effect, unless such violation was such an act as a person of ordinary prudence would not have committed under the same or similar circumstances, and was a want of ordinary care on the plaintiff's part.

The fourth and sixth assignments of error complain of the action of the court in not giving the two special charges that were refused. For three reasons, those assignments will be overruled: In the first place, the refused instructions did not state the law correctly (Ry. Co. v. Adams, 94 Tex. 100, 58 S. W. 831; Ry. Co. v. Connell, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 533, 66 S. W. 246; Ry. Co. v. Still [Tex. Civ. App.] 100 S. W. 176); in the next place, they would have conflicted with the special charge given at the instance of the defendant upon that subject; and, third, appellant having asked more than one charge upon the same subject, and the court having given one, it cannot be heard to complain of the refusal of the others (Cane Belt Ry. v. Crosson, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 369, 87 S. W. 867).

The fifth assignment complains because the court refused the following requested instruction: "You are further charged that a railroad company is required to use ordinary care to provide its employees with safe appliances with which to perform their work, but it is not required to furnish appliances absolutely safe. Reasonable or ordinary care is all that is required. If, therefore, you find from the evidence that the defendant company and its servants had in this case used ordinary care to see and know that the drawhead in question was in a reasonably safe condition, then you must find for the defendant." This instruction would have added nothing not covered by the court's charge, and for that reason, if for no other, its refusal constituted no error.

The seventh and last assignment assails the verdict of the jury on five separate grounds. We overrule that assignment, and hold that in the particulars referred to, and in all other material respects, the verdict of the jury is sustained by testimony.

In concluding this opinion, we desire to express our approval of the trial court's charge to the jury. It states the rules of law and submits the issues to the jury with a degree of terseness, perspicuity, and accuracy which we have seldom, if ever, seen excelled in such a document.

No error has been shown, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; Arthur W. Seeligson, Judge.

Action by W. B. Fordtran against G. W. Stowers. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Masterson, Atkinson & Masterson, Cobbs & Cobbs, John H. Cunningham, E. T. Chew, and Geo. W. Graves, for appellant. Nat. B. Jones, for appellee.

NEILL, J. The appellant sued appellee to recover $5,000 as commissions alleged due him as a real estate broker, for services rendered in effecting a sale of certain real property of the latter. Plaintiff's petition, after alleging that on September 16, 1906, he was pursuing the business of a real estate broker in the city of Houston, Harris county, Tex., avers substantially that on the day aforesaid he entered into a verbal contract with defendant, whereby he agreed and undertook to sell, for a commission hereinafter stated, certain designated real estate for the defendant, which the latter represented to plaintiff that he owned and would sell and convey a good title thereto to any purchaser plaintiff could procure for him; that plaintiff, being engaged in such business, and learning that defendant was desirous of selling the property, after making inquiries and ascertaining that he had a client in the market for such property, endeavored to make arrangements with defendant whereby he could sell such property; that he had various negotiations, beginning in the early part of September, 1906, with defendant, and that, finally, on or about October 4, 1906, he went to San Antonio to see the defendant, when and where it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that, in case the former should procure a purchaser for the latter able to purchase it, the property could be sold for a sum not less than $200,000, part cash, and the balance to be paid for by the purchaser assuming an outstanding obligation against it of $75,000, and that plaintiff was to receive, in compensation for his services in effecting the sale, a commission of 2½ per cent. on the sum of $200,000; that in the conversation culminating in the agreement plaintiff represented to defendant that H. Masterson was a customer of his (plaintiff's), whom he had induced to make an offer to purchase the property for the sum of $210,000, to be paid by his assuming the $75,000 debt against the same, by paying defendant $85,000 cash, and conveying him Houston real estate to the value of $50,000; that defendant was not willing to accept the trade as an entirety which would compel him to take any real estate as a part of the consideration, but agreed with plaintiff that he might continue his agency to make the sale if he could convert any of the property Masterson proposed to convey into money, so the trade could be carried out, and to that end defendant allowed plaintiff 30 days to consummate the trade and convert the property, proposed by Masterson as a part of the consideration, into money; that notwithstanding the agreement that plaintiff was to have more time to consummate such trade with Masterson, defendant himself, before the time had elapsed, closed the trade with him; that defendant fully understood the terms upon which the sale was to be made by plaintiff to Masterson and fully ratified such terms, and authorized plaintiff to make the same, whereby defendant agreed and obligated himself to pay plaintiff 2½ per cent. commission on $200,000, the price for which the property was sold; that the refusal of defendant to accept said proposition upon the terms and conditions, as alleged, made for Masterson was for the purpose of depriving plaintiff of his justly earned commission, and defeat him by selling the property himself; that thereafter defendant went to H. Masterson and sold the property to him for $200,000, which was the amount paid and assumed by the purchaser to defendant for the property, such being the sum defendant had agreed with plaintiff to accept upon his procuring a purchaser; that when defendant made the sale, he had full knowledge of the fact that H. Masterson was a customer of plaintiff, and had been by him interested in the property, induced to consider the purchase, and procured as a purchaser of the property, plaintiff being the real and moving cause of bringing defendant and Masterson together and effecting the sale; that plaintiff procured Masterson as a purchaser, who was ready and able to carry out, at any time, the contract in accordance with the terms and stipulations made to him by plaintiff, as before alleged, and that therefore plaintiff has become entitled to the sum of $5,000 as his commission together with interest from date of sale. After making the averments, as above stated, the petition continues, verbatim, as follows: "Plaintiff further represents that, in pursuance of the said contract so entered into by and between him and the defendant, he used his utmost diligence, and worked faithfully to secure a purchaser for the property who was able to comply with the terms thereof, and that he did procure and bring to the said defendant the said H. Masterson, who agreed to take said property upon the terms and stipulations required, as hereinbefore set out, and could have, and would have, within the said 30 days sold said land received from said Masterson for not less than $45,000, but said defendant, so your petitioner believes, for the purpose of preventing your petitioner from receiving the amount of his compensation for the services performed—to earn the commission upon said sale—rejected the said Masterson, and endeavored to cancel his contract with plaintiff, although he knew plaintiff had performed the services faithfully and well, and that thereafter that said defendant himself, ignoring the rights of your petitioner, took up the sale with said Masterson, who would not have purchased from the defendant had it not been for plaintiff, and closed the trade for some less than he was willing to take for the property from plaintiff by closing the trade with said Masterson for the sum of $200,000 aforesaid. Wherefore, for the reasons stated hereinbefore, the said defendant, by virtue of said contract, became indebted to the said plaintiff in the sum of $5,000, as commission. The plaintiff further represents that said sum of $5,000 commission is a reasonable value of said services performed, and that said services performed, as hereinbefore stated, are reasonably worth the sum of $5,000, and that said sum was and is the usual and customary amount paid for such services on such contracts in the city of Houston, Harris county, Tex." It concludes with a prayer for $5,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from date of sale. The defendant answered by general and special exceptions (none of which was presented to the court) to plaintiff's petition, a general denial, and specially that, if plaintiff was instrumental in making the sale, his conduct, acts, and services in effecting it were purely voluntary, without authority from defendant or promise of compensation therefor, and that if any compensation is due plaintiff, it is by the purchaser, H. Masterson, and not defendant; and that the sale was made by one Morse & Stowers, and not by plaintiff. The case was tried before a jury, who returned a verdict for defendant, upon which the judgment appealed from was entered.

Conclusion of Fact.

The evidence wholly fails to show that any such agreement or contract as is declared upon was ever made by the plaintiff and defendant.

Conclusions of Law.

1. Under our view of the case, which will be exposed in considering other assignments, it is immaterial whether plaintiff was the procuring cause of the alleged sale or not. For, if our view of it is correct, it may be conceded that the undisputed evidence shows he was the procuring cause, still, as there was an absolute failure of evidence to prove other facts essential to his recovery, a verdict in no event could have been rendered for him. Therefore the plaintiff could not have been prejudiced by the third paragraph of the court's charge, as is complained of in the second assignment, even should it be construed to have submitted as an issue a fact proved by the undisputed evidence.

2. There was no error affording plaintiff any just ground of complaint in the court's charging the jury that, if they believed from the evidence plaintiff's conduct, acts, and services concerning the sale of defendant's property were voluntary, and without authority or promise from the defendant, their verdict must be for him. One of the essential elements of a contract is an agreement or meeting of the minds of the parties, by an offer on the one hand, and an acceptance on the other. This necessary element must be present in an implied, as well as in an express, contract. If it is absent in either, no obligation is created. The terms "express contracts" and "contracts implied in fact" are used to indicate, not a distinction in the principles of contract, but a difference in the character of the evidence by which a simple contract is proved. The same elements essential to constitute a contract of the one character are necessary to the existence of the other. If, then, the plaintiff's services in effecting the sale were voluntary, and without authority or promise from the defendant, as the jury found, and as we believe the evidence clearly shows, there was an absence of an essential element—"a meeting of the minds by an offer on the one hand, and acceptance on the other"—of a contract, either express or implied, and no obligation rested upon the defendant to pay plaintiff anything, though he may have rendered services in effecting the sale. It is for these reasons we have held the charge, complained of by the third assignment, not erroneous in so far as it affects plaintiff.

3. What was said in the conversation between plaintiff and H. Masterson in Houston on October 5th and 6th regarding the sale of the property, the defendant not being present, was not admissible as evidence for any purpose, save to show what efforts, if any, plaintiff made to sell the property to Masterson. Where testimony is evidence only upon one issue, and it is apprehended it may be considered by the jury in determining other questions, it is the duty of a party who desires to limit the jury in its consideration to such issue to ask a special charge to that end. Therefore the special charge, given at defendant's request, which is complained of in the fourth assignment of error on the ground that it so limits the effect of such testimony, was proper.

4. The court did not err in instructing the jury that, unless they believed from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant expressly employed plaintiff on October 4, 1906, as his agent to sell the property, they should find for the defendant. For it will be observed that the petition declares upon a verbal contract made on the day referred to in the charge, and specifically sets forth the terms of the agreement entered into between the parties, and its performance by the plaintiff. It, in connection with defendant's answer, presented the issues: (1) Was such contract made? And (2) if it were, was it performed by the defendant? Unless the first was established in the affirmation, there was an end of the case; for no one can ever perform an agreement that never existed. If there was an implied agreement constituting plaintiff defendant's agent to effect the sale, it should have been pleaded by specifically alleging the facts and circumstances from which the contract might be implied so as to enable the court to determine from the allegations whether they were such as, if proved, would constitute a contract. Certain it is that one cannot declare upon an express contract, and, failing to prove it, recover upon the same allegations by reason of such failure, on an implied agreement. If the language used by plaintiff and defendant in the conversation between them on October 4, 1906, which plaintiff introduced in evidence in support of his allegations as to an express contract did not show a verbal contract, it certainly cannot be taken as proof of an implied one.

5. The seventh assignment of error complains of the court's refusing this special charge: "The plaintiff would be entitled to recover if you believe from all the evidence that he was the moving and efficient cause of the sale even though the sale was made by the defendant at a price and upon terms different from those originally stipulated; and, if you find that the plaintiff was the moving and efficient cause of the sale, you will find in favor of him for the amount sued for"—requested by plaintiff. The effect of this charge is to assume as a fixed fact the affirmative of a controverted issue; i. e., that plaintiff was authorized by the defendant to effect the sale. Unless, as we have before held, there was a contract, express or implied (in this case, it must have been express as it was so alleged), between the parties creating plaintiff defendant's agent to effect the sale, the former, though he may have been the efficient cause of its consummation was not entitled to recover anything for his services. As in all classes of agents a broker has authority to act for his principal only by virtue of an appointment express or implied, by the latter. True no particular form is necessary for such appointment. Ordinarily all that is necessary to show is that the broker acted with the consent of his principal, whether given by a written instrument, by words or by implication from the conduct of the parties. This consent is the sine qua non to the broker's right to recover commissions for making a sale. For if the broker renders services as a mere volunteer, without authority, express or implied, the owner of the property is not bound to pay him anything for such services. Pipkin v. Horne (Tex. Civ. App.) 68 S. W. 1000; Ehrenworth v. Putnam (Tex. Civ. App.) 55 S. W. 190; Dunn v. Price, 87 Tex. 319, 28 S. W. 681; Cook v. Welch, 91 Mass. 350; Hinds v. Henry, 36 N. J. Powers*, 182 Mass. 467, 65 N. E. 826.

6. The same vice is apparent in special charges Nos. 3 and 6, the refusal of which is the subject, respectively, of the eighth and eleventh assignments of error.

7. The ninth, tenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth assignments of error complain of the court's refusal to give certain special instructions, requested by plaintiff, submitting the case to the jury upon the theory of an implied contract. The requests were properly denied, because the theory upon which they were based was not deducible from plaintiff's petition, as is apparent from what we have said in disposing of other assignments.

8. The substance of special charge No. 8, which the thirteenth assignment complains of being refused, is embraced in the second paragraph of the main charge, which fully, clearly, and accurately states the law upon the phase of the case the special charge was intended to cover. Besides, the requested charge does not confine the jury in its deliberations to the contract pleaded by the plaintiff, but would have authorized a verdict for him upon the proof of any contract defendant might have made with plaintiff to find a purchaser for the property described in the pleading, in which it was agreed to pay the latter 2½ per cent. commission on the amount the property was to be sold for, provided he procured a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy upon the terms specified in such contract. To authorize a recovery for a breach of contract the proof must show that the very contract declared upon was breached. Consequently the charge should be so drawn as to identify the contract sued upon, and confine the jury to it in its deliberations as to the issues of whether or not such contract was made, whether it was broken, and the damage ensuing from its breach. As there is no statement annexed to appellant's propositions under this assignment, as is required by rule 36 (67 S. W. xvi), we are not able to say, without reading the entire statement of facts, that there was not evidence of other contracts between the parties to which the requested charge would be as applicable as it is to the one declared upon.

9. The sixteenth assignment complains that the court erred in permitting counsel for defendant in his argument to state to the jury: "That he believed the testimony showed the claim of plaintiff was a concocted scheme to defraud defendant of $5,000, and an unholy alliance between a real estate man and a lawyer." The bill of exception upon which this assignment is based shows upon its face that the language was not excepted to when used, nor until the bill of exception was drawn, which may have been, for aught it appears from the record, after the court adjourned. For the record shows that plaintiff was allowed 20 days from adjournment of court to prepare and file bills of exceptions, that the court adjourned on February 1, 1908, and that the bill of exception was not filed until the 19th of that month. It is hardly necessary to say that a remark of the nature of the one in question should be excepted to when made, or at least during the trial. However, as the objection shown by the bill of exception was that there was no evidence of any such conspiracy between the land agent and the lawyer, and there is no statement subjoined to the proposition under the assignment in appellant's brief showing the lack of such evidence, we are not able to say as a matter of law that, notwithstanding the exalted character of their professions, an unholy alliance may not possibly exist between a real estate man and a lawyer. If, however, such an alliance is once shown to exist between them, it might be regarded by a lawyer, whose client is the victim of the conspiracy, as fraudulent per se.

10. The seventeenth and eighteenth assignments of error complain of the court's excluding certain testimony offered by plaintiff for the purpose of showing the value of his services. If the contract sued upon was ever made by the parties, it fixed the compensation he was to receive for his services. If it was not made, he was entitled to nothing on a quantum meruit. Therefore the testimony was properly excluded.

There is no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

9. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 309*)—CIVIL DAMAGE LAWS—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a retail liquor dealer's bond it is no defense that notices to other liquor dealers than defendant not to sell to plaintiff's husband were revoked, and evidence thereof could not be used except possibly to corroborate evidence that defendant's notice had been revoked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

10. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 293*)—CIVIL DAMAGE LAWS—DEFENSES.

ward her and their son when intoxicated was not pertinent.

12. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 306*)—CIVIL DAMAGE LAWS—DEFENSES.

In an action on a retail liquor dealer's bond for selling liquor to plaintiff's husband, an habitual drunkard, and after notice not to sell, her motive in instituting the action has no bearing on the case, and that part of the answer setting up that the action was fraudulently instituted for purposes of speculation should have been stricken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 306.*]

13. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 317*)—CIVIL DAMAGE LAWS—ACTIONS FOR PENALTIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on a retail liquor dealer's bond, wherein, under the pleadings, proof either that the husband was an habitual drunkard and liquor was sold to him, or that, after notice not to sell, liquor was sold him, would entitle plaintiff wife to recover, an instruction that the burden was on her to prove the material allegations of her petition was not calculated to mislead the jury to conclude that both phases of the case presented should be proved to justify a verdict for her.

Appeal from District Court, Colorado County; M. Kennon, Judge.

Action by Johanna Farenthold against William Tell, as principal, and others as sureties on his bond as a retail liquor dealer. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Brown, Carothers & Brown, for appellant. Adkins & Green, for appellees.

FLY, J. Appellant sued William Tell as principal, and W. C. Munn and T. A. Hill as sureties on his bond as a retail liquor dealer, for penalties arising from six several breaches of said bond in selling liquor to her husband, an habitual drunkard, and also after she had notified the liquor dealer not to sell liquor to her husband. The jury returned a verdict in favor of appellees, and from the judgment based thereon this appeal is prosecuted.

Before considering the assignments of error, we wish to dispose of the cross-assignments of appellees which seek a review of the action of the court in overruling their general demurrer. While the cross-assignments do not appear to have been filed in the trial court as required by rule 101, for district and county courts, still the question as to whether the petition is open to attack through a general demurrer—that is, fails to state a cause of action—is a fundamental one that may be raised without following the rules as to filing assignments.

The action in this cause arose under the law as to liquor dealers which was in force prior to the enactment of the present law, known as the "Baskin-McGregor Law," and the contention is that the latter law, being intended to cover the whole subject of liquor dealing, repealed all former laws on the subject, and consequently all prosecutions under the former must fail. That question has been fully discussed by Courts of Civil Appeals in several of the districts, and has been decided each time contrary to the contention of appellee. We are of opinion that those decisions are correct in holding that the Baskin-McGregor law did not repeal the provision of the former law which permitted aggrieved persons to recover the penalties prescribed for infractions of liquor bonds, but repealed only those parts of the former law in conflict with its provisions. Coughtry v. Haupt (Tex. Civ. App.) 105 S. W. 516; Jesse v. De Shong (Tex. Civ. App.) 105 S. W. 1011; Price v. Wakeham (Tex. Civ. App.) 107 S. W. 132; Markus v. Thompson (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 1074. The matter has been exhaustively treated in those decisions, and no good purpose would be subserved by a further discussion of it. The court very properly overruled the general demurrer.

All the defenses of appellees were contained in the following pleading:

"Further answering, these defendants emphatically deny that Herman Farenthold, the husband of plaintiff, is now or ever was an habitual drunkard; that he does not habitually indulge in the use of intoxicating liquors, but, on the contrary, is a sober and industrious man, and that the allegations to the contrary are untrue in fact.

"Defendants further represent to the court that if any legal notice not to sell intoxicating liquors to plaintiff's husband, Herman Farenthold, was ever served on the defendant William Tell, which is not admitted, but denied, then they say that the said defendant William Tell has never, since the service of said notice, sold or given, or permitted to be sold or given, at his place of business, or anywhere else, any intoxicating liquors to plaintiff's said husband, and they say that the allegation of plaintiff that he had so sold to her said husband is without foundation in fact and totally untrue.

"Defendants further represent that plaintiff alleges that on or about December 1, 1906, she notified defendant Tell in writing not to sell to plaintiff's husband any whisky, beer, vinous, spirituous, or malt liquors, or medicated bitters capable of producing intoxication.

"Now plaintiff avers that no such notice was served on him at the time alleged, and if plaintiff ever served him with legal notice not to sell such liquors to her said husband, which is not admitted, but denied, that same was done long previous to said date, the exact time plaintiff cannot state, but represents to the court that even previous to any such notice, and ever since the service of alleged notice, he has steadily refused to sell to Herman Farenthold any whiskies and liquors above mentioned; and these defendants here now respectfully represent, and state, that if any legal notice was ever served upon the defendant Tell, that the plaintiff subsequent thereto and long before the time of any of the sales, etc., to plaintiff, gave her consent to the defendant Tell to sell her said husband intoxicating liquors, and did prior to the time of any of the alleged sales, etc., withdraw said notice, and therefore these defendants say that the said Tell was released from said notice not to sell, and these defendants therefore aver and charge that plaintiff has brought this suit in a fraudulent attempt to obtain money by mulcting these defendants, and for purposes of speculation, and cannot, and ought not, and should not, recover anything of these defendants."

It will be noted that there is no plea that the liquor was sold to the husband of appellant in good faith without knowledge that he was an habitual drunkard, but, on the other hand, the only defense bearing on the question of the husband being an habitual drunkard is that he did not habitually indulge in the use of intoxicating liquors, but was a sober, industrious man, and, further, denial of the sale of liquor to him. The question of selling to him in good faith with the belief that he was not an habitual drunkard does not arise even by inference or implication from the pleading. The court, however, instructed the jury:

"If you find from the evidence that at the time charged in the plaintiff's petition the said Herman Farenthold was an habitual drunkard, and that while he was such drunkard, and after the 13th day of September, 1905, and within the time charged in plaintiff's petition, the defendant William Tell did sell or give, or permit to be sold or given, to the said Herman Farenthold, at the defendant's said place of business, any spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, or medicated bitters capable of producing intoxication, you will find for the plaintiff against all of the defendants five hundred dollars for each separate time that the said defendant so sold or permitted to be sold, or gave or permitted to be given, any of such intoxicants to the said Farenthold, substantially as charged by the plaintiff in her petition, unless you further find from the evidence that when the defendant Tell so sold or permitted to be sold, or gave or permitted to be given, such intoxicants to the said Farenthold, the sale or gift was made in good faith, with the belief that the said Herman Farenthold was not an habitual drunkard, and there was good ground for such belief, then, upon this branch of the case, you will find for the defendants."

The part of that charge on the question of good faith is attacked through the first assignment of error on the ground that it presented a defense not made by the answer, and is meritorious and must be sustained. The charge interpolated a vital issue into the case upon which the verdict of the jury may have turned. The verdict is a general one, and it cannot be said upon what issue the jury based it. It is the rule that where a charge presents an issue outside of those made by the pleadings, and upon which the verdict might have been founded, the judgment based upon such verdict should be reversed. Baldwin v. Peet, 22 Tex. 708, 75 Am. Dec. 806; Railway v. Terry, 42 Tex. 451; Loving v. Dixon, 56 Tex. 75; Railway v. French, 86 Tex. 96, 23 S. W. 642; Railway v. Vieno, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 347, 26 S. W. 230.

Appellant did not file a motion for a new trial in the court below, and neither was it necessary for her to do so in order to raise errors committed by the court in its instructions to the jury, as is contended by appellee. Speaking on this subject, the Supreme Court held in Clark v. Pearce, 80 Tex. 151, 15 S. W. 787, that while appellate courts should not reverse upon the question of sufficiency of the evidence unless that question was presented to the trial court in a motion for new trial: "In regard to the rulings of the court upon exceptions to the pleadings, the admission of evidence, and in the giving or refusal of instructions, a different rule prevails. Having once acted, it is not to be presumed that the judge will change his ruling; and hence, in order to appeal from such action, it is not necessary that it be made ground for a new trial." That ruling has been cited and approved in other cases. Telegraph Co. v. Mitchell, 89 Tex. 441, 35 S. W. 4; Railway v. Strycharski, 92 Tex. 1, 37 S. W. 415.

The question of good faith was one purely defensive, and it devolved upon the defendant to allege and prove it. This is not an open question in Texas. In the case of Lucas v. Johnson (Tex. Civ. App.) 64 S. W. 823, it is said: "The good faith of appellants in making the sale to the minor was a defense to the suit which, to have been available, must have been pleaded and proven by the defendants. The plaintiff was not required to prove that the defendants did not act in good faith in selling liquor to the minor to make out his case, and, not being required to prove such fact, it was not necessary for him to allege it." To the same effect are Haney v. Mann (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 66; Farr v. Waterman (Tex. Civ. App.) 95 S. W. 65. It would be intolerable to place upon those seeking redress in this class of cases not only the burdens of other plaintiffs, but also require them to anticipate, allege, and disprove any possible defenses that the defendants might desire to present.

The charge of the court on the good faith of Tell had no pleadings upon which to base it, and even if there had been evidence of a sale in good faith, admitted without objection on the part of appellant, the charge could not be sustained. Cooper v. Loughlin, 75 Tex. 527, 13 S. W. 37; Telegraph Co. v. Smith, 88 Tex. 9, 28 S. W. 931, 30 S. W. 549; Moody v. Rowland, 100 Tex. 363, 99 S. W. 1112.

If there was a revocation of the notice given by appellant to Tell not to sell liquor to her husband, the private opinion entertained by him as to the efficacy and legality of that notice could not affect its force and vitality, and neither could the motives actuating the making of the revocation affect its legality, and we cannot therefore sustain the second assignment of error, which complains of a charge on that subject. Tell swore that the revocation had no effect on his action in regard to the sale of liquor to appellant's husband, and that he did not sell him any liquor before or after the revocation. The jury, however, might have been convinced that Tell did sell the liquor after the revocation in spite of his denial, and yet, if they believed the revocation was made, it would be a defense to the sale. What Tell thought about the efficacy of the revocation, or what induced appellant to make the revocation, was immaterial, and evidence on those points should not have been permitted, and its elimination from another trial will remove any necessity or excuse for giving a charge similar to the one of which complaint is made. There should have been no issue in connection with the revocation, except as to whether or not it was given, which was a question purely of fact for the jury. The issue of revocation or no revocation was raised by the evidence. The illegality of the sale to the husband of appellant, in case he was not an habitual drunkard, depended on the notice given by her, and revocation or withdrawal of the notice at once removed him from the class of those to whom it was illegal to sell liquors. The wife, mother, daughter, or sister of any person has the power to place him in the class of those to whom the sale of liquor is prohibited, and has the power to withdraw him from that class by withdrawing or revoking the notice. The statute places the minor, the student of any institution of learning, and the habitual drunkard within the prohibited class, and no one has the authority to remove either of them from that class by consenting to a sale to him; but a different case is presented where the person is made a member of the prohibited class through and by virtue of a notice given by a person bearing a certain relation to him. She undoubtedly has the power to revoke her invocation of the statute. Tipton v. Thompson, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 143, 50 S. W. 641.

In connection with the revocation of the notice, it may be well to state that evidence of notices to other saloon keepers could not avail as a defense to Tell, for all other notices may have been revoked, yet, if the one served on Tell was not revoked, appellees would be liable to appellant on their bond. Testimony as to notices to other saloon keepers being revoked could not be used except possibly as a circumstance to corroborate the testimony that Tell's notice had been revoked, and the evidence should be confined by the charge to that purpose. A revocation of the notice to Tell was pleaded, and in order to make it avail as a defense it must be proved that the notice to Tell was revoked by appellant.

We do not see the pertinency of the evidence as to the manner in which appellant's husband acted towards her and their son when he was intoxicated. It did not tend to prove that he was an habitual drunkard, and could have had no effect except perhaps to justify the action of appellant in serving notices on saloon keepers not to sell him liquor. She needed no justification for that action. It was her statutory right, and one she could exercise whether her husband ever became intoxicated or not. The exercise of her right under the statute was in no wise dependent upon the manner in which her husband treated her and her son while in a state of intoxication.

The question of whether the suit was fraudulently instituted by appellant for purposes of speculation had no place in the case, and that part of the answer setting up such a defense should have been stricken out on exception. Appellant's motives in instituting the suit could have no bearing on the case. Johnson v. Rolls, 97 Tex. 453, 79 S. W. 513. That opinion held that the law allowing suits of this character was not passed in order to compensate the aggrieved person, but to inflict punishment on violators of law. The motives of the aggrieved person could therefore cut no figure in the determination of the case.

Under the pleadings in the case, proof either that the husband was an habitual drunkard, and liquor was sold to him by Tell, or that, after notice was legally served on him by appellant, Tell sold him intoxicating liquors, would entitle appellant to a recovery, and the court, we think, clearly and succinctly, so instructed the jury. We do not think that a jury would be led, by an instruction that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove the material allegations of her petition, to conclude that both phases of case presented by the allegations should be proved, to justify a verdict in favor of appellant.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

WELLS v. BENTLEY.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 19, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 995*) — REVIEW — PRESUMPTIONS.

The Supreme Court is required to give the evidence its strongest probative force.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 995.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 46*) — ESTABLISHMENT — AGREEMENT BETWEEN ADJOINING PROPRIETORS.

Where one adjoining owner at least, if not both, had regarded, before a survey, the middle of the lane which ran between their fences as the boundary between them, and after the survey the owner causing it to be made claimed all of the lane, and the owner first mentioned relinquished to him any right he might have in the lane, and thereupon he and the other owner agreed that the fence should be the line between them, there was such a dispute over the boundary line as to meet that requirement of the rule that boundary lines cannot be established by parol agreement, unless there be an uncertainty as to where the line is and a dispute as to it by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 216; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 66*) — HOSTILE CHARACTER.

Where an adjoining owner held possession and asserted title to land extending to his line, intending to claim to the particular line, his possession was adverse so as to ripen into title after the requisite period.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Conway County; Hugh Basham, Judge.

Action by W. P. Wells against O. T. Bentley. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sellers & Sellers, for appellant. Chas. C. Reid, for appellee.

HILL, C. J. This case involves the fixation of a boundary by Bentley and Wells' predecessor in title, one Ward. It was tried before the circuit judge sitting as a jury. Appellant principally relies for reversal upon this statement of the law: "Boundary lines cannot be established by oral agreement so as to bind the parties, unless there be at the time of the agreement an uncertainty as to where the line is and a dispute over the line by the parties to the contract." This was asked as a declaration of law, but the court refused to so declare it in this form, and declared it with the omission of the latter clause, "and a dispute over the line by the parties to the contract."

Appellant has favored the court with an interesting review of the law upon this subject; the argument being predicated upon the necessity of a dispute in order to make valid an oral fixation of a boundary line. As the court views the testimony, the discussion is academic. Giving the testimony its strongest probative force, as the court must, it may be fairly deduced therefrom that Bentley and Ward were adjoining proprietors, and a lane ran between their fences, and Bentley at least, if not both, had theretofore regarded the middle of the lane as the boundary between them. Ward caused a survey to be made, and immediately thereafter claimed all of the land of the lane. Bentley relinquished to him any possible rights he might have in the lane, as he said he cared nothing for it so long as the fence remained where it then was, and thereupon he and Ward agreed that the fence should be the line between them, and that the line now asserted by Bentley is the line of the fence thus agreed upon. Taking these as the facts of the case, then, under the law as contended for in the above-stated declaration, Bentley was entitled to recover.

It is unnecessary in this case to determine whether the statement in Sherman v. King, 71 Ark. 248, 72 S. W. 571, that, "when the boundary line between two estates is indefinite or unascertained, the owners may, by parol agreement, establish a division line," is correct as a general proposition or not, for, as above stated, the evidence here is sufficient to establish that there was such a dispute, which would render the agreement unquestionably valid. The contention of counsel is based upon the absence of that dispute; but, as the court finds that there is evidence to sustain its existence, it would be obiter dictum to proceed further with the discussion of the principles involved.

It is also insisted that a boundary line agreed on under mistake of fact is not binding by estoppel or otherwise. But this case cannot be distinguished in principle from Goodwin v. Garibaldi, 83 Ark. 74, 102 S. W. 706. Bentley held possession and asserted title to the land extending to this line, not intending to claim merely to the true boundary, wherever it might be, but intending to claim to this particular line, and, when so held for the requisite period of time, this confers title as therein shown.

Some other questions are presented, but the court fails to find error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from St. Francis Chancery Court; Edward D. Robertson, Chancellor.

Suit by Charles F. Frank and others against Clara Bell Frank and others. Decree for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with instructions to dismiss.

Jno. F. Frank was a resident of Memphis, Tenn., and died there on October 6, 1904, leaving a will containing six paragraphs. The first paragraph provides for the payment of his debts; the second is a devise of his residence to two of his daughters and one of his sons; the third provides a legacy of $1,000 for a grandson. The fourth is as follows: "I hereby give, devise and bequeath to my seven children and legal heirs, to wit, Chas. F., Robt. B., John L., Walter A., Clara M., Elizabeth G. and Leonora F. Frank, now Mrs. S. A. Bowen, all my property, real, personal and mixed, wheresoever situated, not already disposed of, which I now own or may hereafter acquire and of which I may die seised and possessed, absolutely and in fee simple and in equal shares. The division shall be made by three commissioners to be appointed by my said children, and the lots and parcels of land so divided shall be drawn for by them and any difference in the valuation be settled among themselves. The property of my daughters, however, shall be held and owned by them for their sole and separate use and enjoyment, free from the debts and contracts of any husbands, for and during their natural lives with remainder in fee to their children, and in default of children surviving either of them, then to my children who shall then be living, their heirs and assigns forever; and should any of my sons die without issue, his or their shares shall also revert to my children then living, their heirs and assigns forever." The fifth paragraph is a provision that no lawyer's fees or court costs whatever be charged to his estate, and any heir desiring to employ an attorney should do so at his own individual expense. The sixth appointed three executors, and made provision for choosing their successors. Mr. Frank owned large tracts of land in Lee, Crittenden, and St. Francis counties, Ark. He left seven children surviving him. The children were all adults, and there were eight grandchildren, all of whom were minors. His children filed suit in the chancery court of St. Francis county against the grandchildren and the executors, seeking a construction of the will. They set forth the ownership of the land in said county, and other counties in Arkansas, by Mr. Frank at his death, the execution of his will and its due probate in Shelby county, Tenn., the names and residences of his children and grandchildren, and of the executors of the will, and that duly authenticated copies of the will had been filed with the clerk of each of said counties, and had been duly admitted to probate by the probate courts of Lee, Crittenden, and St. Francis counties, and set forth that the executors had duly qualified in the state of Tennessee, and are proceeding with the administration of said estate in the state of Tennessee, and have paid, or will pay, all of the debts and liabilities of every character, and have ample personal assets for that purpose, so that the said executors have not and will not qualify in the state of Arkansas, as there is no occasion for their doing so. And they further alleged that the legacy given by the said will to the grandson had been paid, or would be paid, by the executors in Tennessee, and there is no necessity or occasion for taking such legacy into account for the purposes of this suit. They further alleged that a suit had been brought and is now pending in the chancery court of Shelby county, Tenn., for a construction of the will of said John F. Frank, and that such court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the executors named in said will, and that the children of said Frank are the plaintiffs, and his grandchildren are the defendants, therein, and that said suit will be finally settled and determined with reference to the real estate located in the state of Tennessee, and all the personal property wheresoever situated, but that said court has no jurisdiction to establish the title to the lands in Arkansas; and for that reason this suit was brought for the purpose of obtaining a construction and interpretation of the titles derived by the parties to the suit to the lands devised by the fourth paragraph of the will. The plaintiffs alleged that by a proper construction and interpretation of the said fourth paragraph the testator had attempted to limit a remainder in the lands upon a previous gift or devise thereof to the plaintiffs, respectively, in fee simple and equally, and charged that under the laws of Arkansas it was not lawful to dispose of the fee in said lands, and then to create and limit a remainder upon such fee, and then to control and circumscribe the disposition of the fee, as was attempted in the will; and they allege that the plaintiffs take an absolute fee-simple title, and that the remainders and cross-remainders to the children of the testator, or his grandchildren or descendants, as therein provided, are void and without effect. But they allege that, in consequence of the probate of the will, and because it disposes of all the said lands and contains provisions as above stated, it is necessary, in order that the titles of the plaintiffs may not be incumbered and embarrassed, and that they may be able to hold, use, enjoy, and dispose of their lands according to their title and rights under the laws, that the court should put a construction and an interpretation upon the fourth paragraph of said will, and ascertain and declare and decree the legal effect thereof, so that the titles and rights of the parties may be fixed and established, and that it may be known just what they are, and just what can be relied upon by all persons having occasion to deal with the same. It was prayed that the defendants be brought in under proper process, and guardians ad litem appointed for the minors, they having no regular guardians, and that the court put a proper construction and interpretation upon every part of the will, particularly the fourth paragraph; ascertain and fix the rights of the plaintiffs and defendants in the lands, which were described at length in the complaint, and their shares therein, and that the same be declared vested in the plaintiffs in fee equally, share and share alike, and not subject to the remainders and provisions of the said fourth clause of the will limiting their titles and rights, and restricting and circumscribing their powers of disposition, and that such provisions be declared and decreed to be of no force and effect. The minor defendants were all brought properly into court, and filed answer through their guardian ad litem, taking issue with the construction which the plaintiffs placed upon the will, and denying that the plaintiffs became seised in the fee simple of the real estate, and asserted that the proper construction of the fourth paragraph of the will was to devise the real estate to the plaintiffs for their natural lives, with a remainder in fee to the children of said plaintiffs; and they asked that the court place such construction upon the will. The defendants also filed a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. This demurrer does not appear to have been acted upon by the court. Testimony was taken, which only went to prove the children and grandchildren left by Mr. Frank at the time of his death, and of the pendency of the suit in Tennessee, and other matters of fact alleged in the complaint. It was proved that all of the indebtedness of the estate had been discharged. The executors made no answer to the complaint, and accepted service of notice to take depositions. The case was heard on the complaint and its exhibits, and the answer of the infant defendants by their guardian ad litem, the evidence of service showing that the nonresident defendants were properly summoned, and the will and the depositions. The court construed the will as prayed in the complaint. The infant defendants by their guardian ad litem excepted to the same, and took an appeal.

John Gatling, for appellants. W. M. Randolph, George Randolph, and Wassell Randolph, for appellees.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). As will be seen by reference to the statement of facts, this is a bill brought by the children of Jno. F. Frank to obtain a construction of the fourth paragraph of his will; the children maintaining that thereunder they obtained a fee-simple title to the lands devised in said paragraph, and the answer of the guardian ad litem of the grandchildren maintaining that the children obtained a life estate, with a vested remainder in the grandchildren. There is no trust involved, no trust estate is created, and the executors are not seeking aid or instruction in the discharge of their duties. The indebtedness of the estate has been paid. The sole question sought to be determined is the title conveyed to the respective parties to this suit under the fourth clause of the will. No controversy has arisen over it, the object of the suit appears to be to prevent, rather than to settle, a controversy. There are no equitable titles or trusts created by the will. The titles conferred by the fourth paragraph—whatever they may be—are purely legal and capable of assertion in a court of law. Has a chancery court jurisdiction to entertain this suit? Mr. Pomeroy says: "Although there is not an entire uniformity in the decisions by courts of different states upon this particular subject, yet the doctrine which seems to be both in harmony with principle and sustained by the weight of authority is that the special equitable jurisdiction to construe wills is simply an incident of the general jurisdiction over trusts; that a court of equity will never entertain a suit brought solely for the purpose of interpreting the provisions of a will, without any further relief, and will never exercise a power to interpret a will which only deals with and disposes of purely legal estates or interests, and which makes no attempt to create any trust relations with respect to the property donated." 3 Pomeroy's Equity Jur. (3d Ed.) 1156. This statement was quoted and followed in Head v. Phillips, 70 Ark. 432, 68 S. W. 878, and an examination of the authorities proves it to be sound: The same principle is thus stated in the Encyclopædia of Pleading & Practice: "In fact, by the great preponderance of authority, the power of courts of equity to construe wills is simply an incident of their general jurisdiction over trusts; and, while such power will be exercised liberally on behalf of executors, trustees, or other persons interested in trusts created by wills, suits brought solely for the construction of wills, where no trust is involved, will not be entertained." 22 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1191. The Court of Appeals of New York said: "It is by reason of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery over trusts that courts having equity powers as an incident of that jurisdiction take cognizance of, and pass upon, the interpretation of wills. They do not take jurisdiction of actions brought solely for the construction of instruments of that character, or when only legal rights are in controversy." Chipman v. Montgomery, 63 N. Y. 221. In Bailey v. Briggs, 56 N. Y. 407, it is thus expressed: "It is when the court is moved in behalf of an executor, trustee, or cestui que trust, and to insure a correct administration of the power conferred by a will, that jurisdiction is had to give a construction to a doubtful or disputed clause in a will. The jurisdiction is incidental to that over trusts." The Illinois court said: "Where no trust is created, the law, as we understand it, is that neither the executor, nor the heir or the devisee who claims only a legal title in the estate, will be permitted to come into a court of equity for the purpose of obtaining a judicial construction of the provisions of the will." Strubher v. Belsey, 79 Ill. 307. This case was followed and reiterated in Harrison v. Owsley, 172 Ill. 629, 50 N. E. 227. Mansfield v. Mansfield, 203 Ill. 92, 67 N. E. 497, is strikingly similar to the case at bar. The lower court had given judgment on titles derived from a will at the instance of an heir, where no trust was involved, and the Supreme Court declined to pass upon the will, and dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction, although the jurisdiction had not been questioned. The following cases have also been examined, and found to contain the same principle, in many of which there are reviews of the authorities on the subject: Woodlief v. Merritt, 96 N. C. 226, 2 S. E. 350; Dill v. Wisner, 88 N. Y. 153; Torrey v. Torrey, 55 N. J. Eq. 410, 36 Atl. 1084; Fahy v. Fahy, 58 N. J. Eq. 210, 42 Atl. 726; Kelly v. Kelly, 80 Wis. 496, 50 N. W. 334; Mansfield v. Mansfield, 203 Ill. 92, 67 N. E. 497; Miller v. Drane, 100 Wis. 1, 75 N. W. 413. This court reached the same conclusion in Head v. Phillips, 70 Ark. 432, 68 S. W. 874. A demurrer was interposed in the chancery court, which does not seem to have been passed upon, but it raised the question of jurisdiction. Kelly v. Kelly, 80 Wis. 486, 50 N. W. 334. Even without the demurrer, however, the court should have declined to pass upon the issue tendered, as it is not the subject-matter of jurisdiction of the chancery court, and consent cannot give such jurisdiction. Mansfield v. Mansfield, 203 Ill. 92, 67 N. E. 497; Richards v. Ry. Co., 124 Ill. 517, 16 N. E. 909.

In view of these authorities, and many more which may be found cited by the text-writers and reviewed in the cases mentioned, it was unquestionably the duty of the chancery court to refuse to entertain the bill; and, for the error in entertaining it and rendering a decree construing the will, the decree is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill without prejudice to any future litigation which may arise between the parties.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pope County; Hugh Basham, Judge.

Action by J. W. Evans, administrator, against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

U. L. Meade, for appellant. Lovick P. Miles, for appellee.

HART, J. Plaintiff brought this suit as administrator of the estate of David F. Evans, deceased, and also as next of kin of said deceased, against the defendant, to recover damages on account of the killing of said Evans. The complaint alleges, in substance, that Evans was struck and killed by a train of the defendant on the night of July 14, 1907; that it was a starlight night, and that the track was perfectly straight with the view unobstructed for two miles or more east of where Evans was struck and killed by the train; that he and his companion were lying asleep on the north side of the track; that, after discovering him, defendant's servants in charge of the locomotive negligently failed to give any danger signals or check the speed of the train, but recklessly ran into him, thereby causing his death. The railway company answered, making a general denial, and averred that the death of Evans was caused by his own negligence. After hearing the evidence on motion of the defendant, the court directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and the case is here on appeal.

David F. Evans and T. B. Falls lived at Galla Creek, in Pope county. On the night that Evans was killed they had been to visit the sister of Falls in Knoxville, Johnson county. They were each about 20 years of age. They desired to return home that night. The night train did not stop at Knoxville, but did stop at the junction about 2½ miles west of Knoxville. They walked toward the junction, and, it being a warm night, they stopped to rest. Falls went to sleep eight or ten feet from the north side of the track. Falls woke up, and noticed that Evans was lying right up to the end of the ties. He told Evans to get up; that a train was likely to come along and kill him. He remembered Evans raising up. They were waiting for an east-bound train. The body of Evans was lying nearly parallel with the track, and his head was resting on the end of the tie when Falls told him to get up. His head was towards the east. The train which killed him was going west. Falls did not wake up again until the train had half way passed him. He jumped up, and looked down the track, and saw the engineer's head sticking out of the cab on the side he was on, looking back. Falls then began to look for Evans, but did not find him. He then went back to Knoxville. The next morning he and the railroad agent went back, and found the remains of Evans a rail or two west of where he was lying when he was hit. The track was straight 900 feet or more east of where the two boys were lying, and there was nothing to obstruct the view of the engineer. The foregoing was the version given by Falls. George Embrey testified that he was the engineer in charge of the locomotive that killed deceased; that he was running about 35 miles an hour, and was keeping a lookout for people and stock on the track or right of way; that he did not discover that Evans or his companion were human beings until he was 75 feet from them; that he made no effort to stop the train because they were in the clear—that is to say, that the train could pass without striking them—that he did not have time to stop after he discovered that they were human beings; that he made a statement at Knoxville the next day in which he said that he saw two men lying beside the track; that he thought they were in the clear, and thought, if he blew the whistle, he might scare them, and they would jump on the track. James Evans, the brother of the deceased, testified that he discovered blood and hair on the right side of the cowcatcher which resembled the hair of his brother. The testimony also showed that a train composed of the number of cars of the one in question could be stopped with safety to passengers in 200 feet, and, when running 40 miles an hour, in 400 feet.

We are of the opinion that it was a question for the jury to determine under the evidence whether or not the defendant railway company exercised the proper care after discovering the dangerous situation of the deceased to avoid injuring him. It is only where the facts are undisputed, and are such that reasonable minds may draw but one conclusion from them, that the question of negligence is one of law for the court. Of course, under the undisputed facts as disclosed by the record, no reasonable man would say that the engineer could have stopped the train in time to have saved the deceased from injury after he discovered his perilous position, but he might have given an alarm by sounding the whistle. No doubt the engineer thought he was acting for the safety of deceased in not giving the alarm signal; for he gives as a reason for not doing so that he feared that it would cause the boy to jump towards the track, and that is made against the company in contemplation of section 8773 of Kirby's Digest, providing that railroads shall be responsible for all damages to persons or property caused by the running of trains in this state. Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Davis, 88 Ark. 217, 103 S. W. 603, and cases cited.

Counsel for appellant chiefly rely for a reversal upon the action of the court in telling the jury, in instruction No. 1, that where a train has stopped at a station, and before the passengers have had time to alight, it is the carrier's duty to give passengers, in some way, notice of all movements of the train. They cite the case of Railway Company v. Tankersley, 54 Ark. 25, 14 S. W. 1090, in support of their contention. This, with the argument made in their brief, shows that they have confused the duty of the railway company after the station is called and before its passengers have had time to alight with that it owes passengers after its train has stopped long enough to give them an opportunity to alight. There is no conflict in the two rules. Each is applicable to its own state of facts. Here the appellee says that she started at once to leave the train when it was stopped, and fell before she had had time to debark from it. The instruction was applicable to the state of facts under consideration, and its application to such state of facts was recognized and approved by this court in the case of Railway v. Davis, supra.

Counsel for appellants also objected to the giving of instruction No. 3, and ask a reversal because in it the court told the jury it was the duty of the railroad company to provide lights at its stations for the safety of passengers in arriving or departing at night. There was no error in giving this instruction. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Battle, 69 Ark. 369, 63 S. W. 805; Fordyce v. Merrill, 49 Ark. 277, 5 S. W. 329.

Counsel for appellant argue that the fourth instruction required the company to stop the train until the passengers alighted therefrom. We do not think the instruction is susceptible of any such construction. That it was the duty of the railroad company to stop its trains at its platforms, see Hutchinson on Carriers, vol. 2, § 1117; Railroad v. Whitfield, 44 Miss. 466, 7 Am. Rep. 699.

Appellant also asks for a reversal because the court did not permit its counsel to present to the jury in his argument that the real cause of action was the fact that the negro coach passed the depot while the white coach was stopped at the depot platform. The court properly refused to allow this line of argument. There was no testimony from which such fact might be inferred, and, beside, its evident purpose was to stir up race prejudice and to hold up appellee to ridicule before the jury.

Again, appellant asks for a reversal because its counsel was not permitted to ask appellee as to the height of her shoe heels at the time she received the injury. The question was not pertinent to the issue and was evidently asked to provoke merriment at the expense of appellee.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 73*)—ABANDONMENT OF EMPLOYMENT—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clay County: Frank Smith, Judge.

Action by J. F. Barwick against L. G. Latham, executor. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

G. B. Oliver, for appellant.

McCULLOCH, J. This is an action instituted by appellee against appellant's testatrix to recover upon an account for wages alleged to be due him as a farm hand. He entered into a verbal contract with appellant's testatrix to work on the latter's farm from February 26 until July 1, 1906, for $25 per month, and quit work on May 14, 1906. He sues for the amount of his earned wages. There was testimony tending to show that according to the terms of the contract the wages of appellee were to be paid one half as he earned or needed them and the other half on July 1st, that he quit the service of his employer without cause, and that at the time he quit work more than one half of his earned wages had been paid to him.

On this state of the proof the court gave a peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict in appellee's favor for the amount sued for, which was the balance of his earned wages, and refused to give the following instructions requested by appellant: "You are instructed that if you find from the evidence that defendant employed plaintiff to work for her in the making of a crop, and that he was to work until the 1st day of July, 1906, and was to be paid therefor at the rate of $25 and house rent per month, then, if you further find that plaintiff quit the employ of defendant before the 1st day of July, 1906, without reasonable cause, you will find for the defendant. (2) You are further instructed that if you find from the evidence that defendant employed plaintiff to work for her in the making of a crop, and that he was to work until the 1st day of July, 1906, and was to be paid therefor at the rate of $25 and house rent per month, and that one-half of his wages was not to be paid until the 1st of July, 1906, and that without reasonable cause he quit the employ of defendant before the 1st day of July, 1906, and that at the time he quit he had been paid more than one-half of his wages, then, if you find this suit was begun before the 1st day of July, 1906, you will find for the defendant."

There seems to be some conflict in the authorities whether or not one employed for a specified time, who, without adequate cause, quits service before expiration of the time, can recover upon a quantum meruit; but the great weight of authority is to the effect that he cannot recover. 28 Cyc. p. 1042, and cases cited. This court adopted the rule sustained by the weight of authority. English, C. J., speaking for the court in Hibbard v. Kirby, 38 Ark. 103, said: "The rule seems to be that if the contract of the servant to labor be for a specified period of time, and payment is to be made, either expressly or by implication of law, at the end of the period, and the servant leaves the service of his master improperly, without a sufficient cause, and without his consent, before the expiration of that time, he can recover no compensation for his services, either on the contract or on a quantum meruit." A statute of this state enacted in 1883 puts the question entirely at rest. It is as follows: "If any laborer shall without good cause abandon his employer before the expiration of his contract he shall be liable to such employer for the full amount of any account he may owe him and shall forfeit to his employer all wages or share of crop due him or which may become due him from his employer." Kirby's Digest, § 5028. This statute is conclusive of the questions involved in this appeal. It applies, in express terms, to all verbal contracts for services for a period not longer than one year.

It follows that the court erred in giving a peremptory instruction and in refusing to give the instructions requested by appellant.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Saline County; W. H. Evans, Judge.

Action by John A. Horton, by next friend, against the Pittsburg Reduction Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and action dismissed.

This was an action brought by John A. Horton, by his next friend, S. A. Horton, against the Pittsburg Reduction Company and C. C. Brazil, to recover damages for an injury sustained by him caused by the explosion of a dynamite cap in his left hand.

The Pittsburg Reduction Company was engaged in mining bauxite at the town of Bauxite, in Saline county, Ark. Its plant consisted of mineral land, houses, sheds, machinery, and spur tracks from the railroad, etc., which were used in its business. Its plant was near the public schoolhouse, and a large proportion of the school children of the neighborhood passed by its sheds, machine and toolhouses, and spur railroad tracks in going to and from school. Appellant company owned the land surrounding and upon which its shops, machine and toolhouses, and spur railroad tracks were situated. It also had a number of tenement houses on said lands for dwelling houses for its employes. The spur railroad track passed between its main shed and toolhouse, and very close to the toolhouse on the east. There was no inclosure around the sheds, machine and toolhouses, or spur track. There was a path along the spur track, which was habitually used by the children of the neighborhood in going to and from school. This was the condition of affairs at the time of the accident, and such condition was known to appellant company. The cap which did the damage was picked up by Charlie Copple, a boy about 10 years of age, at the edge of the spur track near the end of the toolhouse of appellant company. The caps were in a tin snuff box and were made of brass or copper. They were very much like small metal cartridges and appeared to be empty except of dirt. The Copple boy picked them up on his way home from school and carried them home. He lived with his parents about one-fourth of a mile distant. His father was an employé of another company, which had a plant for mining bauxite near that of appellant company. Charlie Copple kept the caps at home for about one week, playing on the floor with them in the presence of his parents. When he would leave them on the floor, his mother said she would pick them up. She said she did not know what they were. She said that Charlie Copple had them there in the house, and that she supposed her husband noticed him with them. The father denied knowing that his boy had the caps until he heard of it after the accident happened. Charlie Copple said that, when not playing with them, they were left on the clock shelf. About one week after he had found them, Charlie carried them to school and traded them to Jack Horton for some writing paper. Jack Horton was a boy 13 years old. He was in the schoolhouse at the time he was hurt. He said he thought it was a shell of a 22 cartridge that had been shot; that he was picking the dirt out of it with a match when it exploded and tore up his hand. His hand was torn so that it had to be amputated. There is a great deal of testimony relative to the manner by which the caps came on the spur track, where Charlie Copple picked them up, but the view we have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to abstract it, except to say that it may be assumed that appellant C. C. Brazil, the general foreman of appellant company, threw them there from the toolhouse thinking they were empty. There was a jury trial and a verdict against both appellants for $2,000. They have appealed to this court.

Mehaffy, Armstead & Williams and Murphy, Coleman & Lewis, for appellants. W. R. Danham and Wood & Henderson, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is a well-settled general rule that, when a defendant has violated a duty imposed upon him by the common law, he should be held to be liable to every person injured whose injury is the natural and probable consequence of the misconduct. Hence in our consideration of this case we are first met with the proposition of whether or not the negligence of appellants in leaving the dynamite caps near the spur track, which was frequented by children, was the proximate cause of the injury. As was said by this court in the case of Martin v. Railway Co., 55 Ark. 510, 19 S. W. 314, and later approved in the case of James v. James, 58 Ark. 157, 23 S. W. 1099, there must be a direct connection between the neglect of the defendant and the injury; that its connection must be something more than one of a series of antecedent events without which the injury would not have happened.

It is a well-settled general rule that, if, subsequent to the original negligent act, a new cause has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the injury, the original negligence is too remote. The difficulty arises in each case in applying the principle to a given state of facts. Counsel for appellee mainly rely upon the case of Harriman v. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. R. Co., 45 Ohio St. 11, 12 N. E. 451, 4 Am. St. Rep. 507, to establish their contention that the negligence of the appellants in leaving the caps on the spur track was the proximate cause of the injury. Other cases are cited by them to sustain their position, but they chiefly turn upon the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The facts and the gist of the holding of the court in the Harriman Case are fairly stated in the syllabus, which is as follows: "A train of cars, passing over some signal torpedoes, left one unexploded, which was picked up by a boy nine years old, at a point on the track which he and other children, in common with the general public, had long been accustomed to use as a crossing, with the knowledge and without the disapproval of the company. He carried it into a crowd of boys near by, and, not knowing what it was, attempted to open it. It exploded and injured the plaintiff, a boy 10 years of age. Held, that the act of the boy who picked up the torpedo was only a contributory condition, which the company's servants should have anticipated as a probable consequence of their negligence in leaving the torpedo where they did, and that that negligence was the direct cause of the injury suffered by the plaintiff." There the child did a perfectly natural thing for a boy to do. He found what appeared to be an attractive plaything. He at once carried it over to his playmates and exhibited it to them. He then began to try to open it so that they might learn what it contained. In doing this the explosion occurred which caused the injury. The result was the natural sequence of antecedent events, and ought to have been anticipated by any person of ordinary care and prudence.

In the present case, the facts are practically undisputed. Charlie Copple's father was an employé of a company engaged in a similar business to that of appellant company. Naturally, his avocation and the proximity of his residence to the mines made both himself and his wife familiar with the nature of explosives. True, Mrs. Copple says that she did not know what the shells contained, but she did know that they were shells for some kind of explosives, that her son brought them home, and that he played with them. She admits that, when he would leave them on the floor, she would pick them up and lay them away for him. This continued for a week, and then, with her knowledge, he carried them to school. Her course of conduct broke the causal connection between the original negligent act of appellant and the subsequent injury of the plaintiff. It established a new agency, and the possession by Charlie Copple of the caps or shells was thereafter referable to the permission of his parents, and not to the original taking. Charlie Copple's parents having permitted him to retain possession of the caps, his further acts in regard to them must be attributable to their permission and were wholly independent of the original negligence of appellants. This is but an application of the well-established general rule that, to charge a person with liability for damages, the negligence alleged must be found to have been the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff.

This case has given us much concern, and we have reviewed many cases illustrating the application of the general rule. It is useless to review them, for most of them recognize and approve the general rule, and, as the facts in each case are different, a review of them would add nothing to the opinion. The leading cases on the subject are cited in the respective briefs of the attorneys in this case.

As above stated, the evidence speaking on the question is undisputed, and, having determined that the intervening act of Charlie Copple's parents in permitting him to retain in his possession the caps broke the causal connection between the original wrongful act of appellants and the subsequent injury of the plaintiff, there is nothing to submit to the jury.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause dismissed.

HAX-SMITH FURNITURE CO. v. TOLL et al.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals, Missouri, Oct. 5, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1908.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 100*)—DISCHARGE OF SURETY—CHANGE IN OBLIGATION—BUILDING CONTRACT.

Building specifications, made a part of the contract, provided that, should the owner request any changes in the contract, he should be at liberty to make them, and the same should not affect the contract or bond securing its performance, the price to be agreed upon in writing before making such changes, and, if any dispute should arise, the same to be decided by arbitration. The bond securing the performance of the contract provided that the owner and contractor might make additions to and modifications in the contract without notice to the surety, and without invalidating the bond. Held, that changes made by the owner and contractor voluntarily did not fall within the class designated therein, but belonged to a class included in the bond, which covered not only changes compelled by the owner, but also those which might be agreed on by the owner and contractor, and that, as to such changes voluntarily made, the bond, and not the specifications, controlled, and a failure to agree upon the price in writing before making such changes did not discharge the surety on the bond.

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 82*)—DISCHARGE OF SURETY—CHANGE IN OBLIGATION.

Where a bond securing the performance of a building contract is executed subsequent thereto, as between the owner and the surety, a stipulation in the bond modifies, with the consent of the contractor, a stipulation in the building contract so far as inconsistent, and the stipulation in the bond controls so far as the surety is concerned.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County; C. A. Mosman, Judge.

Action on a bond securing a building contract by the Hax-Smith Furniture Company against one Toll as principal and Alfred Toll as surety. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Botsford, Deatherage, Young & Creason, and Culver & Philip, for appellants. Vinton Pike, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Action on a bond executed by defendants Sproul, as principal, and Toll, as surety, to secure the faithful performance by the former of a contract made by him with plaintiff for the erection of a business building on premises owned by plaintiff in St. Joseph. A jury was waived by the parties, the trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff, and both defendants appealed.

The bond executed December 30, 1905, was in the penal sum of $25,000, and expressed the following obligation: "The condition of the above obligation is such that whereas the said contractor [defendant Sproul] has entered into a contract with the said owner [plaintiff] to do certain work and furnish certain materials for the said owner: Now, therefore, if the said contractor shall well and truly perform said work and shall furnish all material in accordance with drawings, specifications and contract * * * and shall protect, defend, and hold harmless the said owner against any and all liens or claims of any kind that may be filed by laborers, mechanics or materialmen, within the time specified by law after the date of the completion of this contract, then this obligation shall be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect." The parties stipulated in the instrument that "the said owner and the said contractor may from time to time make additions to, omissions from and modifications in said contract without notice or consulting the sureties and without prejudice to or invalidating this bond." It is alleged in the petition, and the proof shows, that defendants failed to protect the property against mechanics' liens, and that plaintiff was compelled to pay the demands of a number of lien claimants in order to prevent its property from being sold under executions. The court, after deducting the credits and offsets, found the aggregate amount of plaintiff's loss on account of such outlays to be $3,417, and assessed plaintiff's damages at that sum in the judgment entered.

Defendant Toll presents the special defense, duly pleaded in his answer, "that without the knowledge or consent of the surety certain changes in the contract were made by the owner and contractor, which provided for additional work and materials, the price of which was not agreed to in writing before said work was begun or said materials were furnished." This defense is founded on the specifications (by reference made part of the contract between the owner and contractor) which provided, "should the owner at any time during the progress of the work request any alterations, deviations, additions or omissions from the contract, he shall be at liberty to do so and the same shall in no way affect or make void this contract or bond, but will be added to or deducted from the amount of the contract as the case may be, by a fair and reasonable valuation. The price to be agreed upon in writing before being put into execution, and if any dispute shall arise regarding the valuation, the same shall be decided by arbitration." To escape liability on the bond the surety relies here on two changes in the plans and specifications which were made on oral agreement of the owner and contractor, after the execution of the contract and bond, and without notice to the surety. First, the trenches for the footings of the foundations and walls and the concrete footings were made deeper and wider than specified, resulting in extra expense of $200, which the owner paid the contractor; and, second, the form of the building was altered slightly. The plans and specifications describe a building four stories high, 263 feet long, 120 feet wide, and in the form of a right-angled parallelogram. When the work was begun it was found that the street on which the building would front slightly varied from a true course, and if built as designed, one of the front corners of the building would be on the street line, and the other four or five feet therefrom. It was on the suggestion of the contractor, reluctantly adopted by the owner, that the form of the building was changed to that of a rhomboid, in order that the front wall might be parallel with the street. If we were sitting as a trier of fact, we would find from the evidence that the contractor offered to make the alteration without extra charge; but, since the trial court found otherwise by allowing the contractor a credit of $254.41, as the extra cost to him of the alteration, and the finding is supported by substantial evidence, we shall treat it as we would the verdict of a jury. The deepening and widening of the foundation was made necessary by the nature of the soil encountered in the excavation of the trenches. This necessity was recognized by the owner, architect, and contractor, and the change was agreed to as a matter of course and the owner agreed to compensate the contractor for making it.

Shortly after the work was begun, the contractor, prompted by his subcontractor, requested that the owner put in writing the agreement to pay for the extra work, whereupon plaintiff wrote a letter addressed to the architect, in which it agreed to pay $6 per yard for the extra concrete, and 25 cents per yard for the extra grading. Counsel for defendant Toll argue that, since the provision of the contract to which we have referred required the price "to be agreed upon in writing before being put into execution," this letter, written while the work was in progress, was not a compliance with that requirement under the strict rules of construction which obtain in favor of a surety. We shall concede only for the purposes of argument the soundness of this position, and, dismissing this letter from consideration, shall treat the feature of the case now before us from the standpoint that, with respect to the alterations of the plans and specifications, the price of the extra work in neither instance was agreed on in writing. This omission should not be held to have released the surety from the obligation of the bond, for the reason that under no reasonable construction of the contract between the owner and surety may it be said that the alterations in question belonged to the class which the contract contemplated should be made only on a written contract between the owner and contractor fixing the price of the extra work. Should we concede that the stipulation in the specifications is inconsistent with that in the bond, and that they should be construed together as parts of one contract, it would avail defendants nothing. Clearly the intention expressed in the provision in the specifications was to provide a method by which the owner might compel the contractor to make such changes in the plans and specifications as he might desire during the progress of the building, and had no purpose of restricting the freedom of the owner and contractor to make changes in the plans and specifications by voluntary agreement. The language "should the owner at any time during the progress of the work request any alterations, * * * he shall be at liberty to do so," cannot well be reconciled to any other interpretation, and the idea that the subject of the provision was possible compulsory changes is borne out by the final clause, which provides for submitting the question of price to arbitration in instances where the parties might be unable to come to an agreement respecting it. The changes under consideration in no sense were compulsory, but were made by the owner and contractor voluntarily. They did not fall within the class designated in the specifications, and were not controlled by its provisions. Bagwell v. Surety Co., 102 Mo. App. 707, 77 S. W. 327. They did belong to a class included in the stipulation in the bond. That stipulation covered, not only changes compelled by the owner, but also those which might be agreed on by the owner and contractor. It did not place any restrictions on the right of the parties to make such changes, nor prescribe any method by which they were to be made. Within the legitimate scope of the proposed improvement the parties were accorded complete freedom to contract as they pleased, and the utmost effect that could be given the provision in the specifications (on the theory that it should be read into the bond) is that the method it prescribed applied solely to alterations compelled by the owner, and not to those made by voluntary agreement. To the extent, at least, that the bond enlarged the right of the parties to make alterations over that provided in the contract between the owner and contractor, its terms must control, and in that field are exclusive of the contract and conclusive of the scope of the right and the methods by which it may be exercised. Bagwell v. Surety Co., supra. The surety will not be released on the ground that the alterations were made in an unauthorized manner.

Both defendants tender in their answers, and argue here, a defense based on alleged false and fraudulent representations made by plaintiff to defendant contractor, by which he was induced to reduce materially his bid below what it would have been had he not been deceived by the representations. The declarations of law given show quite clearly that the court found the facts against defendants on this issue, and we do not see how a different conclusion could have been drawn from the evidence. It is enough that we find in the record substantial evidence supporting the finding. We shall not weigh the evidence, nor do we deem it necessary to discuss its details pro and con.

Complaint is made of the following declaration at law given at the instance of plaintiff: "The contract between plaintiff and Sproul was executed on the 28th day of December, 1905, before the bond in suit, which was executed on the 30th day of said December. As between plaintiff and Toll, their stipulation written in said bond modified, with the consent of Sproul, the stipulation in the building contract as far as any inconsistency may exist between them, and the stipulation in the bond controls so far as defendant Toll is concerned." The proposition of law thus declared is sound, but, as we have indicated, its employment was not necessary to a proper disposition of the case, since, on the hypothesis that bond and contract are consistent, we have found that the surety should not be released.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

STATE v. FRANKLIN.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 19, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 691*)—USE AND REGULATION OF PUBLIC PLACES—STREETS—OBSTRUCTIONS—POWERS OF TRUSTEES.

The authority given trustees of towns and villages to open, clear, regulate, grade, pave, or improve streets and alleys, and to regulate stables, does not vest in the trustee the right to maintain obstructions in highways or to suffer such nuisances to be maintained by private persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 691.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 697*)—USE AND REGULATION OF PUBLIC PLACES—STREETS AND OTHER PUBLIC WAYS—RIGHTS AND REMEDIES AS TO OBSTRUCTIONS.

Where a municipality breaches the trust conferred on it in regard to control of highways, the state can correct the abuse, through the Attorney General or the prosecuting attorney of the county wherein the nuisance is maintained, by suit in equity, or, under Rev. St. 1899, § 6130 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3077), the circuit court may, on proceedings in the name of the Attorney General or prosecuting attorney, administer the proper relief, and hence, where a town neglected to remove an obstruction erected by an individual in a street, the prosecuting attorney might maintain an action against the town and the individual to remove the obstruction, and this right was not affected by Rev. St. 1899, § 9674 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 4415), imposing a fine on one obstructing a public road.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 697.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 657*)—STREETS—POWER TO VACATE.

The power of a municipality to vacate public streets cannot be lawfully exercised for any but public purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. § 657.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 697*)—STREETS—RIGHTS AND REMEDIES AS TO OBSTRUCTIONS OF ROAD—PARTIES TO ACTION.

Where an individual erected an obstruction in a street, and the only offense of the town was its neglect of duty to make him vacate, the town was not a necessary party to an action by the prosecuting attorney of the county to abate the nuisance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1504; Dec. Dig. § 697.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 17*)—VACATING—ERROR AS TO ONE DEFENDANT.

That, in an action by the prosecuting attorney against a town and an individual to compel the removal of an obstruction erected by the individual in a street, the town was not legally served with process, and judgment was erroneously entered against it, did not require the disturbing of the judgment against the individual defendant, since the execution of the judgment against the individual would abate the nuisance without affecting any property right of the town.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Osage County.

Action by the state against James D. Franklin and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Franklin appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Pope, for appellant. Gove & Davidson, John P. Peters, and Monroe & Zevely, for the State.

JOHNSON, J. In August, 1907, the prosecuting attorney of Osage county brought this action against James D. Franklin and the incorporated town of Linn, for the purpose of obtaining an order of court on the defendants to remove certain obstructions erected and maintained by defendant Franklin in a public highway and within the limits of the town. Process was issued commanding the sheriff to summon F. J. Boillot, H. Gove, Peter Gove, B. J. Brandt, H. C. Finck, and James D. Franklin. The return of the sheriff shows service on all of these persons, but the petition, summons, and return all fail to disclose that the first-mentioned five persons sustain any relation to the suit. We are told by the prosecuting attorney that Boillot was the chairman of the board of trustees of the town, and that the other four were members of the board; but that fact does not appear on the face of the record. The town did not appear to defend the action, and judgment was entered against it by default. Defendant Franklin appeared and demurred to the petition on the grounds that no cause of action is stated, that defendant town is not a necessary or proper party to the suit, "the contention being about a public county road." that there is "a defect of proper parties both plaintiff and defendant, and that the suit cannot be determined with only the parties hereto before the court." The demurrer was overruled, defendant Franklin stood on the demurrer, refused to plead further, and, after judgment was entered against him, in accordance with the prayer of the petition, brought the cause here by appeal. He is the only appealing defendant.

It is alleged: That the suit is brought by the prosecuting attorney, "who in this behalf prosecutes for the state of Missouri"; that the town of Linn is incorporated under the laws of Missouri relating to the incorporation of towns and villages; that defendant Franklin owns land in the town over which passes a public highway known as the Linn and Rich Fountain public road; that Franklin has erected a stable and fences in the road where it bisects his land, and thereby wholly obstructed its use as a public highway; that "the defendant the town of Linn, aforesaid, has been notified of the obstructions aforesaid and requested to remove the same, but has wholly failed so to do, and has failed and refused to institute any kind of proceedings whatever to compel the said defendant James D. Franklin to remove and abate said nuisance"; and that, "if the state of Missouri has no right to complain of the nuisance herein mentioned, then there is no remedy left to the public or to any private individual by which they can effect the removal of aforesaid obstructions and cause the nuisance herein complained of to be abated." The prayer is that the court make an order "directing said defendants, and each of them, to remove the obstructions aforesaid from the public highway aforesaid, and forever cease from doing any act which shall interfere with the use of said public highway by the public at large, and that said obstructions be removed by the defendants or either of them within a certain time to be named by the court, and, if not so removed within the time specified by said court, then the sheriff of Osage county, Mo., be ordered to remove the same, and return the possession and use of said public highway to the public, and for such other and further orders as the court may deem proper in the premises."

Defendant contends that an action of this character cannot be maintained, for the reason that the purpresture is in an incorporated town, and the town alone has jurisdiction over public thoroughfares within its boundaries, and is vested alone with the right to prosecute actions for the abatement of obstructions erected in such highways which are public nuisances. We are cited to sections 6004, 6010, 6012, 6015, 6016, 9549, 9550, 9674, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 3032, 3034, 3037, 3038, 4373, 4415), and to State ex rel. Mermod v. Heege, 39 Mo. App. 49, as authority for this position. Defendant is right in saying that authority is given to the trustees of towns and villages "to open, clear, regulate, grade, pave or improve the streets and alleys of such town," and "to regulate livery, sale and feed stables"; but such authority does not vest in the trustees the right to maintain obstructions or to suffer such nuisances to be maintained by private persons. The power over the public ways conferred by the laws of the state is in the nature of a trust which the municipality must execute in furtherance of the object of the trust, and, where the municipality is guilty of a breach of this trust by acts either of commission or omission, the visitatorial right of the state empowers it to proceed in court to correct the abuse. This it may do, through the arm of the Attorney General, or of the prosecuting attorney of the county wherein the nuisance is maintained, by suit in equity, or suit brought under section 6130, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3077), which provides: "Whenever any property, real or personal, is held by any municipal corporation in a fiduciary capacity, the circuit court shall have jurisdiction upon proceedings instituted in the name of the Attorney General or prosecuting attorney, to inquire into any breaches of trust, fraud or negligence, and to administer the proper relief."

We strongly approve what was said on this subject by the St. Louis Court of Appeals, speaking through Judge Goods, in State ex rel. v. Vandalia, 119 Mo. App. 406, 94 S. W. 1009: "The Attorney General of the state, or the prosecuting attorney of the county in which the nuisance exists, may proceed in equity, in behalf of the sovereignty of the state, for its abatement. This is the rule, independent of any statute touching the matter, as has been adjudged in many cases. Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 35 N. E. 141, 22 L. R. A. 393; State v. Dayton, 36 Ohio St. 434; Hunt v. Railroad, 20 Ill. App. 282; People v. Beaudry, 91 Cal. 213, 220, 27 Pac. 610. We apprehend that the right of those officials to interfere grows out of the visitatorial power of the state in respect of trusts of a public nature, and that the interference is akin to the suits in equity brought by Attorney Generals for the regulation of public charities, which are frequently met with in the reports. Att. Gen. v. Haberdasher Co., 15 Beav. 307; Parker, Atty. Commonwealth, v. May, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 336. The usual mode of proceeding in seeking relief respecting either charities or purprestures and other nuisances is by an information in equity, which pleading corresponds nearly to a bill in equity filed by a private suitor for his own benefit. The information is in behalf of the sovereignty of the state, to redress some grievance of which the state may complain in equity on its own account, or on account of persons or interests under its special protection, like idiots, lunatics, and charities. And informations in equity are filed by the officer representing the sovereignty of the state; that is to say, the Attorney General, or, in this commonwealth, some prosecuting attorney. This sort of information possesses most of the characteristics of a bill in equity and differs from the latter in form rather than in function. 1 Encyc. Pl. & Pr. pp. 857, 859; Story, Eq. Pl. § 8; People v. Stratton, 25

Cal. 242. Some of the formal differences between the two are pointed out in the opinions in Atty. Gen. v. Moliter, 26 Mich. 444, 449, and Atty. Gen. v. Evart B. Co., 34 Mich. 462, 472. The right of the prosecuting attorney of Audrain county to maintain the present proceeding is made clear by both ancient and modern decisions of equity courts and is supported by a statute of this state, which provides that whenever any property, real or personal, is held by a municipal corporation in a fiduciary capacity, the circuit court shall have jurisdiction of a proceeding instituted in the name of the Attorney General or prosecuting attorney to inquire into any breaches of trust, fraud, or negligence and to administer proper relief. Rev. St. 1899, § 6130 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3077). An inquiry into breaches of trust and fraud would naturally be conducted by a court of equity and according to equity pleading and practice. A purpresture in a highway is a grievance of sufficient importance to justify its abatement at the instance of the state. Atty. Gen. v. Evart B. Co., 34 Mich. 473; State v. Dayton; Hunt v. Railroad; People v. Beaudry, supra. The authority to vacate public streets found in many of the grants to municipalities has its limitations. It cannot be lawfully exercised for any but public purposes, certainly not for private gain or advantage. "The grant of power in this particular is to be construed in view of the purposes for which the municipality is invested with the control of its streets, alleys, and public grounds." Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 35 N. E. 141, 22 L. R. A. 393.

Both on reason and authority, it is quite clear that the maintenance of the obstructions in the public highway by the defendant Franklin and the neglect of the town to perform its duty to proceed for the abatement of the nuisance justified the state in employing its visitatorial power for the correction of the abuse. The petition states a cause of action. The right to prosecute the suit either as one in equity or under the statute quoted is not affected by the provisions of section 9674, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 4415). While we concede the contention of the appealing defendant that the town of Linn was not legally served with process, and that judgment against it was entered erroneously (Cloud v. Inhabitants of Pierce City, 86 Mo. 357), we do not share his conclusion that the judgment against him should be disturbed on that account. Since it appears from the averments of the petition, which in the present posture of the case must be accepted as true, that defendant Franklin is the owner of the obstructions, is in occupation of the street, and that the only offense of the town consists in its neglect of the duty to make him vacate, we do not think the town is a necessary party to an action against the real offender. The execution of the judgment against Franklin will completely abate the nuisance without affecting any property interest or right of the town. The state is merely doing what the town should have done, and there is no reason for making the town a party.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

MARCHECK et ux. v. KLUTE et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 162*)—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION OF PREMISES—LANDLORD'S DUTY TO TENANT.

Where only a part of a building is leased or separate parts leased to different tenants and the landlord retains control of the part not leased, he is bound to use reasonable diligence to keep in a safe condition the part over which he retains control; his retention of control being the test of his liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 629; Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 124*)—USE OF PREMISES—APPURTENANCES—MEANS OF ENTRANCE.

Where defendant leased plaintiff two rooms in the loft of a stable, entrance to the rooms being up a stairway to the loft and along the unoccupied part of the loft to the rooms, the lease carried with it the right to use the stairway and the portion of the loft necessary to pass in and out of the rooms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 437, 438; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION OF PREMISES—LANDLORD'S DUTY TO TENANT.

Where defendant leased plaintiff two rooms in the loft of a stable, entrance thereto being up a stairway and through the portion of the loft used for storing hay, etc., that portion of the loft being also used by any one engaged in defendant's business therein, he retained control of the passageway for the purpose of repairs, and was bound to keep it reasonably safe, so that he would be liable for injuries to plaintiff's son by falling through a chute if it was so near the passageway as to be dangerous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630, 631, 633; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 162*)—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION OF PREMISES—EXTENT OF LANDLORD'S DUTY—DUTY TO TENANT'S FAMILY.

A landlord owes no greater duty to the tenant's children to keep premises in reasonably safe condition than to the tenant himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION OF PREMISES—INJURIES TO TENANTS—FAILURE TO GUARD DANGEROUS PLACES—NEGLIGENCE.

The entrance to rooms leased plaintiff in the loft of a stable was by a stairway leading to an outside landing and through a part of the loft not occupied by plaintiff, and a boy chute, through which plaintiff's child fell, was at least three feet to the right of the passageway to the rooms and against the wall through which entrance was made, so that, to fall into it, it would be necessary to go three feet to the right immediately after entering the outer door. Held, that the position of the chute did not render the passageway to the rooms dangerous.

so as to make the landlord liable for injuries to plaintiff's child from falling through it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630, 631, 633; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 169*)—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION OF PREMISES—INJURIES TO TENANT—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by a tenant for the death of his child by falling through a chute in the unoccupied portion of a stable loft in which plaintiff's rooms were located, the evidence held to show that the child was not using the ordinary passageway to the rooms when he fell, but was running across the part not occupied by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

7. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 165*)—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION OF PREMISES—INJURIES TO LICENSEE.

Even if a tenant's children were licensed to play in the unoccupied part of the loft of a stable in which rooms rented by plaintiff were situated, the landlord was not bound to keep that part of the loft safe, and, in the absence of misfeasance, would not be liable for injuries to them while using it, and hence was not liable for injuries to a child by falling through an unguarded chute in that part of the loft.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 630; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

8. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—CONDITION OF BUILDING—PLACES ATTRACTIVE TO CHILDREN.

The doctrine of the "turntable" cases, imposing a liability for maintaining dangerous places attractive to children, will not be extended.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

9. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 169*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

In order to entitle a tenant to recover for injuries received because of the landlord's failure to protect a dangerous place near the leased premises as agreed, he should have alleged such promise and the landlord's breach in his petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

10. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS — BREACH OF COVENANT TO REPAIR—RIGHT OF ACTION.

As a general rule, a lessor's covenant to repair will not support an action for personal injuries resulting from his failure to repair; such injuries being deemed too remote to have been contemplated by the parties when the covenant was given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630, 631; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

11. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURY FROM DEFECTS—BREACH OF COVENANT TO REPAIR—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where a landlord, when he rented rooms in a stable loft, agreed to properly guard the entrance to a hay chute in the unoccupied part of the loft in order to protect the tenant's children, a child of the tenant could recover for injuries resulting from the landlord's failure to make such repairs; the rule that a landlord's covenant to repair will not support an action for personal injuries for failure to repair having no application, since an injury to the child was contemplated when the agreement to repair was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630, 631; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

12. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURIES FROM DEFECTS — BREACH OF COVENANT TO REPAIR—RIGHT OF ACTION.

The rule that a landlord's covenant to repair will not support an action for personal injuries for his failure to repair is applicable only by analogy to a landlord's agreement to guard the entrance of a chute in the unoccupied part of a stable loft in which the leased rooms were situated, as the stipulation was not to repair the leased premises or an appurtenance thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630, 631; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

13. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—BREACH OF LANDLORD'S COVENANT TO REPAIR—ACTION FOR PERSONAL INJURIES.

An action for personal injuries resulting from a breach of the landlord's covenant to repair is allowed when the injury was contemplated by the parties when executing the covenant, or when the landlord omitted to perform his agreement after he knew that its performance was essential to the safety of the tenant and his family.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630, 631; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Jesse A. McDonald, Judge.

Action by William J. Marcheck and wife against August F. Klute and others. From an order granting a motion for a new trial upon verdict for plaintiffs, they appealed. Order affirmed, and cause remanded.

These plaintiffs are husband and wife, and their suit is for damages for the death of their son Oliver Anthony Marcheck, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants in particulars to be stated presently. Defendants conduct a grocery store at No. 3900 Shenandoah avenue, in St. Louis. The description of the premises by the witnesses was fragmentary, but we understand they were on the southwest corner of Shenandoah avenue and some other street. The lot fronts on the avenue and runs southwardly to an alley. A two-story stable where defendants' horses and vehicles were kept stood on the rear end of the lot. In February, 1906, plaintiff William J. Marcheck entered defendants' employ. His duties were to deliver goods and take care of the horses and vehicles of the firm, for which services he was to be paid \$7 a week and granted the use of two rooms in the second story of the stable for a residence. The entrance to the rooms was by a stairway running up the north side of the building to a landing, from which a door opened into the second story or loft of the stable. Immediately to the left of the entrance was the first of the two rooms occupied by plaintiffs and used by them for a kitchen. Further down was the second room which they used for a sleeping chamber. The rooms were on the east side of the second story of the stable, which was about 18 or 20 feet deep north and south. The west part of the loft was used as a storage place for harness, a buggy, and hay. There were two hay chutes in this part of the loft, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ by 3 feet in dimensions. One of these was toward the south end of the loft and the other against the north wall, and at a distance from the entrance door, estimated by the witnesses, at from three to six feet. Some witnesses said, when the door from the outside landing was opened into the loft and turned back against the north wall, it nearly touched the north chute; whereas, other witnesses said it fell two or three feet short of reaching the chute. Hay was dumped into the chutes, and slid from the loft to the mangers below. These chutes were constructed of boards extending down to the mangers, projecting seven or eight inches above the floor of the loft and with the openings uncovered. Between the two chutes harnesses and hay were deposited and a buggy was swung. This sketch shows how the loft was arranged:

SECOND FLOOR PLAN OF STABLE.

Two months after plaintiffs had moved into the loft their son Oliver fell into and down the north chute, alighting on his stomach over a crossbar which separated the manger at the foot, and receiving an injury from which he died two days afterward. The accident happened before noon of April 24, 1908, and what is known about it was testified by the mother of the child. She said she was working in the kitchen, with the door between it and the loft open. Oliver said he wanted to play in the yard where his father was, and she told him he could not go alone, but she would take him as soon as she had the time. As this was said, the child ran out of the kitchen and into another part of the loft to get a toy wagon to take with him to the yard when his mother was ready to go. She instantly heard the wagon strike the chute, called to her son, who answered, and, on going to the mouth of the chute, she saw him lying across the crossbar. Mr. Marcheck testified defendants required him to live in the stable so he could be near the horses, and testified, further, defendants knew he had small children; that he spoke to one of them about the hay chutes, and this defendant promised to have them fixed so as to be safe, saying they would send for men to put hinged covers on them; that he (Marcheck) took it for granted this would be done, and said no more about the matter. The petition declares on defendants' negligence in permitting the hay chutes to remain uncovered in dangerous proximity to the part of the loft plaintiffs and their family were compelled to use in going to and from their rooms, but nothing is said about the promise to cover the chutes; the substance of the charge being that the chutes were in close proximity to the stairway and in the common passageway to plaintiffs' rooms, and defendants negligently failed to provide coverings or guards for them as was their duty under the law, and negligently permitted them to remain without guards or protection of any kind, though defendants knew them to be dangerous to plaintiffs and their family; and, in consequence of this negligence, plaintiffs' child fell into the chute and was killed.

The answer is, first, a general denial; second, an averment the rooms occupied by plaintiffs and the floor of the hay loft were in the same condition when the accident occurred as when plaintiffs took the rooms; third, that defendants did not, when they hired Marcheck, or when he moved into the premises, make any representation or statement to plaintiffs, or either of them, concerning the condition of the premises, and the condition of the floor of the loft and of the chutes was obvious, and plaintiffs assumed whatever risk attended the occupancy. The court instructed the jury, in substance, as follows: That if plaintiff Marcheck was in the employ of defendants, and was residing as a tenant with his family in the rooms in and adjoining the hay loft, in defendants' possession and control, and it was necessary for plaintiff and his family to pass over part of the hay loft to reach the stairway leading to the ground, and defendants permitted a hay chute to remain without covering or guarding it, so near the passageway from said rooms as to make the same dangerous to persons using it with ordinary care, and if such condition was known to defendants, or by ordinary care could have been known to them, and defendants, in the exercise of ordinary care to persons occupying said rooms, could have guarded or covered said hay chute and made the same safe, then the omission of defendants to cover it and leaving it without guards constituted negligence, and they were liable to plaintiffs for all damages which directly resulted from such negligence; and, if the jury found plaintiffs' minor son, while rightfully in and about the passageway and in the exercise of such discretion as would be exercised by a child of his age, fell through the hay chute because of its unguarded and dangerous condition, the verdict must be for plaintiffs. The court refused all the instructions asked by defendants, which were, in the main, to the following effect:

If the jury believed plaintiffs' son came to his death while he was playing in the hay-loft, the verdict must be for defendants; that if the openings in the floor were obvious, visible, and apparent, and known to plaintiffs when they took the rooms, they could not recover; that plaintiffs by occupying the rooms assumed all the risk incident to the openings in the floor; that there was no evidence of a warranty by defendants of the safety of the premises which plaintiffs would occupy or the safety of the passageway or approach thereto, and the law would not, when the defects complained of were visible and apparent, imply a warranty. Two or three other instructions which we deem unnecessary to recite were refused. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs for $2,000, but on motion of defendants for a new trial it was set aside by an order reciting this was done because the court had erred in admitting evidence and in the refusal of instructions. The present appeal was prosecuted from the order sustaining the motion for new trial.

W. D. Izenberg and Sturtevant & Sturtevant, for appellants. Rassieur, schuurmacher & Rassieur, for respondents.

GOODE, J (after stating the facts as above) The question of the duty of a landlord to keep in reasonably safe condition for use parts of premises he retains control of, intending them to be used by tenants to whom other parts are let, has been the source of conflicting decisions. Many cases on the subject are collected in the note to Dollard v Roberts, 14 L. R. A. 238, and the conflict will be observed on reading said note and the text and notes of standard treatises on landlord and tenant law. The question has been presented usually in instances where an owner of a house had let apartments in it to several tenants, but had retained control of such parts as porches, halls, and stairways for the use in common of his tenants; and it is generally held the owner, whether he agrees to do so or not, must look after the condition of these common appurtenances. But as to whether an owner's duty to a particular tenant is to keep an appurtenance of which the owner has control only in as good repair as when the tenant took possession, or in safe repair, or the tenant must take care of himself, there are contrary opinions, as the following citations make manifest: Looney v. McLain, 129 Mass. 33, 37 Am. Rep. 295; Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380, 46 Am. Rep. 471; Moynihan v. Allyn, 162 Mass. 270, 38 N. E. 497; Quinn v. Perham, 151 Mass. 162, 23 N. E. 735; Neyer v. Miller, 51 N. Y. Super. Ct. 516; Bold v. O'Brien, 12 Daly (N. Y.) 160; Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119, 6 Am. Rep. 47; Peil v. Reinhardt, 127 N. Y. 381, 27 N. E. 1077, 12 L. R. A. 843; Humphrey v. Walt, 22 N. C. C. 581; Payne v. Irvin, 144 Ill. 488, 33 N. E. 113 S.W.—42

St. Rep. 584; Jones v. Freidenburg, 66 Ga. 505, 42 Am. Rep. 86. And see note in 14 L. R. A., supra. A rule on this subject was prescribed by our Supreme Court in McGinley v. Alliance Trust Co., 168 Mo. 257, 66 S. W. 153, 56 L. R. A. 334, and the text of the 18 Am. & Eng. Ency Law (2d Ed.) 220, adopted. It reads as follows: "The rule laid down by the weight of authority is that when the landlord leases separate portions of the same building to different tenants, and reserves under his control those parts of the building or premises used in common by all the tenants, he is under an implied obligation to use reasonable diligence to keep in a safe condition the parts over which he so reserves control."

In the McGinley Case the evidence justified the conclusion that the owner of certain tenement houses wherein apartments were let to different parties had retained control of the porches and stairways for purposes of construction and repair; and, this being true, he was held liable for an injury to the daughter of a tenant due to a defective outside stair railing giving way. It appearing the landlord could have learned of the condition of the railing by ordinary care. The premises in question were not demised to several tenants, but the case falls within the principle of the McGinley Case and others that deal with the responsibility of owners of apartments. It involves the essential fact on which such owners are held responsible for the condition of those parts of the buildings not turned over to the tenants; i. e., that the landlord is in control of those parts, and may enter on them to make repairs. That this is the decisive fact in determining where the duty rests to provide for the safe condition of any part of demised premises was declared in the McGinley Case, and is recognized generally. The Supreme Court said that ordinarily, when repairs are needed on a house in the possession of a lessee, he may make them, and no one else has the right to enter for the purpose; that right and duty go together in such matters, and if one may enter by virtue of his estate in the premises, and safety requires repairs, it is his duty to make them, but, when he has no right to enter, he has no such duty.

No part of the upper loft of defendants' stable was let to Marcheck except the two living rooms; but the lease carried the right to use the stairway, the landing, and a portion of the loft in front of the doors of the rooms to pass in and out. Jones, L. & T. § 104; Taylor, L. & T. (9th Ed.) 160. The outside door used by plaintiffs and their family in going to and from their rooms was immediately beside the first room, or kitchen. No aisle down the length of the loft was railed off for a passageway, but in reason plaintiffs were entitled to use at least the width of the entrance; and we hold under the decision supra of the Supreme Court it was the duty of defendants, even though they gave no promise about it, to use care to keep this portion of the floor reasonably safe. The strip was not turned over to plaintiffs for their exclusive use, but might be used as well by whomsoever had occasion to go into the unleased side of the loft on defendants' business. It is fairly inferable that the strip remained in defendants' control for the purpose of repairs. If so, they were liable for the accident to plaintiffs' son, if the chute into which he fell was so near the passageway as to render the latter dangerous. This question was submitted to the jury as an issue of fact; and, indeed, the gravamen of the case stated in the petition was the dangerous proximity of the chute. Study of the evidence has satisfied us a case for the jury was not made out. The chute which projected considerably above the floor was so far from the passageway that to conclude it made the passageway dangerous would be unreasonable. Defendants owed no greater duty to the deceased than they owed to their tenant Marcheck himself. This proposition was decided in the McGinley Case, wherein it was said any member of a tenant's family stands in the same relation to the landlord as the tenant himself, so far as the right to recover for an injury due to defects in the tenement is concerned; and that the question of the landlord's liability when a member of the tenant's family is hurt might be thus stated: "Is a landlord liable to his tenant for damages under such circumstances?" To the same effect is Peterson v. Smart, 70 Mo. 34, wherein a child about the age of plaintiffs' deceased son was injured by falling from a high terrace; the suit being founded on the supposed negligence of the owner of the property in removing the fence along the top of the terrace. The chute down which deceased fell was, according to the testimony most favorable to plaintiffs' cause, more than three feet from the entrance door, and, moreover, was against the north wall of the building. Therefore it was so far out of the way or aisle that, in order to reach the chute in going to the outside door, a person would have to diverge from three to six feet from the right course, and would have to go within a foot and a half of the north wall at a point three or more feet from the door. Plainly the chute in that position cannot be regarded as rendering the approach to plaintiffs' rooms dangerous.

There is another important fact to be noticed. It is clear from the testimony of Mrs. Marcheck the boy was not endeavoring to use the passageway in order to go out of the loft when he fell into the chute. He had asked permission to go to the yard where his father was, and his mother told him he could not go alone, but she would accompany him presently. Thereupon the child ran for his wagon that he might take it with him when his mother was ready to go, and immediately she heard the wagon strike the chute. No conclusion can be drawn from these facts except that the boy was running across the loft with his wagon when he fell, and was not attempting to go out of the door or otherwise use the passageway. The accident occurred in broad daylight, and probably is to be attributed to the heedlessness of childhood.

Having determined the chute did not render the approach to the leased premises dangerous, our next inquiry relates to defendants' duty to plaintiffs and their family in respect of keeping the floor of the part of the loft which was neither parcel of nor appurtenant to the leasehold in such a state that one might walk on it safely. No one was bound to use said part of the floor except Marcheck, who would have occasion to do so in attending to his duties as hostler. Still it is reasonable to infer the rest of the family were not forbidden to walk over it; in other words, were licensed to do so. Conceding plaintiffs' children were licensed to play in the loft, defendants were under no duty to keep the floor safe for their use in that manner, and, unless guilty of misfeasance, were not liable for an accident received by them. See Glaser v. Rothschild, 106 Mo. App. 418, 80 S. W. 332, and cases cited in opinion. This is true unless we say the chute was so apt to lure a child into danger as to range the action with the "turntable" cases; there being no deception about the state of the premises chargeable to defendants and the condition of the chute being obvious. Railroad v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745; Koons v. Railroad, 65 Mo. 592. The doctrine of those cases will not be extended. Witte v. Stifel, 126 Mo. 295, 28 S. W. 891, 47 Am. St. Rep. 668; Barney v. Railroad, 126 Mo. 373, 28 S. W. 1069, 26 L. R. A. 847. But suffice it to say on this point the petition and proof proceeded on a different theory, to wit, that the aperture deceased fell through was so near the passageway as to render the way unsafe. The cause was submitted in the instructions for plaintiffs on an unsound theory of law, as the case pleaded was not established prima facie.

It is insisted by counsel for plaintiffs the answer of defendants aided the petition, and under the answer Marcheck's testimony of defendants' promise to cover the chute was competent, and plaintiffs could recover on it. This promise was not declared on, as it must have been to afford plaintiffs a cause of action. The portion of the answer supposed to help the petition and make evidence of the promise competent was the plea of assumption by plaintiffs when they accepted the premises of the risk of injury from the chute. If plaintiffs had established a prima facie case in tort by evidence proving the chute made the passageway dangerous perhaps they might have proved defendants promised to cover it in refutation of plaintiffs' supposed assumption of risk. Did any duty on the part of defendants accrue to deceased by virtue of the promise to cover the chute, and could deceased, if he had lived, have recovered damages resulting from nonperformance of the duty? The weight of authority is that a lessor's covenant to repair will not support an action for a personal injury due to failure to make repairs, because those injuries are deemed too remote to have been contemplated by the parties when the covenant was given. 18 Ency. Law, 216; McAdam, L. & T. 438; Jones, L. & T. 592; Thompson v. Clemens, 96 Md. 196, 53 Atl. 919, 60 L. R. A. 580 and cases cited on page 206 of 96 Md., page 921 of 53 Atl. (60 L. R. A. 580). This rule cannot be applied to the present case for two reasons. In the first place, the very purpose of the promise was to safeguard plaintiff's children, and hence an injury to one of them in consequence of a failure to perform was contemplated by the parties when the stipulation was given. In the next place, the stipulation was not for repairs on the leasehold, or an appurtenance, but on another portion of the premises which plaintiffs and their family were licensed to use; and therefore the rule as between landlord and tenant would be in point only by analogy, even if the stipulation had not been made with a view to taking precautions against a personal injury. And sometimes when the covenant is to repair leased premises the courts allow a recovery for a personal injury due to a breach, either because it appears this kind of injury was within the intention of the covenant or the circumstances of the failure to perform show negligence on the part of the landlord; that is to say, show not only that he omitted to do what he had agreed, but omitted after he was apprised that performance was essential to the safety of the tenant and his family. Thompson v. Clemens, 96 Md., loc. cit. 209, 211, 53 Atl. 919, 60 L. R. A. 580. If plaintiffs' son had been injured, but not killed, we hold he might have sued on defendants' promise, which seems to have been an integral part of the original contract with Marcheck, therefore supported by a consideration, and given for the benefit of plaintiffs' little children, of whom the deceased was one. Cress v. Blodgett, 64 Mo. 449; Markel v. Telegraph Co., 19 Mo. App. 80.

Other questions spring into sight in connection with such an action. One is whether it would lie in tort or only in contract; the duty to cover the mouth of the chute not being imposed by law in the absence of a stipulation. There are decisions allowing an action in tort in the nature of trespass on the case for failure to keep such a stipulation. Thompson v. Clemens, supra; Edwards v. Railroad, 98 N. Y. 245, 248, 50 Am. Rep. 659; Spellman v. Bannigan, 36 Hun, 174;

Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 Pac. 260. A cognate question was investigated by this court in Wernick v. Railroad (Mo. App.) 109 S. W. 1027. The other cases just cited arose between landlords and tenants, but we suppose the principle of the decisions would include a stipulation to make licensed premises safe for a tenant who was privileged to use them in connection with his leasehold.

Another question to be considered is whether, if the deceased might have sued in contract had he lived, the right to sue in that form of action was transmitted to the plaintiffs on his death by our statute, which provides that when the death of any person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, and the act, neglect, or default was one for which the party killed might have sued if he had been injured merely, the party in fault shall be liable to the survivors of the deceased as designated in sections 2864 and 2865 of the statutes (Rev. St. 1899 [Ann. St. 1906, pp. 1637, 1644]). We have found no case wherein the court considered whether default in the performance of a contract whereby another's death was caused falls within the purview of such a statute. All the decisions we have seen were in actions of tort. Still the words "act, neglect or default" are broad and various. It might be necessary to determine whether an amendment to the petition declaring on defendants' promise would substitute a new cause of action.

These questions have not been treated by counsel, and we are unwilling to decide them without the help of briefs or arguments. Hence we will simply affirm the order for new trial and remand the cause, for plaintiffs to take such a course as their counsel may advise. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jasper County; Howard Gray, Judge.

Action by J. P. Tate against the Jasper County Farmers' Mutual Insurance Company. From the judgment both parties appeal. Affirmed.

McReynolds & Halliburton, for plaintiff.
Joe D. Harris and H. L. Shannon, for defendant.

BROADDUS, P. J. This is a suit on a policy of insurance issued by defendant on the 22d day of June, 1903, whereby defendant insured the plaintiff against loss by fire on the following property: "Dwelling and addition, * * * in the sum of thirteen hundred dollars, and upon the contents of said dwelling in the sum of twelve hundred dollars." On February 10, 1906, a structure, claimed to be an addition to said building, was destroyed by fire with the goods and contents therein, and the main building was damaged. The defense is: That plaintiff made application on property described as follows, to wit: "Frame dwelling, 16x38 feet, 1½ stories, age 14 years; frame addition, 18x38, 1 story, age 14 years; 1 porch." And that, by the constitution and by-laws of the organization of which plaintiff is a member, the said application became a part of the contract of insurance. The plaintiff replied to the effect that the only application he ever made for such insurance was in blank, and that, if there was any written description inserted therein, it was the act of the defendant. The testimony tends to show that there was a structure close to the main building that was used in connection with it, and in which were kept family stores and other things used for family purposes, but not directly attached to such main building. The application, signed by plaintiff, was introduced by defendant, in which the description of the property coincides with the statement in defendant's answer. Plaintiff's evidence was that he signed it in blank, while that of defendant was that the description was inserted upon information given by plaintiff. Under the by-laws of the company, such applications are made a part of the contract of insurance. There is also a by-law that provides that: "Insurance on property incumbered by mortgage, deed of trust, or mechanic's lien, shall be payable, in case of loss, to the person or persons holding such incumbrances unless the owner give security that he will use the money to rebuild or repair loss or damages."

It appeared that a third party had a mortgage on the property. The court permitted plaintiff to recover for the destruction of the detached structure and for damage to the main building, but would not permit him to recover for the contents of the so-called addition. The defendant appealed, and the plaintiff appealed from the action of the court in refusing him judgment for the value of the contents of the detached building.

The only questions raised by the defendant's answer are that it did not insure such addition to the main building as described in the written policy, and that the building destroyed was not an addition to the main building. To these two questions we will confine our examination and decision, although defendant has raised other questions outside of the issues.

There is a substantial variance in the description in the policy and that contained in the application, and yet under the by-law in question both are made a part and parcel of the same contract. They were, however, executed at different times. The policy was the last executed and was delivered by the company to plaintiff, who accepted it as written. It was prepared by defendant's secretary who had previously filled out the blank application. As it described plaintiff's property he intended to insure, we think it should control. The recitations in an application cannot be invoked for the purpose of contradicting the terms of the contract as contained in the policy.

Was the detached building, although used as a part of the main dwelling, an addition within the description of the policy? The question is answered in the affirmative by numerous decisions, of which the following are a part: Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Martin (Miss.) 16 South. 417; Robinson v. Pa. Ins. Co., 87 Me. 399, 32 Atl. 996; Pettit v. State Ins. Co., 41 Minn. 299, 43 N. W. 378.

The contention of the plaintiff that the court committed error in not allowing him a judgment for the contents destroyed in the addition we think is not sustained. The policy insures "dwelling and addition" and "contents of dwelling." If it had been the intention to insure the contents of the addition, the policy should have read, "dwelling, addition, and contents," etc. There is no doubt about the meaning.

The cause is affirmed on both appeals. All concur.

STATE v. KELLOGG.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 5, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1908.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 34*)—LOCAL OPTION LAW—ELECTION—TIME AND PLACE—MANDATORY PROVISIONS.

The provisions of local option law (Rev. St. 1899, § 3027 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 1733]) relating to time and place of holding an election there-

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes under are mandatory, so that an election held more than 40 days after the receipt of the petition by the county court is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 32*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—TIME—PETITION—REFILING.

A petition for local option election was received by the county court October 3, 1887, when the petition was ordered filed and the matter continued. On February 6, 1888, an order was entered reciting that "the petitioners in said cause" were granted leave to withdraw the petition, and on February 8th a new petition was filed, praying for such election, on which an election was ordered held March 9, 1888. The petition withdrawn was embodied in that filed two days later; the list containing the names of the new petitioners being incorporated with the old to form the new petition. Held, that the original petitioners were entitled to withdraw their petition, acting together as shown by the order, and were not disqualified from signing another and all consenting from using parts of the old paper to make the new, which being filed constituted a new petition, so that the election was held within 40 days from the filing of the petition, as required by Rev. St. 1899, § 3027 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1733).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 33*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—ORDER—SUBMITTED QUESTION.

Rev. St. 1899, § 3027 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1733), provides that the question to be submitted at a local option election is whether or not spirituous and intoxicating liquors, including wine and beer, shall be sold within the limits of the county. Held, that where, in the published notice of election, the proposition to be voted on was stated in the language of the statute, and the proper form of ballot was used, the election was not void because the order recited the question "whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited in said county in accordance with the provisions of the local option law"; there having been a substantial compliance with the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 33*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—ORDER—PUBLICATION OF NOTICE.

Rev. St. 1899, § 3029 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1736), providing that an order for local option election shall direct the clerk to "cause to be published a notice of said election in some newspaper published in said county for at least four consecutive weeks," etc., requires the court to direct in the order the newspaper in which the notice is to be published.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 33*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTION—NOTICE—PUBLICATION.

Where the court erroneously omitted to designate the newspaper in which the notice of an order for local option election was to be published, as required by Rev. St. 1899, § 3029 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1736), such omission was rendered harmless by the clerk's publication of the notice in all the newspapers published in the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Worth County; Wm. C. Ellison, Judge.

Ed Kellogg was convicted of violating the local option law, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Peery and Kelso & Kelso, for appellant. L. M. Phipps and John Ewing, for the State.

JOHNSON, J. Defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted on a charge of violating what is known as the local option law (art. 3, c. 22, Rev. St. 1899 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 1733]), and brings the case here by appeal.

For the purposes of the case, defendant admitted making the sale charged in the indictment, and interposed as his sole defense the claim that the election in Worth county (where the sale was made) "to determine whether or not spirituous and intoxicating liquors, including wine and beer, shall be sold within the limits of such county," was not held in conformity with mandatory provisions of the statute. The first attack on the validity of the proceedings is leveled at the petition of the qualified voters of the county in which the election was ordered. The record of the county court relating to the petition embraces the following entries:

"Oct. 3, 1887. In the matter of the petition of divers taxpayers of Worth county for an order for an election to determine the question of the adoption or rejection of local option with regard to the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. It is ordered by the court that the petition presented be filed for record and the matter is continued until the next term of this court or until the constitutionality of the act be determined.

"Feb. 6, 1888. In the matter of the petitions filed by the taxpayers on October 3, 1887, in this court praying for an order of election on the question of local option and continued at said term until the constitutionality of said act be determined, now come the petitioners in said cause and ask leave to withdraw the same from the consideration of said court. It is therefore ordered by the court that they be permitted to withdraw the same.

"Feb. 8, 1888. Now at this time comes Carson Reed, B. N. Danford, and Rev. Watkins and file their petition in open court praying the court to order an election to submit to the qualified voters of the county the question of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the county of Worth in accordance with the provisions of the Wood local option law, Session Acts of 1887, at page 180, which said petition is taken up and considered by the court, and the court doth find that the said petition is signed by at least one-tenth of the qualified voters of Worth county, as required by law. It is therefore ordered by the court that an election be held on the 9th day of March, A. D. 1888, at the various voting precincts in said county, to determine whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited in said county in accordance with the provisions of the local option law. It is further ordered that the clerk of this court cause to be published a notice of said election in some newspaper published in said county for at least four consecutive weeks; the last insertion to be within ten days next before said election."

Oral evidence was admitted, from which it appears beyond question that the petition withdrawn on February 6, 1888, was embodied in the petition filed two days later, and the evidence tends to show that lists containing the names of new petitioners were incorporated with the old lists and entered into the composition of the petition presented on February 8, 1888. The statute provides (section 3027, Rev. St. 1890 [Ann. St. 1906, p. 1733]): "Upon application by petition signed by one-tenth of the qualified voters of any county * * * the county court of such county shall order an election * * * to take place within forty days after the reception of such petition," etc. Defendant contends that the provision requiring the election to be held in 40 days after the reception of the petition is mandatory, and that "since the evidence shows that the petition was received by the county court October 3, 1887, and remained on file until February 6, 1888, when it was withdrawn and refiled February 8th, and the election ordered to be held on March 9th, 156 days after the receipt of the petition by the county court, the election was therefore void."

It was held by the St. Louis Court of Appeals, in State ex rel. v. Ruark, 34 Mo. App. 325, and by this court, in State v. Webb, 49 Mo. App. 407, that the statutory provisions relating to the time and place of holding an election under the local option law are mandatory and not merely directory, and that an election held on a day more than 40 days after the receipt of the petition by the county court must be declared void. This view of the law has our sanction, and we pass to the question of whether the election in the present instance was appointed for a day within the statutory period. Defendant says that when the petition was received by the county court on October 3, 1887, its sole function was performed, and that by withdrawing it and re-filing it the petitioners could not prolong its life, and thus extend the time of holding the election beyond the statutory limit of 40 days. Reliance is placed on State v. Webb, supra, to support this contention. There a petition signed by about 1,800 voters was presented to the county court on July 10, 1888, and an election was ordered. Some three weeks later, a few of the petitioners (so the record stated) appeared in court, and, for reasons not important here, asked and obtained leave to withdraw the petition. Without leaving the courtroom, they then refiled the petition and obtained an order for an election, which was held 52 days after the original filing. Speaking of this proceeding, we said: "We regard this as a mere idle performance. There was only one petition presented, and that was on July 10th. It then served its purpose and from that time on was powerless to institute another such proceeding. The 1,800 signers to that petition had presented the same to the county court, and it had been acted on under the common understanding that there was to be an election looking to the enforcement of prohibition only in that portion of Cass county outside of Harrisonville and Pleasant Hill. A few of these signers attempted before the county court to withdraw the petition and offer it for another and different purpose; that is, to enforce this prohibition in Harrisonville as well as other portions of the county. It was all the time the same petition. It was lodged with the court on July 10th and would serve under the law a basis for the order of an election to be held within 40 days after said July 10th, but not later."

The facts before us differ in essential particulars from those stated in the case under review, and call for the application of a different rule. Here the record recital is that the petitioners themselves appeared and asked leave to withdraw their petition. Their number is not disclosed, but, whether it was 100 or 1,800, we have no right to reject as false this solemn record declaration, especially in view of the fact that its verity is not attacked in any manner. Rightly understood, there is nothing in the opinion in the Webb Case to militate against the view we entertain that they who petition for anything have an inherent right to withdraw their petition at any time before the accomplishment of its purpose, and we went no further than to deny to a small minority of the petitioners the right, on their own motion, and without authority from the others, to bind the whole body to a substantial alteration of the original purpose by a mere manipulation of the petition. Clearly this was right, but it falls far short of being a pronouncement that the petitioners themselves might not have withdrawn their petition at any time before the order for the election was made, as was done in the present case. The effect of such withdrawal was to divest the county court of jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and, with the proceeding at an end, there was nothing to prevent the same persons who signed the other petition from appearing again as petitioners. They had not disqualified themselves, and, having the right to petition, why put them to the trouble of signing another paper? We perceive no reason for saying that they might not use the same lists again. If all consented to another presentation, such consent revitalized the document, and it would be absurd to hold that their consent could be evidenced only by signing a different paper. The presumption of right acting which attaches to official acts compels us to assume, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that, in the two days which intervened between the withdrawal of the first petition and the presentation of the second, the consent of the first petitioners was obtained to the refile of the original lists.

Next, defendant contends that the order for the election is fatally defective for the reason that it provides for the submission to the voters of a proposition not authorized by the statute. The question stated in the order is "whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited in said county in accordance with the provisions of the local option law." That approved by the statute (section 3027) is "whether or not spirituous and intoxicating liquors, including wine and beer, shall be sold within the limits of such county." In the published notice of the election, the proposition to be voted on was stated in the language of the statute, and a proper form of ballot was given. In proceedings of this character, it always is advisable to follow closely the language of the statute, and where this is not done, and the variance is substantial, the election must be declared void. Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 95; Ex parte Beatty, 21 Tex. App. 426, 1 S. W. 451. But where, as here, there has been a substantial compliance with the statute, it is immaterial that its exact words were not employed in the order. It is the substance, not the form, that is all important. Unquestionably, the voters knew that the proposition to be determined was that authorized by the statute, for the order itself so stated, and, in addition, they were so informed by the published notice, as well as by the form of the ballot. If there was no room for a voter of ordinary intelligence to be deceived or misled about the question to be voted on—and we think there was none—mere verbal inexactness in the order should be disregarded. To hold otherwise would involve the injustice and logical absurdity of sacrificing the spirit and reason of the law to its bare letter. The function of the order was accomplished fully when the voters were given a legal opportunity to vote on the very question the law required to be submitted to them.

Finally, it is argued that the order was defective because it failed to name the newspaper in which the notice of election was to be published. The order directed the clerk to "cause to be published a notice of said election in some newspaper published in said county for at least four consecutive weeks," etc. It unquestionably appears from the evidence that the clerk published the notice in all of the newspapers published in the county. In State v. Baldwin, 109 Mo. App., loc. cit. 578, 83 S. W. 267, we said: "Under section 3029 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1736), of said local option law, it devolved on the county court to direct in what newspaper published in the county, if there was more than one so published, in which notice of the election should be published, and to order such other notice as it might think proper," etc. That is true. The law does not contemplate that the county court may leave it to the clerk to make a choice from among two or more papers. Such a course might lead to attempts to suppress the dissemination of information intended by law to be given full publicity. But in the case in hand, while the order apparently did attempt to delegate the selection of the newspaper to the clerk, no harm was done, for the reason that he wisely refused to make a choice and employed all of the papers in the county. In doing this, he substantially complied with the requirements of the statute, since he accomplished all that would have been accomplished had the order named the newspaper.

We are of opinion that the election was legal, and, as its alleged invalidity is the only defense offered, it follows that the judgment must be affirmed. All concur.

KELLOGG v. GERMAN AMERICAN INS. CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals, Missouri. Oct. 5, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1908.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 126*)—"PROPERTY" INSURABLE—INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Intoxicating liquors, being recognized as property in Missouri, are insurable.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 238*)—KEEPING LIQUORS—INTENT.

The presence of a quantity of intoxicating liquors in a drug store is not necessarily indicative of a purpose on the owner's part to violate the liquor law by making illegal sales thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 138*)—ILLEGAL CONTRACT—INSURANCE OF LIQUORS — VIOLATION OF LAW.

If when plaintiff, a druggist, insured his drug stock, containing a quantity of beer and whisky, he intended to conduct an unlawful business and sell the liquor contrary to law, the insurance would be void as directly protecting plaintiff in his illegal purposes; but if plaintiff, when he procured the insurance, was actuated by an intent to conduct a legitimate drug store and use the liquors only in connection with that business in the usual and lawful manner, the insurance was valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 251; Dec. Dig. § 138.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 668*)—DRUGGISTS—ILLEGAL BUSINESS.

The presence in a drug stock of 10 barrels of beer and 70 gallons of whisky and the fact that plaintiff occasionally made unlawful sales and had a thriving trade in whisky and beer did not establish as a matter of law that the plaintiff's business and practices were unlawful, rendering a policy on the stock void.

5. INSURANCE (§ 668*)—PAYMENT OF LOSS—VEXATIOUS REFUSAL—PENALTIES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action on a fire policy, whether defendant has been guilty of vexatiously refusing to pay the loss, so as to entitle plaintiff to recover the penalty authorized under such circumstances by Rev. St. 1899, § 8012 (Ann. St. 1904; p. 3808), is for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County; William D. Rusk, Judge.

Action by W. E. Kellogg against the German American Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fyke & Snyder and W. B. Pistole, for appellant. Mytton, Parkinson & Crow, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Action on two policies of fire insurance, which covered merchandise and fixtures in a drug store owned and operated by plaintiff in the town of Athelstan, Worth county. The policies were duly issued, plaintiff paid the premiums demanded, and the property was destroyed by fire during the period of insurance; but defendant refused to acknowledge liability and endeavors to justify its position on ground thus pleaded in the answer: "At the time said policy was issued, said plaintiff made application to defendant in writing for the policy sued on, in which said application plaintiff represented and stated over his signature the said insurance was wanted upon such goods as are usually carried and kept for sale by a drug store, and warranted in said application that the building described and within which the insured property was located and insured was occupied, first story, 'Drug store, and proprietor sleeps in small room,' and that the basement was used as a storage room, and warranted that such statement was a just, true, and full exposition and statement concerning the property to be insured, and the basis upon which the insurance was to be effected, and a continuing warranty on the part of the applicant, said plaintiff, which said statements and warranties defendant alleges were untrue and were a misrepresentation and concealment of material facts and circumstances concerning the insurance and subject thereof and a fraud upon defendant, in this: That the risk to be insured was not a drug store, but was or became a saloon and place where intoxicating liquors were sold, not for medicinal purposes, but in violation of law for use as beverages, and plaintiff's principal business was the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. That the merchandise for the loss of which plaintiff makes claim was not such goods as are usually kept for sale in a drug store, but were supplies for a saloon, consisting principally of whisky, beer, and other intoxicating liquor. That plaintiff did not apply to defendant for insurance upon a saloon or a place conducted as a saloon, and defendant did not issue its policy to cover such risk, nor to insure against such conditions, and, had it known the facts as they existed, would not have issued its said policy. * * * At the time the policy sued on was issued, and at the time of the fire mentioned in plaintiff's petition, and for a long time prior thereto, the sale of intoxicating liquors, wine and beer, was forbidden by law in Worth county, Mo., where the property in question was situated. That on the ——— day of ———, an election of the qualified voters of said county outside of cities of 2,500 population had been held, and, all as provided by law, the sale of intoxicating liquors in said county had been prohibited, and that plaintiff in keeping for sale intoxicating liquors, wine and beer, and selling the same, was acting in violation of law and conducting a business unlawful and forbidden by law, in all of which the property destroyed was used and was a part. That plaintiff was forbidden by law to keep and sell such merchandise, which consisted of intoxicating liquors, wine and beer, and other things to promote the sale thereof, and by reason thereof is not entitled to enforce a claim for their loss in a court of justice."

The policy on which the cause pleaded in the first count of the petition is founded was issued June 16, 1906, for a period of one year. It provided for insurance of $900 on plaintiff's "stock of merchandise, consisting principally of patent medicines, drugs, paints, oils, liquors, and such other goods not more hazardous as are usually kept for sale in a drug store," and for $175 "on store furniture and fixtures, including iron safe, counters and shelving," and recites that it is made and accepted subject to the following stipulations and considerations: "It is a part of the consideration of this policy and the basis upon which the rate of premium is fixed that, in the event of loss, this company shall not be liable for an amount greater than three-fourths of the actual cash value of the property covered by this policy at the time of such loss, and in case of other insurance * * * then for only its pro rata proportion of such three-fourths value. * * * This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented in writing or otherwise any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof. * * * This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and considerations. * * *" The policy pleaded in the second count, issued August 26, 1906, for one year, placed $300 on the stock of merchandise "consisting principally of drugs, patent medicines, notions, stock food, paints and such other goods not more hazardous as are usually kept for sale in a drug store." It is in the same form as the other policy. The application made by plaintiff for the first policy contains questions and answers as follows: "(8) Occupation. First story drug store, and proprietor sleeps in small room. Basement as storage room." "(10) Is the property steadily profitable? A. Yes. (11) Are there any other facts or circumstances affecting the risk? A. None." The applicant then covenants and agrees "that the foregoing is a just, true and full exposition and statement concerning the property to be insured, being the basis on which the insurance is to be effected, and a continuing warranty on the part of the applicant."

Plaintiff testified that in June, 1905, he purchased two stocks of drugs, etc. (in which were very little intoxicating liquors), consolidated them into a single stock, and opened a drug store in Athelstan. A year later, and just before the first policy in suit was issued, he took an inventory, from which it appears that the fixtures in the store were of the value of $246.30, and the merchandise $1,612.72. The merchandise included 10 barrels of beer and perhaps 70 gallons of whisky, the value of which is not stated. The fire occurred March 13, 1907, and the total purchases of merchandise made by plaintiff between June 13, 1906, the date of the inventory, and the day of the fire, amounted to $1,625, of which $682.80 was for beer, $579.50 for whisky, $16.53 for alcohol, $101.05 for tobacco and pipes, and the remainder for drugs and drug store articles. Plaintiff states, and there is no direct proof to the contrary, that he sold no spirituous liquors except on prescription, but that generally he sold beer without prescriptions. He was indicted and convicted on five different charges of violating the local option law. The cases were appealed to this court, and one of them was decided at this term. State v. Kellogg (not yet officially reported) 113 S. W. 600.

At the close of the evidence, defendant's request for an instruction peremptorily directing a verdict in its favor was refused, and at its request the court instructed the jury, in part, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the policies sued on insured a drug store and merchandise therein, consisting of patent medicines, drugs, paints, oils, liquors, and such other goods as are usually kept for sale in a drug store. If you find from the evidence that the principal business of plaintiff was the sale of intoxicating liquors, and was not that of a druggist, and that the place described therein was one where intoxicating liquors were principally sold, and not a legitimate drug store conducted, and the drug business was a mere cover for his liquor traffic, then the same was not insured by the policies sued on, and plaintiff cannot recover. The court instructs the jury that under the policies sued on only such liquors were insured as are usually kept in and are necessary to the business of a drug store, situated as plaintiff's store was situated; and if you find from the evidence plaintiff kept liquors not used in or necessary to a drug business and not sold incidental to his drug trade, or that his principal business consisted of the sale of intoxicating liquors, then he cannot recover for the value of any intoxicating liquors destroyed by the fire complained of in excess of the usual amount of such liquors necessary to the business of a druggist."

Verdict was for plaintiff on both counts of the petition, and, after unsuccessfully moving for a new trial, defendant brought the case here by appeal.

The first and most important questions presented for our determination are involved in the contention of defendant that the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. This contention is based on the hypothesis that the evidence, even in its aspect most favorable to plaintiff, shows beyond question that the business inaugurated and conducted by him was nothing less than an illicit dramshop, and that a stock of drugs was carried in connection with the business merely as a device to conceal the real purpose, which in its execution necessarily involved a continuous violation of law. From this standpoint, defendant reaches the conclusion that the policies are void on two grounds: First, because of the false representation of plaintiff that the property to be insured was being used and would be used in a legitimate and lawful manner, whereby defendant was deceived into issuing policies on a different and more hazardous risk than that represented; and, second, because the law should denounce as contra bonos mores, and therefore unenforceable, a contract made in aid of a scheme to violate the law, even should it appear that the insurer was not deceived.

In Kelly v. Insurance Co., 97 Mass. 288, it appeared that the subject of insurance was a stock of intoxicating liquor which the owner at the time of the insurance and during its currency kept for sale in violation of law. "It was liable to be seized and confiscated as a nuisance, and the place where it was kept was made a nuisance by the plaintiff's intent to sell it illegally. By thus keeping it, and also by thus selling it, the plaintiff committed an offense which was punishable by fine and imprisonment." After referring to the well-recognized doctrine of marine insurance, which holds void a policy of insurance issued on a vessel or its cargo where the object of the voyage is illegal, the court said: "The same principle upon which it is held that goods, which are carried for an illegal purpose or in an illegal manner, cannot be the subject of a valid insurance against the perils of the sea, applies with equal force to an insurance against fire upon goods which are so unlawfully kept in a store that the owner is liable to fine and imprisonment, the store made a nuisance, and the goods subject to seizure and forfeiture. In the present case, the insured was the guilty party, and his direct purpose in taking the policies was that he might continue his offense with the greater safety. His contract was in contravention of law and void as to him, because he entered into it in order to protect himself in his illegal acts."

In Niagara Insurance Co. v. De Graff, 12 Mich. 124, a general stock of merchandise, including dry goods and groceries, was insured. At the time of the fire, plaintiff had in stock spirituous liquors and alcohol. The trial court refused to instruct the jury "that, since the passage of the prohibitory liquor law, alcohol and spirituous liquors are not included in the term 'groceries' as used in reference to goods kept for sale, and charged that the question whether they were so included was one of fact for the jury." The Supreme Court of Michigan sustained this ruling, saying: "It was claimed on behalf of plaintiffs in error that, if these liquors can be allowed to be included in a policy, the policy will be, to all intents and purposes, insuring an illegal traffic, and several cases were cited involving marine policies on unlawful voyages and lottery insurances, which have been held void on that ground. These cases are not at all parallel, because they rest upon the fact that in each instance it is made a necessary condition of the policy that the illegal act shall be done. The ship being insured for a certain voyage, that voyage is the only one upon which the insurance would apply, and the underwriter becomes thus directly a party to an illegal act. So insuring a lottery ticket requires the lottery to be drawn in order to attach the insurance to the risk. If this policy were in express terms a policy insuring the party selling liquors against loss by fire or forfeiture, it would be quite analogous; but this insurance attaches only to property, and the risks insured against are not the consequences of illegal acts, but of accident. Our statute does not in any way destroy or affect the right of property in spirituous liquors, or prevent title being transmitted, but renders sales unprofitable by preventing the vendor from availing himself of the ordinary advantages of a sale, and also affixes certain penalties. If the owner sees fit to retain his property without selling it, or to transmit it into another state or country, he can do so. By insuring his property, the insurance company have no concern with the use he may make of it, and, as it is susceptible of lawful uses, no one can be held to contract concerning it in an illegal manner, unless the contract itself is for a directly illegal purpose. Collateral contracts, in which no illegal design enters, are not affected by an illegal transaction with which these may be remotely connected. In the case of Insurance Company v. Polleys, 13 Pet. 157, 10 L. Ed. 105, an insurance upon a ship known by the insurance company to be liable to forfeiture under the registry laws of the United States was held valid, and a recovery was permitted for a loss while sailing under papers known to be illegal. The case of Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. Ed. 468, is still stronger. It is difficult to perceive how public policy can be violated by an insurance of any kind of property recognized by the law to exist."

The Supreme Court of Vermont, in dealing with facts very closely akin to those under consideration in the present case, had this to say: "If the purpose of the contract in question had been to protect the assured in the sale of intoxicating liquors, it would have been null; but the greater part of the property insured consisted of goods insurance upon which was subject to no objection. The contract was legal upon its face, nothing appearing to show that the wines and liquors were intended for illegal sale; and it is a fact not needing proof that, in compounding medicines, liquors, especially wines and alcohol, are of daily use, and for that purpose their possession and use by druggists legitimate. The assured was a dealer in drugs and medicines, and in that respect legitimately and presumably using liquors. There was evidence tending to show that he illegally sold them, including those not used in compounding medicines, and the fact may have been that the latter trade was the larger and his main one. If such illegal traffic was the business of the assured, and his legal traffic and transactions with other property a mere cover, ostensibly carried on for the purpose of enabling him to secrete and disguise his iniquity, the purpose of the contract would be to protect him in his illegal ventures, and it would therefore be void; but if he carried on his business, using alcoholic liquors legitimately in his drug trade, and occasionally sold them in violation of law, we think that, if no illegal design entered into the making of the contract in its inception, it would be so far collateral to the illegal acts that it would be inconsistent and in accordance with no well-adjudged case to hold it null. * * * The distinction is between cases where the contract is void in its inception, entered into for the purpose of protecting a prohibited traffic, and those cases where the contract is collateral, and into which no illegal design enters, although by the subsequent acts of the assured it becomes remotely connected with illegal transactions." Carrigan v. Insurance Co., 53 Vt. 418, 38 Am. Rep. 687.

The doctrine of this case was approved by the Supreme Court of Iowa in Erb v. Insurance Co., 98 Iowa, 606, 67 N. W. 583, 40 L. R. A. 845, where it is said: "The facts to bring the policy within the rule to make it void are wanting. The drugs and liquors are recognized property in this state and as legitimate subjects of insurance as other property. It is the illegal use of them that gives rise to the questions before us. We have not seen a case in which, because of the mere use of property for illegal purposes, not increasing the hazard, in the absence of stipulations to that effect, a policy has been held void because of such use. It is not a case in which the contract itself is against public policy, by the parties, at the inception of it, intending it to be in aid of purposes or designs to violate the law. This case simply presents the question whether, where a party uses property for an unlawful purpose that is susceptible of legitimate use, such use will render the insurance contract void as against public policy. We think that no authority sustains such a rule, and it does not seem to be dictated by reason."

The Supreme Court of Kansas, in Insurance Co. v. Evans, 64 Kan. 770, 68 Pac. 623, recognized as sound the principles followed in the Michigan, Vermont, and Iowa cases from which we have quoted, and so we regard them. Intoxicating liquors, being recognized as property in this state, are insurable, and their presence in a drug store is not necessarily indicative of a purpose on the part of their owner to violate the liquor laws by making illegal sales of them. If, at the making of the contract of insurance, plaintiff intended to conduct an unlawful business, the contract of insurance should be held void, on the ground that its direct effect was to protect plaintiff in his purpose to violate the law. If, on the other hand, plaintiff, at the time the insurance was procured, was actuated by the intent to conduct a legitimate drug store and to use intoxicating liquors in connection with that business only, in the usual and lawful manner, we perceive no reason for declaring the contract void. There is nothing on its face to bespeak such improper purpose. As before stated, it deals with a legitimate subject of insurance, and the indemnity provided is for the accidental loss or injury of the property by fire, and not against loss sustained in consequence of a violation of law. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the presence in the stock at the time the insurance was contracted of 10 barrels of beer and 70 gallons of whisky indubitably stamped the business and practices of plaintiff as unlawful; nor should we indulge in such inference from the additional facts that, after the insurance was procured, plaintiff occasionally made unlawful sales and had a very thriving trade in whisky and beer. Such facts tend to prove the existence of unlawful intent, but they are not conclusive, and, in effect, go no further than to raise an issue of fact for the solution of the jury. We think the court properly overruled the demurrer to the evidence and submitted the issue to the jury in instructions which correctly declared the law of the case.

Point is made that the verdict is excessive, but we find the excess has been eliminated by a remittitur entered by plaintiff.

Objection is made to the submission to the jury of the question of whether or not a penalty should be imposed on defendant, under the provisions of section 8012, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3808), for vexatiously refusing to pay the loss. What was said by the Supreme Court in the case of Keller v. Ins. Co., 198 Mo., loc. cit. 460, 95 S. W. 909, completely answers the objection: "The question of vexatious delay on the part of the defendant in paying this death claim was one of fact to be determined by the jury."

It was said by this court, in Brown v. Railway Assurance Co., 45 Mo., loc. cit. 227: "The whole question of vexatious refusal or delay is a matter of fact to be determined by the jury. They must make up their verdict by a general survey of all the facts and circumstances in the case; and if, upon a full consideration, they conclude that the refusal was unjustifiable and vexatious, the law authorizes them to assess the damages. The statute will not admit of the construction contended for by counsel for the plaintiff in error that, before damages are allowed, it must be explicitly proved by the plaintiff that the delay or refusal was vexatious. In our opinion, the record discloses sufficient evidence to warrant the court in submitting the question of vexatious delay in the payment of this claim to the jury, and we shall not undertake to usurp the province of the jury and retry such questions upon this appeal."

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

valled in the trial court, where the cause was tried without a jury. Plaintiff appealed.

On October 6, 1887, defendant Charles C. Bell borrowed $502.75 from his brother, the plaintiff, and delivered to his brother his negotiable promissory note for that sum, payable July 1, 1888, and bearing 10 per cent. interest per annum from date. On November 1, 1887, said defendant borrowed $1,305.77 from plaintiff, and gave his note due July 1, 1889, for that amount, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum from date. December 13th of the same year, defendant Charles C. Bell and his wife, Mary R. Bell, joined in the execution of a mortgage on land owned by the wife in Cedar county, Mo. The instrument contains the recital: "This grant is intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of one thousand eight hundred eight and 54-100 dollars, according to the terms of tow certain promissory notes executed by the said C. C. Bell to the party of the second part, Jas. S. Bell, date Oct. 6, 1887, due July 1, 1888, amount $502.75; second note dated Nov. 1, 1887, due July 1, 1889." The mortgage was delivered to plaintiff, and was recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of Cedar county, June 11, 1889. No payment of either principal or interest was made on the first-described note. Two payments were made and indorsed on the larger note, one of $500 on July 14, 1890, and one of $62.60 on November 3, 1892. This suit was brought in the circuit court of Cedar county the 26th day of January, 1907, after both notes were barred by the statute of limitations. One of the defenses interposed by the answering defendants thus is pleaded: "That if said mortgage was executed, same was without consideration, having been received by said Mary R. Bell, or any one to her use, or having been given by the plaintiff or any one for him to induce the execution of said mortgage, and that, if executed at all, said deed of trust was executed by both makers without any consideration whatever."

The recitals in the mortgage and the testimony of plaintiff show indisputably that the mortgage was given by Mrs. Bell on her land to secure a pre-existing debt of her husband, and without any new consideration of any kind to her or her husband. The loans were made by plaintiff to her husband without a demand by the former or a promise by the latter that such security or any security would be given. Plaintiff parted with his money and accepted his debtor's promissory notes for it; then, a month or more after the transaction had been closed and before the maturity of either note, demanded security, and received the mortgage in suit in compliance with the demand. The rule is well settled that "a married woman, when conforming to the requirements of the statute, has the unquestioned power to make a valid mortgage upon her real estate which is not held to her separate use, though the debt or liability secured thereby is that of her husband." Meads v. Hutchinson, 111 Mo. 620. 19 S. W. 1111. And it is just as well settled that a mortgage given to secure the payment of a pre-existing debt of another is invalid if not supported by a new consideration. "The least benefit or advantage to the promisor, or the lease injury or detriment suffered by the promisee or a third person, will support the contract." Lamp Co. v. Mfg. Co., 64 Mo. App. 115, and cases cited. But there must be some consideration, and where, as here, it appears by all the evidence, including the recitals of the instrument itself, that there was none, the mortgage should be held invalid. This conclusion adequately supports the judgment rendered by the trial court for defendants, and relieves us of the duty of discussing other questions ably presented by counsel.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

STATE ex rel. LINDQUIST v. BUTLER. (Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 16, 1908.)

COSTS (§ 298*)—IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—RIGHTS ON ACQUITTAL—PETIT LARCENY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Rev. St. 1899, § 2778 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1612), provides that where proceedings are presented before a justice at the instance of the prosecuting witness for certain offenses not amounting to felonies, except for petit larceny, and accused is discharged, the prosecuting witness shall pay the costs. Section 2836 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1628) provides that if upon trial of an indictment or information accused shall be acquitted, and the prosecuting witness shall be liable for the costs, judgment shall be rendered against him, "and in no case shall the same be paid by the county or state." Held that, under section 2778, in prosecutions for petit larceny, the prosecuting witness is not liable for costs where accused is discharged, and section 2836 merely requires judgment against the prosecuting witness where accused is discharged if the witness is liable therefor under section 2778 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1612), the phrase, "and in no case shall the same be paid by the county or state," referring only to cases where the prosecution is liable for the costs under that section.

Mandamus by the State, on the relation of Frans E. Lindquist, to compel John P. Butler, Judge, to approve and certify a bill of costs. Peremptory writ ordered.

Frans E. Lindquist, for relator.

BROADDUS, P. J. This is a proceeding by mandamus to compel the Honorable John P. Butler, Judge of the Twelfth judicial circuit, to approve and certify a certain bill of costs.

The facts are that on the 6th day of May, 1908, one Zoe Farrell was tried in the court of the relator, a justice of the peace within and for Linn county, upon an information filed by the prosecuting attorney of the county, based upon the affidavit of one J. H. Cassity, charging her with the crime of petit larceny; that a trial before a jury was had, which resulted in a verdict of not guilty, and the said defendant was duly discharged; that relator made out a proper fee bill of the costs against Linn county that had accrued in the case and certified the same to the circuit clerk of the county; that thereupon said clerk made out, as is usual in such cases, a fee bill of said costs, and delivered the same to the said prosecuting attorney, who approved and certified its correctness; that thereafter, on the 23d day of June, 1908, said bill of costs was duly presented to the respondent, judge of said court as aforesaid, for his approval, but who refused to approve the same in the following language: "Approval refused, June 23rd, 1908. [Signed] John P. Butler, Judge." It is agreed by the parties that no alternative writ of mandamus shall be issued, and that, if a peremptory writ be issued, it may issue in the first instance, and it is further agreed that respondent may file his return to the petition herein. The respondent in writing has waived his return, and submits the case upon the matters and things set forth in the petition and writ. The controversy, if any, the respondent having filed no brief or argument, arises upon a construction of sections 2778, 2836, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, pp. 1612, 1628).

The first section reads as follows: "When the proceedings are prosecuted before any justice of the peace, at the instance of the injured party, for the disturbance of the peace of a person, or for libel or slander, or for any trespass against the person or property of another, not amounting to a felony, except for petit larceny, the name of such injured party shall be entered by the justice on his docket as a prosecutor; and if the defendant shall be discharged or acquitted, such prosecutor shall be adjudged to pay the costs not otherwise adjudged; and in every other case of acquittal, if the justice or jury trying the case shall state in the finding that the prosecution was malicious or without probable cause, the justice shall enter judgment for costs against the prosecution or party at whose instance the information was filed, and shall issue execution therefor; but in no case shall the prosecuting attorney be liable for costs. In other cases of discharge or acquittal the costs shall be paid by the county, except when the prosecution is commenced by complaint and the prosecuting attorney declines to file information thereon, in which case the proceedings shall be dismissed at the cost of the party filing the complaint." The second reads as follows: "If, upon the trial of any indictment or information, the defendant shall be acquitted or discharged, and the prosecutor or prosecuting witness shall be liable to pay the costs according to law, judgment shall be rendered against such prosecutor for the costs in the case, and in no case shall the same be paid by either the county or state." The language of section 2778 is plain to the effect that, in prosecutions for petit larceny, the injured party, or as otherwise designated the prosecuting witness, is not liable for the costs of the proceeding wherein the defendant is discharged. Section 2836 is not in conflict with section 2778. Construed together, the former is merely directory; that is, in case the defendant is acquitted or discharged, judgment shall be rendered against the prosecutor wherein he is liable for the costs according to law—i. e., under section 2778—or in all cases not amounting to a felony and except for petit larceny. And the negative language in section 2836, viz., "and in no such case shall the same be paid by either the county or state," merely refers to cases where the prosecutor is liable for the costs according to law; i. e., section 2778.

It follows, therefore, that it was the duty of the respondent to approve of said fee bill, and it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandamus be issued commanding him to do so. All concur.

DONNER v. METROPOLITAN ST. RY. CO.
(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov 16, 1908.)

EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 119*) — RIGHTS IN STREETS—STREET RAILROADS—SPUR TRACKS.

Where a city allowed a street railway company to operate a spur track to connect its main tracks with its car barns, the servitude was not different from that contemplated in the original dedication of the street, and an abutter cannot recover for injury caused by a proper maintenance of such track, though he can recover for damages resulting from its negligent maintenance at such an elevation as to seriously obstruct the free use of the sidewalk.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Edw. E. Yates, Special Judge.

Action by Nels P. J. Donner against the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

John H. Lucas, Frank G. Johnson, and Ben F. White, for appellant. A. N. Adams and Scarritt, Scarritt & Jones, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. This suit is for the recovery of special damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in consequence of the erection and maintenance by defendant of an obstruction in the public street in front of property owned and occupied by plaintiff in Kansas City. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiff in the sum of $1,200, and the cause is here on the appeal of defendant.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The premises of plaintiff are at No. 3229 Troost avenue, and consist of a lot 20 feet by 150 feet and a two-story brick business building thereon. Plaintiff operates a confectionery store in the building, and lives over the store. The property is on the east side of Troost avenue, and has a frontage of 20 feet on that thoroughfare. The property immediately to the south is owned by defendant, a street railway company, and for some time prior to the trial of this cause had been occupied by barns for the storage, etc., of electric cars in use on defendant's lines in Kansas City. One of these lines, a double-track road, runs along the middle part of Troost avenue. Two spur tracks, curved in from the north, connected the east main track with the barns, and cars were run in and out over these spurs, when they were withdrawn from or put into service for the carriage of passengers. The first of these spur tracks is the cause of the present controversy. It was constructed in 1902, and ever since has been, so plaintiff contends, a serious obstruction to free ingress and egress to and from his store. His evidence tends to show that, on account of the closeness of this track to his property, the frequency of the passage of cars over it and the fact that it crosses the sidewalk immediately south of that in front of his store access to his building by his customers is impeded and made somewhat dangerous, that vehicles cannot remain standing for any time in front of his store, and that, on account of the negligent elevation of the track above the proper grade, the sidewalk on that side of the street is not as convenient and attractive to pedestrians as otherwise it would be. It is shown that the market value of plaintiff's property has been greatly depreciated by the presence of this track and the operation of cars over it. Further, it appears that because of the elevation of the track the flow of surface water is arrested, and trash and debris collected in front of the store. The cause of action thus is stated in the petition: "That the defendant on or about September, 1902, wrongfully and unlawfully constructed, and has since wrongfully and unlawfully maintained, a switch or spur across the roadway and sidewalk of said Troost avenue in front of and adjoining plaintiff's said lot from the main line of said Troost avenue car line to defendant's car barn, situate on a lot adjoining plaintiff's said lot on the south. That said switch or spur is only 8½ feet from the curbing at the north line of plaintiff's said lot, and from thence curves slightly to a point in the curbing at its intersection with the south line of plaintiff's said lot. That defendant, in the construction of said switch or spur, changed and elevated the surface and grade of the roadway of said Troost avenue in front of and adjoining plaintiff's said lot about eight inches, and destroyed the roadway, the pavement, curbing, and sidewalk on said street in front of and adjacent to plaintiff's said lot. That defendant, acting by and through its agents and servants, has wrongfully and unlawfully run its cars during the day and night over said switch or spur into and out of their said barn, not for the purpose of carrying passengers, but for its private use and convenience, since September, 1902, and will continue to so use them until the year 1925. That passengers are not carried over said switch or spur. That in the passage of cars over said switch or spur the cars extend a distance of two feet over said sidewalk in front of plaintiff's said lot, and thereby defendant permanently appropriates that portion of said sidewalk to its private use. That, by reason of the wrongful and unlawful construction and use of said switch or spur, and the operation of cars thereon, as aforesaid, passage over and along said Troost avenue in front of said lot is greatly hindered. That thereby the ingress of plaintiff and his customers and the public having business with him to said building from said Troost avenue is greatly impeded and rendered hazardous. That thereby plaintiff and his customers are greatly hindered in their use of said Troost avenue, and the use of the sidewalk in front of said lot of plaintiff. That thereby the value of plaintiff's said lot and the buildings thereon is greatly diminished. That defendant has not paid or tendered plaintiff any compensation for the said damage to said property. Plaintiff states that the damage caused by the wrongful and unlawful construction and use of said switch or spur and the operation of cars thereon as aforesaid is special to him and his said property, and is not common to other property owners along said Troost avenue." The answer contains a general denial and the allegation that the construction and maintenance of the switch was authorized by an ordinance of the city. The proof offered by defendant supports this allegation, and the fact alleged is not denied by plaintiff.

The demurrer to the evidence offered by defendant was overruled, and, at the instance of plaintiff, the court instructed the jury "that if you believe from the evidence the plaintiff is and was at the time hereinafter referred to the owner and occupant of a certain lot having a frontage of 20 feet on Troost avenue, and extending back therefrom 150 feet, known and described as the south 20 feet of lot 6 in Linwood, an addition to Kansas City, Mo., and the improvements thereon, and that said lot fronts on Troost avenue in said city, that defendant on or about September, 1902, began the construction and shortly thereafter completed a switch or spur from the main line of the car line on said Troost avenue into its car barn, and that the said car barn was situate on the lot adjoining plaintiff's said lot on the south, and that said switch or spur crosses the roadway of said Troost avenue from the said car track at or near the center thereof to the east line of said street in front of and adjacent to the plaintiff's said property, and that said switch or spur was not constructed to be used, and has not been used, to carry passengers thereon, and was constructed to be used, and has been used only for, the private use of defendant in taking cars to and from the car track on said Troost avenue to its said car barn, and that by reason of the construction of the said switch or spur and the use thereof, as aforesaid, the use of said Troost avenue in front of plaintiff's said lot by the plaintiff and the public has been unreasonably obstructed and impeded, as to the use of said avenue for passage along the same, in front of plaintiff's premises, and for ingress and egress between said property and said street, and that thereby plaintiff's said property has been depreciated in value and damaged to an extent and in a manner that is special and peculiar to plaintiff's said property, and not common to other property along said Troost avenue then your verdict should be for the plaintiff in such a sum as will compensate him for such damage, and the amount of such recovery, if any, should be the difference between the fair market value of said property before and after the said acts of the defendant, provided that you find from the evidence the value thereof after the said acts of the defendant is less than it was immediately before, and that said difference was caused by the said acts of the defendant."

It is argued by defendant that the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained on the ground that the facts alleged in the petition and sustained by proof fail to show the existence of any damages suffered by plaintiff of a kind different from that borne by the general public. In Placke v. Railroad, 140 Mo. 634, 41 S. W. 915, plaintiff, the owner of property abutting on a public street, brought suit in equity to enjoin the defendant from constructing and operating an electric street railway along the street. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment, which was for the defendant. We quote from the opinion: "The plaintiff relies upon Lockwood v. Railroad, 122 Mo. 86, 26 S. W. 698, 24 L. R. A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547, as sustaining his claim. That case and the subsequent cases (Knapp, Stout & Co. v. Railroad, 126 Mo. 26, 28 S. W. 627, and the Schulenburg-Boeckeler Lumber Co. v. Railroad, 129 Mo. 455, 31 S. W. 796—decide that a city has no power to authorize such use of a street as will destroy its use as a public thoroughfare, and enjoined the maintenance of steam railroads in said streets under the peculiar circumstances in each of said cases. It is a misapplication of those cases, however, to apply them to the construction of street railways unless such street railways are so defectively constructed as to prevent the current use of the highway by the public in the ordinary course of travel. This petition seeks to enjoin, not the construction of a street railway which is not laid at grade, or is to be otherwise defective-ly or dangerously built or laid, but the construction of any street railway, claiming that the use of the street for any such railway is an invasion of the plaintiff's rights as an abutting owner. * * * We think it must now be regarded as settled law that an electric street railway laid to grade is not an additional servitude, and does not infringe upon the property rights of those whose lots abut on the street. Dean v. Railroad, 93 Mich. 330, 53 N. W. 396; Koch v. Railroad, 75 Md. 222, 23 Atl. 463, 15 L. R. A. 377; Lockhart v. Railroad, 139 Pa. 419, 21 Atl. 26; Railroad v. Railroad, 156 Ill. 255; Taggart v. Railroad, 16 R. I. 668, 19 Atl. 326, 7 L. R. A. 205." The rule approved in this and other decisions of the Supreme Court is that the construction and maintenance of a street railroad in a public street pursuant to authority granted by the city does not subject the street to a servitude different from that which was contemplated in the original dedication, and the damage to an abutting owner resulting from such use of the street is damnum absque injuria. Nagle v. Railway, 167 Mo. 89, 66 S. W. 1090; Ransom v. Railroad, 104 Mo. 375, 16 S. W. 496; Ruckert v. Railway, 163 Mo. 260, 63 S. W. 814. "The law is quite well settled that the property owner must show, to entitle him to recover damages for an obstruction to a highway that the damages are peculiar to him, different in kind, and not merely in degree, from those suffered by other members of the community." Rude v. City of St. Louis, 93 Mo. 408, 6 S. W. 257. But it was said in De Geofroy v. Railway, 179 Mo., loc. cit. 715, 79 S. W. 392, 64 L. R. A. 959, 101 Am. St. Rep. 524: "That the power of a city or other municipal corporation in Missouri to authorize the construction of railroads in the public streets is a 'modified right, a right hedged about with many qualifications'; that it does not include the right to grant a railroad the exclusive use of the surface of a street even when laid at grade. Lockwood v. Railroad, 122 Mo. 86, 26 S. W. 698, 24 L. R. A. 516, 43 Am. St. Rep. 547; Sherlock v. Railroad, 142 Mo. 172, 43 S. W. 629, 64 Am. St. Rep. 551; Knapp, Stout & Co. v. Railroad, 126 Mo. 26, 28 S. W. 627; Lumber Co. v. Railroad, 129 Mo. 455, 31 S. W. 796; Corby v. Railroad, 150 Mo. 457, 52 S. W. 282. Neither can the municipal authority grant the power to a railroad company of such use of a street as will destroy or unreasonably interfere with the right of an abutting property holder of access to or egress from his property, or deprive him of his easement of light and air from the street. The street on which a railroad is constructed on the grade cannot be used for side tracks, the storing of cars, for water tanks, or like structures. Lackland v. Railroad, 31 Mo. 188; Tate v. Railroad, 64 Mo. 149; Spencer v. Railroad, 120 Mo. 154, 23 S. W. 126, 22 L. R. A. 668.

And it is argued by plaintiff that the doctrine of this case sustains his contention that the installation and maintenance of the spur track of itself constituted an unreasonable interference with his right of ingress and egress. We do not think so. Defendant owned the adjoining land and likewise possessed the right of ingress and egress to and from its property. Its use of the property as a place for its barns was a legitimate use. The barns were as much a part of the railroad and perhaps as essential to the proper service of the public as were the main tracks or the cars, and the spur tracks which connected them to the main line were as much a part of the street railroad as were the main tracks themselves. We think the city had the power to grant defendant the privilege of laying and operating the spur track, and that the servitude thereby imposed on the street was no different from that contemplated in the original dedication. This spur track was not of the class of constructions to which belong "side tracks, water tanks, or like structures." Such structures must be placed on private grounds, and their presence in a public street would be a nuisance per se. The track in question could not be laid on private property, and it was indispensable to the proper operation of the road, and therefore to the proper service of the public. The damages suffered by plaintiff from the presence of the track had it been properly constructed are general and not special, and they afford plaintiff no cause of action.

But it is alleged in the petition and the evidence of plaintiff tends to show that the track was negligently constructed and maintained in the respect that it was placed at an elevation so much above the grade of the street that it offered a serious obstruction in front of plaintiff's property to the free use of the sidewalk. The damages inflicted on plaintiff's property by such negligence are special damages which he is entitled to recover. The right of defendant to lay the track in the street carried with it the duty to construct and maintain it in a proper manner. Defendant had no right to increase the servitude by its negligence, and an abutting owner injured thereby suffers an injury not borne by the general public.

It follows from what we have said that no error was committed by the court in overruling the demurrer to the evidence. It likewise follows that the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded on account of palpable error in the instruction given at the request of plaintiff. The theory of the instruction is that the track in controversy belonged to the class of constructions that has no proper place in a public thoroughfare, unless it was used in the transportation of passengers. For the reasons stated, this theory is erroneous. We have considered other points made by defendant, and find them to be without merit.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded. All concur.

JACKSON v. PETTIGREW.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 16, 1908.)

TRESPASS (§ 25*)—DEFENSES—AUTHORITY OF PERSON IN POSSESSION.

The cutting and hauling, from time to time, during a course of years, of trees for fire wood, indicated only by the stumps left, is not such actual possession of the land by the person so doing that authority from her would be a defense, against the actual owner, to trespass by defendant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nodaway County; Wm. C. Ellison, Judge.

Action by William T. Jackson against Cameron L. Pettigrew. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. A. Cummins and A. F. Harvey, for appellant. Shinabarger, Blagg & Ellison, for respondent.

BROADBUD, P. J. This is a suit for damages for the alleged trespass of defendant in cutting timber on plaintiff's land. The dispute is in reference to three acres of land. The land originally belonged to George W. Jackson, deceased. The plaintiff, his son, after the death of his father, became the owner by purchase of the interest of the other heirs of his father, and was at the institution of this suit the apparent record owner of the title. It is admitted that defendant entered upon the disputed territory and cut and removed timber therefrom. Although plaintiff had the title to the land, he was not in the actual possession at the time of the institution of this suit.

The defense is that the defendant was in the actual possession under claim and color of title. The tract, according to the testimony of some of the witnesses, was included within the fences which inclosed the Pettigrew land on the west up to six or seven years before the bringing of this action, since which time it has been unfenced. Mrs. Pettigrew, the widow of Charles Pettigrew, the then owner of the land, was introduced as a witness upon the part of defendant to prove that her husband had bought the land from Geo. W. Jackson, plaintiff's father. Her evidence is: That she carried by direction of her husband a receipt, acknowledging payment for the land, to Jackson, who signed it, and told her to go to a man by the name of Robinson and tell him to draw up a deed conveying the property to her husband, add that he would sign it. He also told her to take a deed, called the O'Howell deed, from which Robinson would be enabled to make out a proper description of the land intended to be conveyed; that she took the receipt and the O'Howell deed to Robinson, who prepared a deed to be signed by Jackson, and informed him that it had been prepared, whereupon Jackson said to her that as "quick as he got well he would go and sign it"; and that he died before doing so. Charles Pettigrew, the husband of Mrs. Pettigrew, died in April, 1895, and Jackson died in a short time thereafter. The plaintiff objected to the introduction of the receipt mentioned, which objection the court sustained, and objected also to the competency of Mrs. Pettigrew as a witness, and to the competency of her evidence for various reasons. Parts of her statements were admitted and parts excluded, but it is exceedingly difficult to determine what was excluded and what was admitted by inspection of the abstract. The evidence of defendant tended to show that at times Mrs. Pettigrew cut and hauled timber from the land for fire wood, and that one year, while the fence remained, she leased it to a neighbor. The timber on the land was large, and there was little or no grass. Mrs. Pettigrew made no improvements whatever, and there were no visible marks to indicate that the land was in the possession of any one, and had not been for several years prior to the alleged trespass. The defendant cut the trees upon direction of Mrs. Pettigrew.

Among other instructions, the plaintiff asked the court to say to the jury that there was no evidence that defendant was in the actual visible possession of the land, which the court refused. The court gave the following instruction at the instance of defendant: "The court instructs the jury that actual possession does not imply that the occupant must actually stand upon his property constantly to keep off intruders, or that he must keep his servant or agent there. Any overt acts indicating exclusive dominion and a purpose to permanently occupy, and not to abandon, the premises, will satisfy this requirement." Also this instruction: "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that, at the time defendant cut the trees described in the petition, said land was not in the actual possession of plaintiff, but was in the actual, visible possession of defendant, or of some third person under whose permission, authority, or consent defendant was acting, and that defendant, under such circumstances, cut the trees in good faith under claim of right, then the jury should find for defendant, although the land and trees, in fact, belonged to plaintiff."

There is no question of law involved in the case, as the instructions given in behalf of defendant are unobjectionable from a legal standpoint; the question being whether they should have been given under the evidence. Waiving all objections to the competency of Mrs. Pettigrew to testify and the competency and relevancy of her testimony, we are impressed with the conviction that defendant, under his evidence, was a trespasser without justification. Mrs. Pettigrew, under whom he claims authority for entering upon the land and cutting the timber, had no such possession as warranted his act in entering. For six years before the alleged trespass, there had been no fence inclosing the land. No house of any kind, no cultivation whatever, or anything of any nature to indicate her possession, was shown by the evidence, save and excepting the stumps of trees that had been cut in the course of years. Had there been color of title shown and any evidence of occupation, however slight, the instructions would have been proper. But both these factors were lacking.

In Carter v. Hornback, 139 Mo. 238, 40 S. W. 893, it is held that the "cutting and hauling fire wood, sawing timber, making and hauling fence rails from the land, and clearing up same, do not constitute actual possession." Such is the general rule. It is useless to further discuss the question. Plaintiff's instruction, which was in the nature of a demurrer to defendant's case, should have been given.

Reversed and remanded. All concur.

In an action against a city for injuries from a defective street, the withdrawal by plaintiff's counsel in the presence of the jury of evidence that the city repaired the street after plaintiff's injury, and the court's announcement of the withdrawal, and direction that the evidence should not be considered, cured the error of its admission.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pettis County; Louis Hoffman, Judge.

Personal injury action by William H. Heberling against the City of Warrensburg. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. K. Tuttle, Chas. E. Morrow, and Jas. A. Kemper, for appellant. O. L. Houts, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This action is for personal injury received on one of defendant's streets by reason of plaintiff being thrown from a vehicle in which he was riding with a friend, and receiving serious injury. The judgment was for plaintiff. There was a former trial in which the verdict was for the defendant. The court granted plaintiff a new trial, and defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, where the order was affirmed (204 Mo. 604, 103 S. W. 36), and the trial now appealed from followed. By reference to that report, there will be found a full statement of the facts upon which the case is founded, and they need not be repeated here further than to say that defendant's officers took out of the street a wooden culvert reaching fairly across its width, 14 inches deep and 20 inches wide. The place was filled in with loose dirt. Rains and travel made the filling soft, so that the wheels of a vehicle would drop suddenly to a considerable depth. A rain had filled the wagon tracks and depressions with water so as to leave the defects in the place less likely to be observed. Plaintiff and a companion were driving along in an ordinary trot, when the front wheels of their vehicle suddenly dropped into the place, throwing plaintiff forward between the horses onto the tongue and doubletrees. The horses ran, and plaintiff was injured. An examination of the points made satisfy us that reversible error was not committed. Evidence was received showing that the city repaired the street after the injury to plaintiff. This was withdrawn by counsel for plaintiff in the presence of the jury, and the court announced its withdrawal, and directed that it be not considered. That in a civil case cures the error. Buckman v. Railway Co., 100 Mo. App. 30, 78 S. W. 270.

Complaint is made that two persons said to the street commissioner when he was filling the place from which he had taken the culvert that it was dangerous, and some one would get hurt; but this was not so much for the purpose of getting the opinion of the witness as it was to show notice or knowledge of the defect. Such evidence seems not to have been regarded as improper. 204 Mo. 610, 103 S. W. 36. At any rate, no one can fairly say that such evidence in the circumstances, considering the state of the proof from other sources, was of such character as to require the verdict to be set aside.

It is also made a matter of complaint that the court should have permitted witnesses to state whether the place was filled in the usual, ordinary, and proper manner. The witnesses had stated it was "filled good. It was filled up round, about 10 inches wide, good and high." The court refused their opinion whether that was the proper way. That was a question for the jury. The Supreme Court stated that it was not proper exculpatory evidence to show that this place was filled as other places were, as that was not a standard of safety. 204 Mo. 618, 103 S. W. 36. And so we think the better examination would have been to have asked how the work was done, etc., and then let the jury say if it was proper. Eubank v. Edina, 88 Mo. 651; King v. Railway Co., 98 Mo. 235, 11 S. W. 563. We think there is no substantial ground for objection to the mere showing that Thompson was street commissioner; nor do we think there was any error as to exclusions of offer to show what witnesses Fountain and Ridge would state in reference to the place being filled in the ordinary way.

A full examination of the record and briefs of counsel leaves us convinced that we have no right to overturn the verdict, and the judgment is therefore affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monticau County; W. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by Thyrza Gallagher against the City of Tipton. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

R. M. Embry, W. F. Quigley, and C. D. Corum, for appellant. A. L. Shortridge and W. D. Steele, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This action is for personal injuries received by plaintiff, which she alleges was through the negligence of defendant in failing to keep one of its streets in repair. The judgment was for the plaintiff in the trial court.

The defendant is a city of the fourth class and maintained its streets by excavating gutters or drains on the sides of the roadway and elevating the roadway in the center and by constructing sidewalks near the lines of the streets. To connect these walks crossings were put in at street intersections. At the place where plaintiff was injured, the gutter was shown to be somewhere between 2 and 2½ feet below the crossing at that point. Tiling, about 5 feet in length and 15 inches in diameter, was placed in the gutter under the crossing with gravel on top of it, and on this was placed a flagstone 3 feet wide and near 6 inches thick. There was no railing, nor was there a light, and this constituted the crossing over which pedestrians passed to the sidewalk. Plaintiff, with her husband and sister-in-law, had been attending a night church meeting near by and were returning home. She was familiar with the crossing. On arriving at the gutter her sister-in-law passed over first; plaintiff following with her husband just behind her. Plaintiff stepped off the edge of the crossing and fell into the gutter, receiving injuries, the severity of which is not questioned by defendant and therefore need not be dwelt upon.

Defendant insists that no case was made for the plaintiff, and that its demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. We concede that towns and cities must be allowed to maintain their streets with gutters or drains on the sides so as to carry away surface waters, thereby improving the street for travel and protecting the health of the inhabitants, and that, necessarily, there must be a covering over the gutter at crossings, making a passageway for the convenience of the people in passing from one side of the street to the other. This way over the gutter is, ordinarily, in some degree, greater or less, more dangerous than the crossing at other points; but, notwithstanding this, it is yet the duty of the city to maintain it by some mode reasonably adapted to keeping it in a reasonably safe condition when considered in the light of the plan adopted by the city.

In coming to a proper conclusion as to whether the city was guilty of negligence, it is necessary to consider the right of the city to adopt plans for its improvement and for the safety of its inhabitants. A city has a right in its governmental capacity to adopt the plan of having its streets thrown up in the center with gutters or drains on either side to take off surface water, and to adopt a plan of street crossings, including a way over the gutter. If an injury results from a danger inherent in the plan adopted, the city is not liable; but, if the danger has arisen from negligent construction or maintenance of the plan, it is liable. Ely v. St. Louis, 181 Mo. 723, 81 S. W. 168. Thus a city may adopt a wooden sidewalk. It may not be as safe, under some conditions, as one of stone. Yet the city would only be liable for a negligent construction or maintenance of the wooden walk. It is common knowledge that towns and cities have the plan of drainage gutters on the sides of the streets with covering at crossings for the passage of pedestrians. It would be a startling announcement to say that the city incurred liability to any one injured by stepping off the cover into the gutter, and we would hold that plaintiff was without standing in this case, as a matter of law, were it not that there was some evidence tending to show that the gutter was negligently constructed or maintained in carrying out the plan. It may be that it was permitted to cut or wash out to an unnecessary depth; or, if at that place a depth was needed greater than that required for the ordinary course of the gutters of the city, it may be that either a light or a railing was necessary to the reasonable safety of the place, and the absence of both would make out negligence on the part of the city. Plaintiff is but little supported by the case of Loewer v. Sedalia, 77 Mo. 431, for that case did not involve the suggestions here made. In that case there was a ravine in the street 12 or 15 feet deep over which an unguarded bridge had been built. In this case, in view of what we have stated, it would be proper to give defendant's refused instruction No. 12.

After considering the evidence and applying it to the suggestions just made, we have concluded that the case made by the plaintiff was one for the jury. We cannot say as a matter of law that defendant was not negligent, nor can we say that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

The court gave for plaintiff an instruction which we believe allowed or authorized a verdict for her, though she may have been liable to the same mishap had the crossing been guarded as submitted in the instruction. There was evidence in the cause which tended to show that plaintiff got into the gutter in a way which a railing would not have prevented, and yet the court directed that, if the jury believed "a railing or other guard was necessary for safety, as instructed by the court, and that plaintiff in the exercise of such [ordinary] care received the injuries complained of, then they will find the issues for the plaintiff." In support of this instruction, plaintiff relies upon Loewer v. Sedalia, supra. In that case there was an instruction (No. 3 for plaintiff, found at page 438); which was like the one given for this plaintiff, except that it was qualified by the words "which he would not have received had defendant placed a railing or other proper protection on the bridge." In view of the evidence in this case, such qualification was far more necessary than in that case. Again, in an instruction in that case given of the court's own motion, found at page 443 of the report, the jury was required to find not only that the defendant therein was guilty of negligence in not having the railing, but that through such fault and negligence the plaintiff stepped off the bridge. If the care thus taken to protect the defendant was thought necessary in that case, it is much more necessary in the one at bar, for in that case the bridge was over a deep ravine (not necessary for the street), while here it was a drainage gutter, at most only 2½ feet deep.

In considering objections to plaintiff's first instruction, it is well to remark that in taking instructions from other cases care should be observed to see that the cases are so nearly alike in the character of negligence shown as to make a direction in one apply to the other. Negligence is a relative term, and what would be negligence in one situation might not be in another. Foster v. Swope, 41 Mo. App. 137. In the Loewer Case, an unnecessary and deep ravine bridged in a street is a far different condition from a drainage gutter with a stone crossing over it on the side of a street. Therefore it would be better and more conducive to a fair trial to omit from that instruction the special reference given to the width and height of the crossing and the danger of falling from it, and substitute therefor that the jury should consider the character of the crossing and the purpose for which it was maintained.

Error was also committed in permitting witness Zoll to be asked if it was necessary to have or permit the drain or ditch. That was a matter for the jury in view of all the evidence, and was not a matter of opinion from a witness. Gobel v. Kansas City, 148 Mo. 477, 50 S. W. 84; Benjamin v. Railway Co., 133 Mo. 289, 34 S. W. 500; Brown v. Railway Co., 89 Mo. 155, 1 S. W. 129; Koenig v. Depot Co., 173 Mo. 721, 73 S. W. 637.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

WOOD v. CRAIG.

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 78*)—NATURAL WATER COURSES—DIVERSION—OVERFLOW ON LAND OF LOWER PROPRIETOR.

The rule that the owner of land through which a water course runs may divert the water from its usual channel to another course, provided he returns it into the original stream before it reaches the land of the next proprietor, does not entitle one, to so divert the stream, though the change be made altogether on his own land, as to cause the stream to overflow the land of a lower proprietor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Atchison County; Wm. C. Ellison, Judge.

Suit by William S. Wood against Andrew B. Craig to enjoin the digging of a ditch and diverting the course of water. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Lewis and C. A. Anthony, for appellant. W. R. Littell and L. D. Ramsay, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This is a proceeding in equity to enjoin defendant from digging a ditch and diverting the course of water so as to cause it to flow upon and over plaintiff's lands. The decree in the trial court was for the plaintiff.

It appears that plaintiff and defendant are adjoining owners of large tracts of bottom lands in the valley of the Tarkio river. Plaintiff's lands were south of and were lower than defendant's. The "East Tarkio" river came into defendant's land near the northeast corner, and ran a very crooked course in a southwesterly direction through his land, until it reached plaintiff's land at a point about midway of his north and defendant's south line, and thence, on its crooked course, was the boundary line between plaintiff and defendant; the result being that, from a point in the center to the west line, plaintiff's north boundary being the river, his land would extend up apparently (as it would appear on a map) into defendant's land, and, defendant's south line being on the river, his land would apparently extend down into plaintiff's. As just stated, this river was exceedingly crooked. It would run for a space in one direction and then turn sharply back, but its general course was to the southwest. There was a branch which came into defendant's land on the east side at about the line between him and plaintiff. It ran north through defendant's land, bearing some to the west, on across a public road into lands of Rankin, and then emptied into the East Tarkio river a short distance north of defendant's north line. Prior to the trouble between plaintiff and defendant, the latter cut a ditch from this branch along his north line, between him and Rankin, for a short distance west until it emptied into the East Tarkio. The only effect of this was to connect the branch with the Tarkio a short distance south of where it did before he cut the ditch. Thus it is seen the waters of the branch found their way into the Tarkio up in the northeast corner of defendant's land; it being remembered that plaintiff's laid south of his tract. It should be here stated that the waters (aside from this branch) which generally flowed in the East Tarkio had been diverted to the West Tarkio river by a large drain ditch dredged out, so that the only water left in the East Tarkio was that which came from the branch just described and the drainage from the vicinity in time of rain. In this situation of affairs, defendant began the construction of the ditch (now sought to be enjoined) at the branch on the southeast corner of his land running southwest until it came to or near plaintiff's northeast corner, thence due west, just north and near his south line, which divided his and plaintiff's lands, intending to run it into the East Tarkio at a point (one of the sharp turns) just north of where that stream becomes the dividing line between plaintiff and defendant. The effect of this would be to stop the water now flowing in this branch through his land from the southeast corner in a slight northwesterly direction to where it connects with the East Tarkio on the north side of his land, thence running in that river, in its crooked course, through the body of his tract, and divert it through the proposed ditch into the East Tarkio within a few feet of where it strikes plaintiff's land. It was shown that, if that is done, on account of plaintiff's land being lower, the water would probably break out of the ditch at the northeast corner of plaintiff's land where the ditch turns from a southwest to a due west course as just described, but that, if it did not, it would inevitably break over at the point further on where it strikes the East Tarkio where that stream becomes the dividing line between the two tracts. There are two reasons why the water would break over at the latter point. One is that the bed of the Tarkio has filled up so that it is about on a level with plaintiff's land, and the other that the ditch would strike the sharp turn in the Tarkio at so near right angles that the bank of that stream would be an obstruction at that point.

It will be observed from the foregoing statement that defendant's operations are confined within the boundaries of his own premises. It is the law that the owner of land through which a water course runs may divert the water from its usual channel to some other course, provided he returns it into the original stream before it leaves his premises. The rule is thus expressed in Norton v. Volentine, 14 Vt. 239, 39 Am. Dec. 220: "The dominant proprietor may divert the water from its usual channel, but, if it is returned to the same channel before it reaches the land of the next proprietor below, no one can complain."

But that rule will not justify one in so diverting the stream, though the change is made altogether on his own land, as to cause it to discharge on or overflow onto the land of a lower proprietor. Porter v. Durham, 74 N. C. 767; Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 787, 53 Am. Rep. 121; Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11. See, also, Railway Co. v. Carr, 38 Ohio St. 448, 43 Am. Rep. 428.

Although the act is not completed, and the damage which will result therefrom has not been inflicted, yet injunction is a proper remedy to prevent the wrong. Gould on Water Courses, §§ 513, 517, 519, 534, 536; Holke v. Herman, 87 Mo. App. 123, 142; Caskey v. Edwards, 128 Mo. App. 237, 107 S. W. 37.

The rule of equity and the principles of law being as herein indicated, we find the evidence justified the trial court's conclusion, and the decree is affirmed. All concur.

RAILROADS (§ 350*)—ACCIDENT TO TRAVELER AT CROSSING—ACTIONS—NEGLIGENCE.

At the approach to a railroad crossing there was a sharp curve in the track, and weeds grew to a considerable height close to the ties. Plaintiff, an elderly woman, approached the track on the highway wearing a sunbonnet, and did not hear and could not see a train. Within three or four feet of the track, she stopped, listened, and looked, but did not see or hear a train, after which she started to cross, looking neither way while actually on the track, and was struck by a train before getting over. No whistle was sounded nor bell rung. Held, that she was not negligent as matter of law.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County; C. A. Mosman, Judge.

Personal injury action by Mary Giddings against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brown & Dolman, for appellant. Mytton & Parkinson, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiff sustained personal injury from being run upon by one of defendant's engines. She brought this action for damages, and recovered judgment in the trial court.

Since the verdict was for the plaintiff, we will assume the facts in the case to be what the evidence in her behalf tends to show them. She was injured at a wagon crossing in the city of St. Joseph. At the approach at that point there is a sharp curve in the track, and weeds had been permitted to grow to considerable height along close to the ends of the ties. Plaintiff, who was an elderly woman, approached the track wearing a sunbonnet. She did not hear and could not see a train. She proceeded on to within three or four feet of the track, when she stopped and looked both ways, and did not see a train. She listened and did not hear one. She then proceeded to cross over the rails. She did not look either way while actually on the track. She was struck by a train before getting over. No whistle was sounded, nor was a bell rung. The court properly ruled that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and refused defendant's demurrer to the evidence.

The instructions refused for defendant in effect made it necessary, in order for plaintiff to recover, that she should have looked for a train while actually upon the track, while walking across it. That is an excess of caution which should not be demanded of the injured party as a matter of law. Instead of such absolute demand, the trial court instructed that, if plaintiff stopped, listened, and looked both ways when within three or four feet of the track, then it was a question for the jury to say whether she was in the exercise of the ordinary care of an ordinarily prudent person in crossing over without again looking. We think the trial court's view was correct, and that there is no just ground of complaint of the action taken on the instructions. We do not consider the cases of Hornstein v. Railway Co., 195 Mo. 440, 92 S. W. 884, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 729, 113 Am. St. Rep. 693, Kelsay v. Railway Co., 129 Mo. 362, 30 S. W. 339, and others cited by defendant, as applicable to the case as made for the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

JOHNSON, J. This suit was brought in a justice court and is on a promissory note of $25 executed by defendant to plaintiff. No answer was filed, but the defense of usury was interposed in the justice court and in the circuit court, where the cause was taken by appeal. A jury was waived by the parties, evidence was introduced, and judgment was entered for plaintiff in the sum of $25.30. The court found that usury had been exacted by plaintiff and adjudged the costs of the suit against plaintiff under the provisions of section 3709, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2077). A motion to retax costs filed by plaintiff was overruled, and plaintiff appealed.

Both parties tried the case in the circuit court on the theory that the payment of usury was the sole issue of fact between them. The declarations of law asked by plaintiff and given by the court are all addressed to that issue. The evidence introduced by plaintiff shows, without contradiction, that usury was exacted by plaintiff and paid by defendant. In this posture of the case, it is idle for plaintiff to urge now that the judgment should be reversed on the ground that usury was not pleaded in the answer. No rule is better settled than that which precludes a party from voluntarily trying a case on one theory in the circuit court, and, after defeat, attempting to change front in the appellate court.

The point made by plaintiff that error was committed by the trial court in the admission of a deposition offered by defendant, likewise, is without merit. We think the deposition was properly admitted, but, if we thought otherwise, would hold the error harmless. The witness, who was plaintiff's cashier, testified, in effect, that he exacted usurious interest from defendant. That fact, as we have said, was proved by other evidence introduced by plaintiff and was not contradicted by evidence. Had the court sustained the objection to the deposition, its finding that usury had been exacted and paid necessarily would have been the same, since that was the only conclusion the evidence would permit. Error, to constitute a ground for reversal of a judgment, must appear to have been prejudicial, and this alleged error clearly was not prejudicial.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County; C. A. Mosman, Judge.

Personal injury action by Nannie Atchison against the city of St. Joseph. From an order granting a new trial on verdict for defendant, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

W. B. Norris and O. E. Shultz, for appellant. John S. Boyer, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiff was injured by being thrown from a buggy while driving over a viaduct maintained by the defendant city along and as a part of one of its streets. She brought this action for damages. The verdict was for the defendant. The trial court granted plaintiff a new trial, and defendant appealed from that order.

The reason assigned by the court for ordering a new trial was that it considered it had committed error in refusing instructions Nos. 5 and 6, offered by the plaintiff. We think those instructions were properly refused. The evidence shows the viaduct consisted of a roadway of ample width, and that on either side there was a sidewalk space of about six feet. Those sidewalk spaces were protected on the outside by a railing extending from down along the street before the viaduct was reached, and were separated from the roadway on the viaduct by a part of the structural iron work or large girder rising out of the floorway of the bridge or viaduct a height of more than two feet. This extended the full length of the bridge and at either end, on each side, stood perpendicular. It is thus seen that one driving a vehicle along the street approaching the viaduct must avoid this structure so dividing the sidewalk, or footbridge, as it is called in the record. Plaintiff, with a companion, who was driving, were in a buggy passing along the street approaching the viaduct, in the nighttime. They drove the buggy so as to collide with the end of the girder and balustrade described. She was thrown out and injured. She admitted, in giving evidence in her own behalf, that she knew of the construction of the viaduct and of the girder dividing the sidewalk or footbridge from the main roadway, but said she did not know it was so far (six feet) out in the viaduct. We regard her statement, in the circumstances disclosed by the record, as showing that she knew as much as any one could know, without taking specific measurement, all about the position of the girder so separating the roadway from the footway, and for that reason the court did not improperly refuse her instruction No. 5, which is affirmatively based upon "the absence of any knowledge upon her part of the position and location of said girder" and the obstruction made thereby. The instruction was in the face of the evidence.

Instruction No. 6 was not improperly refused, for it submits an hypothesis not authorized by the petition. The petition charges that no lights were burning at the time of the injury. The instruction submits that question, and then proceeds to submit that, if there were street lights burning, yet, "if the viaduct was not reasonably safe for travel at said time," defendant was liable.

But, aside from the foregoing considerations, which result in sustaining the verdict for defendant, and reversing the order for new trial, it is manifest that the plaintiff was without legal standing for her complaint. In general terms it may be said that a city cannot rightfully maintain, or permit to be maintained, obstructions in a street. Yet that rule does not obtain concerning that class of permanent obstructions which are incident to public necessities authorized by law, such as telegraph or telephone poles, supports for viaducts passing over streets, etc. This principle was brought out and considered by the Supreme Court in an opinion by Marshall, J., in Siebert v. Ry. Co., 188 Mo. 657, 87 S. W. 995, 70 L. R. A. 72, a case which may well be likened to the one at bar.

We do not regard other causes assigned, outside the reasons stated by the trial court, as sufficient to sustain the order.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment on the verdict.

All concur.

Action by Napoleon Bailey against the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Lucas and C. C. Madison, for appellant. Buckner & Houston, for respondent.

BROADDUS, P. J. This is an action for injuries sustained by plaintiff in alighting from a street car of defendant in Kansas City January 10, 1906. The plaintiff was a passenger on an east-bound Fifteenth street car of defendant, and bases his right of action upon the alleged negligence of defendant in starting its car forward while he was in the act of alighting therefrom at the intersection of Fifteenth street and Kansas avenue. The judgment was for the plaintiff, from which defendant appealed.

The defendant contends that the evidence of plaintiff as to how the injury occurred was so vague and indefinite as to leave the matter in doubt, while that of defendant shows that plaintiff stepped off the car while it was going at its ordinary speed. The plaintiff testified that just after the car passed Benton Boulevard, he said to the conductor: "Oh! I did want to get off here at Benton, but I will be all right; just be sure to let me off at Kansas." That the conductor said, "all right." That at the time he was standing inside of the car close to the rear door. He then went on to state as follows: "He did halt. He halted. He stopped, as I asked him, when we got to Kansas, but he did not stop, you know, but hardly more than a minute; and after I told him, you know, and he said, 'All right,' why, when she stopped, you know, why then I made a step—this foot. I aimed to step with this foot, you know (indicating), and before I could get my hand hold, you know, it dashed me you know. It went off so quick, you know, and it threwed me out, you know, on that side, you know, and just split my skull, you know." In answer to further questioning, he said the car was standing still while he was on the platform preparing to get off. His language was that: "It stopped right still, you know, but it didn't stop but a little time, not long enough for me to get off." The occurrence was a little after 6 o'clock p. m. and dark at that time of the year. On cross-examination, among other matters, he was asked if he was not at the front of the car, instead of the rear platform, when he attempted to get off, to which he answered, "No."

The only witness other than plaintiff who testified in his behalf was John Baker. It may be gathered from his testimony, however, that the car stopped before it crossed Kansas avenue, and that, just as the plaintiff was in the act of getting off, it started, and he was thrown onto the street. The evidence of this witness, as well as that of the plaintiff, was both indefinite and inconsistent. While the former stated that the car did not stop, he also stated that it did. He was an ignorant negro and appears to have been unusually voluble even for one of his race, to which circumstance may be attributed his want of consistency and accuracy. It was for the jury to weigh his testimony and to give it that degree of credibility to which it was entitled.

The defendant's two conductors, and motorman and several other witnesses all testified that the car did not stop, and that plaintiff attempted to alight while it was in motion. The testimony of these witnesses was clear and positive, and ought to have been effective in producing a different verdict, but, as there was evidence to sustain the verdict rendered, we are concluded by it. We are not clothed with the authority to set aside the verdict of a jury because the preponderance of the evidence is against its finding. That duty is lodged in the trial court alone.

The defendant urges objections to some of plaintiff's instructions. It is sufficient to say that they are entirely hypercritical and have no substantial foundation.

Affirmed. All concur.

Action by George S. McLaughlin against Ben T. Hardin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. A. Fyke and W. F. Wilkinson, for appellant. Walsh & Morrison and Ben T. Hardin, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This action was brought for commission charged to be due plaintiff by reason of a sale which plaintiff alleges he made of defendant's real estate. The judgment in the trial court was for the defendant.

There was evidence tending to prove that defendant placed a tract of land with plaintiff for sale; that one Jenne was attracted to plaintiff's office in Kansas City by his advertisement of lands; that, while this advertisement did not include defendant's land, yet plaintiff referred him to it, pricing it at $185 per acre. Jenne went out on that or the next day and went upon the land. On the next day he telephoned plaintiff that he did not want the land, and that he intended to go to look at a farm in Kansas. Three days thereafter plaintiff wrote to Jenne, saying that he had been looking for him to come to his office to see about buying a farm in Kansas; that he had some bargains there, and for him not to fail to come, as he "wanted to sell him a bargain." On the second day after Jenne had refused to take defendant's land, as above stated, he again went out to see it, and there met defendant's tenant, who was authorized by defendant to sell it. The tenant showed him over the place. The next day the tenant took him to defendant. They agreed upon a price, and defendant sold him the land, paying the tenant a commission. In this connection it should be stated that plaintiff did not tell Jenne that defendant was the owner, but said the land belonged to a widow. Neither did he tell defendant that he met with Jenne or that he had any one looking at the farm. Plaintiff had no further connection with the matter than to refer Jenne to the land. The foregoing is substantially what the trial court found to be the facts, and from them he found that plaintiff was not the procuring cause of the sale. We think there was evidence to support such finding.

Objection is made to the action of the court on instruction. That, however, cannot influence our conclusions. The trial was without a jury, and the instructions are only useful as showing the theory upon which the court rendered the judgment. But in this case the court made known his theory, and it is sustained by the law. Missouri Smoke Co. v. St. Louis, 205 Mo. 220, 232, 103 S. W. 513; Vandiver v. Robertson, 125 Mo. App. 307, 102 S. W. 659.

But, aside from these considerations, our conclusion, based upon the record, is that the judgment was for the right party, and should be affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Adair County;
Samuel Davis, Judge.

Certiorari by the state, on relation of Clem Knox, against Hiram Selby and others. From a judgment denying the writ, relator appeals. Affirmed.

P. F. Greenwood and A. Doneghy, for appellant. Campbell & Ellison and Weatherby & Frank, for respondents.

ELLISON, J. Relator was police judge, and respondents were the mayor and councilmen of the city of Kirksville. Relator obtained a writ of certiorari from the circuit court directed, to the mayor and councilmen. The writ was quashed by the latter court on the motion of respondents, and relator appealed.

It appears from the petition and writ that one William Smith was convicted in the police court, over which relator presided, for carrying concealed weapons, and fined $3. Thereafter the city attorney made complaint to the city council of the proceedings of the relator in Smith conviction, and asked that he be impeached and removed from office, as is provided by section 5761, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2931). The complaint is in the following words: "To the Honorable Mayor and City Council: On March 31, 1908, I, as city attorney, filed a complaint in the police court against one William Smith, charging him with carrying concealed weapons. A warrant was issued on said complaint, and placed in the hands of S. T. Hull, marshal. Smith was arrested and appeared in court, and entered his plea, not guilty. The cause was set for trial on April 1, 1908. On April 1, 1908, the police judge was absent from the city, and the case was not tried. It was undoubtedly the duty of the police judge to reset this cause and notify the officers interested in the prosecution of the case on what day the case was set for trial, and he was requested so to do. The record, so far, made in this case shows a trial to the court and a finding of guilty and fine of $3 assessed. All this was done by the police judge without knowledge of the city attorney or marshal, or without any notice from the police judge to the city attorney that the case was set for trial. Section 5761, Rev. St. Mo. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2931), provides: 'The mayor may, with the consent of majority of all the members elected to the city council, remove from office, for cause shown, any elective or appointive officer of the city, such officer first being given opportunity, together with his witnesses, to be heard before the council, sitting as a court of impeachment.' * * * If the police judge is permitted to handle cases in this manner, the law cannot be impartially enforced. Therefore I would ask that an investigation of the conduct of C. Knox, police judge, be had in accordance with said section 5761. Respectfully submitted, Wm. Frank, City Attorney." The proceedings of the city council, after reciting the city attorney's complaint and the police judge's appearance and defense, were set out in the petition in the following language: "After deliberation the council is unable to satisfy itself that a proper trial was had before said police judge in the said Smith Case, or that the record made in said case, where said record says that a trial was had, states a fact. The council is unable to reconcile a fine of $3 with an alleged offense, where the minimum fine fixed by law is understood to be $50. Although unwilling to deal severely with said Clem Knox, police judge, the council does not think said Knox, as shown by his own explanation, appreciates sufficiently the gravity of his action in the said Smith Case. The council, after expressing to said Knox its profound regret that he should, from the evidence and from his own remarks, seem to lack that dignity of bearing and mental attitude which should characterize a judge of the police court, does, with this expression of its judgment, prefer to let the matter rest."

It will be noticed from the foregoing that no judgment of conviction on the impeachment was rendered or entered in the council record. The proceedings recorded are tantamount to a judgment of not guilty, and the accompanying statements are merely the reasons for such judgment. In such condition of the record was relator entitled to the writ? We think he was not. If he did not suffer legal injury, he is not a party with sufficient interest to justify an application for such extraordinary remedy. It is common knowledge that courts, and tribunals exercising for the time the functions of courts, frequently discharge a person of an accusation with a statement of reasons therefor, which often partakes somewhat of the character of lectures, admonishments, and warnings. It is true that these, in most instances, escape the record, and in consequence they are not preserved. But whatever may be improper or unwarranted in them is as improper and unwarranted where they end with the mere utterance as when they are set down in writing; and there is no more practical difference between them than there is between slander and libel. So it would seem that relator has called for the aid of an extraordinary proceeding against his superior officers for only an ordinary and harmless admonition which, though it may have been sufficient to cause embarrassment, was not of such gravity as to justify the interposition of a court in the use of a writ of such unusual character as to be rarely sought. Certiorari is not a salve for wounded feelings, and should not be allowed to take the place of actions which the law has provided for such cases. In this case the city council had jurisdiction of the impeachment proceedings; and, while the writ is not confined to cases where there is an entire want of jurisdiction, but "may be resorted to where, having jurisdiction, the tribunal makes an order exceeding its powers" (State ex rel. v. County Court, 45 Mo. App. 387), yet, in this instance, no order of any kind was made.

We agree with the trial court, and affirm the judgment. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cooper County; Wm. H. Martin, Judge.

Interpleader by J. M. Grooms to adjudicate conflicting claims of Joseph Mullett and S. J. Oswald to a fund. From the judgment, interpleader Mullett appeals. Reversed, with directions to enter judgment for interpleader Oswald.

John & J. W. Cosgrove, for appellant. T. Pendleton, for respondent.

BROADBUD, P. J. This is a suit to adjudicate the conflicting claims of Joseph Mullett and S. J. Oswald to a certain fund in the hands of the plaintiff, J. M. Grooms. The undisputed facts are as follows: On the 30th day of December, 1905, Franklin Paxton and his wife, Nellie, conveyed to plaintiff, as trustee, certain real estate in Cooper county, to secure the payment of their note to the Cooper County Bank, for the sum of $1,400, due in 12 months thereafter. On the same day, the Paxtons conveyed said realty to J. A. Waller, as trustee, for the benefit of the interpleaders, Oswald and Mullett, who were their securities to the said bank on a promissory note for the sum of $750, due also in 12 months, and also to secure the said Mullett as their security on a note for $600 payable to Philip Bergmann, due in 12 months. The conveyance to the bank being first recorded, the parties concede that it created the prior lien on the property. Some time after the deed of trust to the bank became due, the plaintiff, Grooms, as trustee, made a sale of the property to satisfy the debt to the bank; the Paxtons having failed to make payment. At this sale, Mullett was the purchaser and paid to the trustee the purchase price. The proceeds of the sale, after satisfying the debt and costs, left in the trustee's hands a surplus of $705.14. However, prior to said sale, Waller, the trustee in the second deed of trust, foreclosed same by sale of the property, and Mullett became the purchaser, subject to the prior deed of trust, for the sum of $250, which he paid to the trustee, one half of which was applied on the $750 note and the other half on the $600 note. The residue of the former note was paid by the interpleaders in equal proportion.

The interpleader Oswald claimed and introduced evidence to sustain his claim, that, at the time he and Mullett went the security of the Paxtons on said $750 note,

It was agreed that the latter would give them a second deed of trust on said realty to indemnify them as such securities, and that Mullett, when he had the deed prepared, provided therein for indemnity to himself as security on the note to Bergmann, that this was done without his knowledge, and that it was a fraud upon his rights, as the equity of redemption in the land was not sufficient security for the payment of both notes. Mullett denies the statements of Oswald, and says that there was no such agreement; but, as the court found for Oswald on that issue, and as there was ample evidence to support the finding, we will accept such finding as conclusive of the question.

Oswald also attacks the sale under the second deed of trust as irregular, for the reason that it was not made by the trustee at the request of the holder of the note, but at the request of Mullett. The deed of trust provides that the sale shall be made at the request of the holder of the note; but, as the bank was not a party to the deed, it had no interest in the matter, and was not likely to make such request, except as a mere matter of compliance with the wishes of the beneficiaries. We do not consider it a matter of importance, for the reason that Oswald does not seek to set aside the sale, nor, for that matter, does he seek to have the trust deed reformed so as to cut out that part providing for indemnity to Mullett as security on the $600 note to Bergmann. He asks only that the latter be postponed in favor of the indemnity to himself and Mullett on the $750 note, and the court so decreed.

The finding of the court that Mullett paid one-half of the sum realized by the sale made by Waller, the trustee on said note, is contrary to the agreed admission of the parties at the trial. The agreement was as follows: "It is agreed by the respective parties by their attorneys that out of the amount received by J. A. Waller from Joseph Mullett for the purchase price of said real estate by Mullett from said Waller as trustee, the sum of $127.63 was paid over by said Waller to the Cooper County Bank on the $750 note, on the 29th day of May, 1907, and that the balance of said note, to wit, $655.70, was paid by Joseph Mullett and S. J. Oswald; each paying one-half of such balance." According to this agreement, Oswald received credit for one-half of said amount, and he approved of the sale by so doing and in afterwards paying one-half of the note less the credit of the full amount of the payment made by the trustee, Waller, and he did this with full knowledge of all the facts which he sets up as a basis for relief. The law is that a party will not be allowed to receive the benefit of a transaction and then repudiate it. Having once taken credit for a part of the proceeds of the trustee's sale, Oswald will not be allowed to impeach it for irregularity. He is estopped from denying the validity of the deed of trust and the regularity of the foreclosure thereunder by the trustee.

As the trustee's deed vested in Mullett the legal title to the property, he became the owner of the fee, subject to the prior lien. Hume v. Hopkins, 140 Mo. 65, 41 S. W. 784; Schanewerk v. Hoberecht, 117 Mo. 22, 22 S. W. 949, 38 Am. St. Rep. 631. And, as such owner, he was entitled to surplus proceeds realized from the sale under the first mortgage.

The appellant makes objection to the action of the court in allowing plaintiff, as part of his cost, an attorney's fee. As there was no appeal from the judgment in that case, we cannot consider the objections. Besides, he was entitled to the allowance. Woodmen of the World v. Wood, 100 Mo. App. 655, 75 S. W. 377.

Other questions raised need not be discussed, as what has already been decided disposes of the case.

The cause is reversed, with directions to the lower court to enter up judgment for the interpleader Mullett for the fund in controversy. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Thos. J. Seehorn, Judge.

Action by A. Cole against the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Lucas and Ben T. Hardin, for appellant. T. B. Buckner, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Action to recover damages resulting from personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and the cause is here on the appeal of defendant, whose principal contention is that its request for a peremptory instruction directing a verdict in its favor should have been sustained.

The case was here before on defendant's appeal, and the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded on account of error in the instructions. 121 Mo. App. 605, 97 S. W. 555. We decided that the facts then before us entitled plaintiff to go to the jury on the issue of defendant's negligent failure to discharge the duty it owed plaintiff under the principles of the "humanitarian doctrine," and therefore that the trial court was right in overruling the demurrer to the evidence. Defendant argues that the facts in the present record differ in essential features from those considered on the former appeal; but we fail to discover any important difference, and must hold, as we did then, that, while the evidence most favorable to plaintiff convicts him in law of negligence which directly contributed to placing him in a perilous position, it further shows that defendant was guilty of negligence in not making a reasonable effort to stop the car after the peril of plaintiff should have become apparent to the motorman, had he been attending to his business properly. For the reasons given in our former opinion, we find no error in the refusal of the peremptory instruction. We further find that the learned trial judge, in the instructions given, correctly submitted the issue of negligence to the jury. Defendant is wrong in thinking that the contributory negligence of plaintiff, if continued to the moment of the collision, deprived him of a cause of action. The fact that his negligence may have been coincident with that of defendant in failing to perform its humanitarian duty is immaterial. That duty arises from the fact that the person endangered has negligently placed himself in peril, and the obligation it imposes in no wise is dependent on the question of whether his negligence may be antecedent to or contemporaneous with the injury. Whenever it appears that the operator of the instrument of injury was warned, or if in the exercise of reasonable care he should have been warned, by the appearances of the situation confronting him, that a human being was in peril, it then became his absolute duty to make every reasonable effort to avoid the injury, regardless of whose fault brought about the peril.

There is no merit in the contention of defendant that the court erred in authorizing the jury, in the instruction on the measure of damages, to take into consideration "the reasonable value of any loss of time from his business he has sustained on account of said injuries, if any." Loss of earnings is a special damage which must be specially pleaded and proved to be properly included with the recoverable damages. It is alleged in the petition that "he (plaintiff) has been hindered and prevented by reason of such injuries from attending to his affairs and business, and has been unable to earn for himself and family a livelihood." The sufficiency of this allegation was not attacked, but defendant answered to the merits, and at the trial offered no objection to the testimony of plaintiff (who followed the vocation of teamster) "that the value of his time and team was $5 per day," during the period he was incapacitated from work by his injuries. The rule is well settled that after verdict the averments of the petition not challenged by demurrer or motion are to be liberally construed in favor of the pleader, and, applying this rule, we are of opinion that the allegation in question should be deemed sufficient to support a recovery for loss of time.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; Geo. W. Wanamaker, Judge.

Action by O. E. Grimes against R. B. Cole. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Peery and O. N. Gibson, for appellant. J. C. Wilson and B. W. Hurst, for respondent.

BROADDUS, J. On July 11, 1905, plaintiff commenced this suit before a justice of the peace by filing a promissory note, dated August 13, 1904, executed by defendant and made payable to plaintiff, for $75, without interest if paid when due, otherwise to bear 8 per cent., etc. On August 8, 1905, defendant filed an answer, admitting the execution of the note, and setting up that it was given to plaintiff for the rent of a certain farm from the 28th of July, 1904, to March 1, 1906; that a short time after defendant had entered into possession of said farm he removed therefrom, but without intending to abandon the same; that plaintiff wrongfully resumed possession of the premises and converted the proceeds to his own use, thereby creating a failure of consideration for said note.

In his answer he further, by way of set-off, pleaded the following account:

O. E. Grimes to R. B. Cole, Dr.
July 16.	To one mowing machine.....	$21 00
" 29.	To wall paper, repairing house	8 25
" "	To paint.....	75
" "	To plastering.....	25

three days, $1.50 per day.....		4 50
Total		$34 75
By cash.....		10 00
		$24 75

On the first trial the jury failed to agree, and the cause was set down for trial on August 19, 1905, on which day the plaintiff filed a statement as follows: "Now comes plaintiff, and, for a further and additional cause of action against defendant herein, avers that defendant is further indebted to him, in addition to the sum demanded on the note filed herein, in the sum of $31.37, as shown by the itemized statement following." Then following is a statement of various items aggregating $55.75, credited with $24.38, leaving a balance of $31.37. On motion of defendant plaintiff's amended statement was stricken out. On the trial the judgment was for the plaintiff for $24.13, from which defendant appealed. Before the case was tried anew in the circuit court, defendant filed an amended answer, set-off, and counterclaim, which, after stating the facts set out in the former answer, omits the averment as to failure of consideration of the note, but, instead, avers that "by reason of plaintiff unlawfully taking possession of said premises and the converting by him of the hay, fruit, and grass to his own use, and the buildings on said land, that defendant is damaged in the sum of $95." The statement also contains itemized account first filed. Notwithstanding the court struck out the plaintiff's statement of a second cause of action containing the account alluded to, it permitted it as a set-off or counterclaim against defendant's account. The judgment was for defendant, from which plaintiff appealed.

The parties introduced evidence tending to support the issues raised by the statements: the principal one being whether or not the conduct of the defendant in leaving the premises unoccupied and moving into another in a different neighborhood constituted in law an abandonment, and justified the action of plaintiff in re-entering the premises and gathering the crops grown thereon. The plaintiff insists that on the evidence, as a matter of law, the court should have instructed the jury that the defendant's action in quitting the premises justified the plaintiff in re-entering thereon. But the court was not asked to so instruct. We have reviewed the evidence, and, while we are satisfied that it preponderates greatly in plaintiff's favor on that issue, we do not feel justified in saying that there was an entire failure of testimony that there was no such abandonment; and, as the plaintiff tried the case upon the theory that it was a question for the jury, we think he should abide by the verdict under the circumstances. He is bound by the theory he adopted on the trial.

The plaintiff complains of the action of the court in not giving to the jury instructions numbered 1, 2, and 4, as asked. The court changed the phraseology of the instructions as offered, but, upon the most careful examination, we have been unable to perceive that there was any change whatever in their meaning. We think that plaintiff has no grounds for complaining of the action of the court in the giving of his instructions, as it gave all he asked. The plaintiff insists that defendant's instruction numbered 4 is inconsistent with instruction numbered 7 given for plaintiff, and erroneous. The former is a mere definition of what constitutes aban-he be brought in as a party. But these matters do not figure in our conclusion, and we merely state them as a part of the history of the case.

In the original petition Thomas was alone made plaintiff. In the amended petition James was added as a coplaintiff. Plaintiffs, claiming in effect that the original contract was made by Thomas for himself and James, and that James' interest and share in the contract had been omitted by mistake, asked that the contract be reformed so as to include a right for a free water supply to James' residence. The language of the petition is that the contract as by mistake written "did not specify the further consideration upon which the lease was made that said Akins and his assigns should have the right to tap the pipes at said water cock or hydrant, and use the water on any part of said premises, especially at either or both the residences situated upon said block upon which said spring was situated." The trial court, by its decree, refused to reform the contract, and we consider that to be supported by the evidence. But the court proceeded to find that James had occupied his part of the premises for several years prior to the lease, though he did not become the owner until near a year after the execution of the lease, that James put in a hydrant at his place, and the city began to supply him with water, which it afterwards "wrongfully, and in violation of its contract and lease, threatened to cut off," etc., and "that neither said city nor the plaintiffs, nor any one claiming under them, have put, or attempted to put, any hydrants upon said block 13, except the said hydrant put upon" James' premises by him. The court then proceeded to enjoin the city from shutting off the water from James' residence, and to order that it furnish him or his assigns his or their private supply during the life of the lease, "unless suit shall sooner be duly instituted against said city of Humansville to compel it to put in and maintain another hydrant or water cock upon said block 13, in which event, and upon the happening thereof, the injunction herein granted shall be dissolved, and plaintiffs' rights hereunder shall cease." We are of the opinion that the conclusions of the trial court cannot be upheld. If the contract is not to be reformed, and is to be taken as written, James had no right or part in it. It provided for but one private premises, the residence at the spring. Whether the city has or has not supplied, or made provision to supply, the other residence does not concern James, nor does it afford him any advantage or ground of complaint. The trial court must have so viewed the contract; for, while it ordered him to be supplied during the lease, it added the proviso "unless" a suit shall sooner be instituted to compel the city to put in the hydrant agreed upon. It would appear that the court concluded that one hydrant was to be put in by the city, and until that was done it should supply with water the one put in by James. But, as already said, James cannot profit by the failure of the city to put in the hydrant agreed upon in the lease.

It is insisted by plaintiffs that defendant has not a bill of exceptions which can be recognized by the law. Leave to file a bill was given and then extended, and the claim is based on the matter of proper extension of time. It seems that judgment was rendered on the 24th of June, 1907, and a motion for new trial was filed that day. But the motion was continued, and it was not decided until the 18th of October of the following term. It was then overruled, and thereupon, on that day, leave was given until the last day of the next term thereafter to file a bill of exceptions. Afterwards the time was duly extended to the next term when the bill was filed. A bill of exceptions to matters occurring at the trial need not be filed until after the motion for new trial is overruled, even though that should not be until a succeeding term. State v. Lar-ew, 191 Mo. 192, 196, 89 S. W. 1031; Fendrich v. Burress, 129 Mo. App. 456, 107 S. W. 465; Estate of Howard, 128 Mo. App. 482, 106 S. W. 116; Henze v. Ry. Co., 71 Mo. 636; Givens v. Van Studdiford, 86 Mo. 149, 56 Am. Rep. 421; Walter v. Scofield, 167 Mo. 537, 546, 67 S. W. 276. It appears that on the day the judgment was rendered, and the motion for new trial was filed, there was an entry of record extending time for filing a bill of exceptions "until" the following term. If that order is the one upon which the defendant must depend, the bill was not filed in time, for it was not filed until after that term had been in session many days. "Until" in this connection would mean no longer than the day of the beginning of the following term. Queensware Co. v. Smith, 107 Mo. App. 13, 80 S. W. 592. But that order, entered as it was on the day the motion for new trial was filed, cannot be allowed to affect the rule we have just stated. It could not apply to the condition of the case as it then existed, for at that time the bill of exceptions was to await action on the motion. We think the bill was properly preserved.

After a thorough examination of the case made we conclude the judgment should be reversed, and the proceeding dismissed. It is so ordered. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Frank P. Walsh, Special Judge.

Action by Catherine Alten against the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Lucas and H. H. McCluer, for appellant. A. E. Martin and H. J. Latshaw, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff was thrown from a street car from which she was alighting, and sustained personal injuries. She alleges that her fall was caused by the negligence of defendant in prematurely starting the car while she was in the act of alighting. The answer is a general denial, and a plea "that, if plaintiff received any injuries at the time mentioned in said petition, the same were caused by plaintiff's own fault and negligence." The trial of the cause resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for $750, and defendant appealed.

The injury occurred December 1, 1905, at about 5:30 o'clock, at the corner of Ninth street and Cypress avenue, in Kansas City. Plaintiff and her three children had become passengers on an electric car operated by defendant on the Sheffield line of its street railway system in Kansas City. Her destination was the corner mentioned—a regular stopping place for the reception and discharge of passengers. Two of her children were girls, aged 12 and 14 years, respectively, and the third was a babe 11 months old, which she carried in her arms. The car was crowded, and, when it stopped at Ninth and Cypress, a number of passengers started to get off. It was stopped at the regular place for the purpose of discharging and taking on passengers. Plaintiff left her seat in the middle of the car, and proceeded as expeditiously as she could to the rear vestibule. She was preceded by one of her daughters, and followed by the other. The first succeeded in leaving the car while it was still stationary, but plaintiff was not so fortunate. While she was about to step from the platform to the first step, the car suddenly started forward without warning, and caused her to fall to the street. It ran eight or ten feet, and then suddenly stopped. The above is the version of the occurrence given by plaintiff's witnesses, and differs radically from that of defendant's witnesses. They say the car stopped, and that plaintiff stepped to the street while it was stationary, but in doing so made a misstep, and stumbled, but did not fall. Negligence of defendant is alleged in the petition as follows: "Plaintiff states that, while said car was stopped at said point under the aforesaid conditions, she attempted to alight from said car, and that before plaintiff had had a reasonable time to alight from said car, and while plaintiff was in the act of alighting from said car, the servants and agents of defendant then and there in charge of said car carelessly and negligently started up said car, thereby throwing plaintiff from said car with great force and violence to the street and pavement, and injuring her as hereinafter set forth; * * * that while said car was standing still, as above set forth, and while she was attempting to alight therefrom as above set forth, defendant carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to allow plaintiff a reasonable time or opportunity to alight from said car, although defendant then and there knew, or by the exercise of due care and caution could have known, that plaintiff was then and there in the act of alighting from said car, and that plaintiff had not had a reasonable time or opportunity to alight from said car, and defendant then and there, and under said conditions, carelessly and negligently started said car up without warning the plaintiff of their intention so to do: * * * that while she was in the act of alighting from said car at said time and place, and under the aforesaid conditions, defendant started said car up, and then immediately stopped said car with an unusually sudden and severe jerk, while plaintiff was standing upon the steps of said car ready to alight therefrom, thereby throwing plaintiff with great force and violence from said car to the street and pavement thereof, injuring her as hereinafter set forth; * * * that, when she was attempting to alight from said car as above set forth, said car was either standing still, or was moving so slowly that the motion was imperceptible to plaintiff."

FUNK v. METROPOLITAN ST. RY. CO.
(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 5, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1908.)

1. STREET RAILROADS (§ 103*)—COLLISION WITH VEHICLE—ACTIONS—DISCOVERED PERIL—NEGLIGENCE.

If those in charge of a street car discovered, or should by the exercise of ordinary care have discovered, plaintiff's peril while driving a wagon on the track in time to have avoided a collision, and did not do so, plaintiff's negligence in failing to look back for an approaching car would not preclude his recovery.

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 81*)—OPERATION IN NIGHTTIME—CARE REQUIRED.

A motorman operating a street car in the nighttime in a populous part of a city must look out for the safety of persons who may be on the track, and have his car under control in anticipation of any danger that may arise.

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—COLLISION WITH VEHICLE—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether defendant's motorman in charge of a street car which collided with plaintiff's vehicle made proper efforts to avoid the collision after he saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, plaintiff's peril, held, under the facts, to be for the jury.

In a personal injury action, the admission of testimony of plaintiff that he worried because of his belief that he would not be able to work again, if error, because making worry a ground for damages, was so insignificant as not to be ground for reversal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; John G. Park, Judge.

Personal injury action by John A. Funk against the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Lucas and Ben F. White, for appellant. Kinley & Kinley and Cook & Gossett, for respondent.

BROADDUS, P. J. This is a suit against defendant for damages as the alleged result of its negligence whereby plaintiff was injured. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that on or about February 28, 1903, while he was driving a four-horse team and wagon with a coal oil tank thereon, east along Thirty-Ninth street, in Kansas City, Mo., which was then unpaved, except that part occupied by the tracks of defendant and space between the same, the defendant by its employees approaching him in the rear carelessly and without warning struck said wagon, whereby plaintiff was thrown from his position and was caught on the tongue of the wagon, and was dragged some distance, and severely injured. Plaintiff's evidence was to the effect that, when he entered upon the street in question from Bell street at which time it being dark, he looked to the west for a car, and, not seeing one, turned east on Thirty-Ninth street, traveling on defendant's south track; that he thought the track was clear, and at a point not to exceed 15 feet east of Genesee street the rear end of his wagon was struck by one of defendant's cars; that the shock threw him on to the tongue or doubletree of the wagon; and that the team ran away with the wagon while he was in that position. Also the evidence showed that while driving the plaintiff sat in front of the oil tank, which came up above his head; that, after he looked back when he came onto defendant's track, he did not look back again before his wagon was struck, although there was nothing to prevent him doing so; that, where he got on to the street, it was not quite a block back to the end of defendant's car line; that he could have seen the car if it had been lighted; and that he did not hear the bell ring, if it was rung, or any noise of a coming car. It appears that, while making the switch for the return trip of the car at Bell street, the trolley pole is turned from the east to the west end of the car, and then the car is started with sufficient force to throw it onto the south track before it reaches the west end of the switch; the trolley being off the wire in the meantime, during which necessarily the lights on the car are out. Consequently the car is dark twice during the operation, once when the pole is transferred from one end of the car to the other, and once while the switching is going on. The evidence tended to show that the distance was 250 feet from Bell street to Genesee street, which was sixty feet in width, and that it was something over fifteen feet east of the latter where the wagon was struck, thus making the total distance from the latter point to Bell street at least 335 feet, and that, after leaving Bell street for a short distance, the ground is level, and then a descent begins. It was shown that the cars were carried on the level space with the motive power used to the descent in the track, where the power was released, and the car proceeded by the force of gravitation at an increased speed until it struck plaintiff's wagon. Other evidence will be referred to further in this opinion. The judgment was for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

The plaintiff relies for recovery upon the theory that the defendant's operator saw, or could have seen, his peril in time to have averted striking his wagon. On the other hand, the defendant contended, and introduced evidence tending to show, that, owing to the darkness, it was impossible for its motorman to have seen the wagon in time to have

3. INSURANCE (§ 819*)—LIFE INSURANCE—PROOFS OF DEATH AS EVIDENCE.

Proofs of death, furnished by a beneficiary in a benefit certificate, which recite that the member's death resulted from morphine poisoning, are conclusive on the fact that insured died from morphine poisoning, unless the beneficiary shows that the statement was erroneous, but the proofs do not show that the member committed suicide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 2006; Dec. Dig. § 819.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 819*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—DEFENSES—SUICIDE.

Though the beneficiary in a benefit certificate did not rebut the presumption arising from the proofs of death, reciting that the member died from morphine poisoning, the society, relying on the suicide of the member, must prove, to the satisfaction of the jury, that the member took the drug to end his life.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 2006; Dec. Dig. § 819.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 89*)—PRESUMPTIONS.

The presumption of law is against suicide, and to overcome it, the fact of suicide must be established beyond all reasonable doubt.

6. INSURANCE (§ 825*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—DEFENSES—SUICIDE OF MEMBER—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a benefit certificate, void on the member committing suicide, evidence held to require the submission to the jury of the issue of suicide.

7. INSURANCE (§ 825*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—FORFEITURE OF CERTIFICATE—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a member of a beneficiary society had forfeited his membership by the intemperate use of drugs and alcoholic drinks, in violation of the certificate, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—REJECTION OF EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW.

Errors in the rejection of evidence and in the instructions, not called to the attention of the trial court in the motion for new trial, cannot be considered on appeal.

9. TRIAL (§ 133*)—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

Where, on objection to the remarks of counsel for plaintiff, the court stated that it wished that a motion had been made to strike out the testimony on which the remarks were based, and counsel for plaintiff replied that, if there was any question about it, he would withdraw everything, and the court struck out the testimony, and plaintiff's counsel withdrew his remarks, they were not ground for reversal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; John G. Park, Judge.

Action by Virginia Belle Almond against the Modern Woodmen of America. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ben. D. Smith and John Sullivan, for appellant. Jno. I. Williamson (James Fairweather, of counsel), for respondent.

BROADBUSH, P. J. This is a suit to recover $2,000 on a benefit certificate issued by the defendant to one Henry Betts Almond, on the 2d day of April, 1904, in which the plaintiff was the beneficiary. The petition is predicated upon the theory that defendant is a life insurance company under the laws of Missouri, but the court very properly held that it was not such, and tried the case upon the theory that it was a fraternal beneficiary society, organized under the laws of the state of Illinois. The defendant pleaded two defenses viz., that the deceased member committed suicide, and that he was intemperate in the use of alcohol. The certificate provided that the defendant did not indemnify the member against death from suicide, "sane or insane, if occurring within three years from date of certificate or from death resulting from occupations prohibited by law." There is a by-law of the society which provides that, if any of its members "shall become intemperate in the use of alcoholic drinks, or in the use of drugs or narcotics, the benefit certificate held by said neighbor shall by such acts become and be absolutely null and void as to the benefits, and all payments thereunder shall be forfeited." By the terms of the benefit certificate said by-law became a part of the contract of indemnity. There was no dispute as to the death of the member, but the contest was over the affirmative defenses set up by defendant. The defendant introduced in evidence, in support of its defense, the proof made by the plaintiff of the death of the said Almond. As the defendant places much stress upon this document, we quote from it that part which bears directly on the controversy viz.: "I, Virginia Belle Almond, being first duly sworn, on oath state that I am the beneficiary named and referred to in benefit certificate * * * issued to Henry B. Almond, deceased, * * * whose death resulted from morphine poisoning. * * *" The evidence of the coroner, Dr. Thompson, was in effect that he found no evidence, by external examination of deceased's body, of the cause of his death; that death by morphine poison did not manifest such as the cause by the mere external appearance of the body; that he found in deceased's room a bottle that had contained 25 quarter grains of morphine; that the vial was empty with the exception of 1 quarter grain; and that he also found a note on the dresser. The doctor's opinion from what he saw, and not from the appearance of the deceased, was that his death might have been produced by morphine poisoning. The defendant introduced much evidence to the effect that deceased a short time before his death contemplated suicide, directing a verdict for the defendant. For the reason given we do not think the decision has any application to the question. The evidence in this case was purely circumstantial. It consisted mainly, as we have seen, in the fact that a vial was found with the deceased, which had contained morphine sufficient to have caused his death, and his previous and repeated threats to end his life. So much stands uncontradicted. We must then assume, because of the threats and the taking of morphine, he committed suicide before defendant was entitled to a direction from the court to the jury to return a verdict to that effect. We must assume that the deceased took the drug for the purpose of ending his life, and to reject every other reasonable supposition that such was not his purpose. The deceased may have taken the drug for the purpose of throwing off the depression under which he was laboring, and took too much by mistake. This is not a far-fetched supposition, for such instances are not uncommon. Or he may have been suffering from valvular disease of the heart or angina pectoris, as Dr. Thompson stated, or he may have taken it for the purpose of inducing sleep, which, from the statement of his landlady that he walked the floor for hours, he was not able to obtain, and took by mistake an overquantity. The evidence furnished by Dr. Thompson tends to rebut the prima facie case in behalf of defendant, implied by the statement in plaintiff's proof of loss that the deceased died from the effects of morphine poisoning. The doctor assumed from what he saw surrounding the deceased that he had been poisoned by morphine, but he also stated that, from the appearance of the body itself, one of three things may have caused his death, viz., apoplexy, angina pectoris, and valvular disease of the heart, and further that there was nothing to indicate in the appearance of his body that he had died from morphine poisoning. In view of all the facts, the evidence being circumstantial, there was not such a clear case of suicide made out as would have justified the court in granting defendant's peremptory request to return a verdict against plaintiff.

The evidence greatly preponderated in favor of defendant that the deceased had forfeited his membership by the intemperate use of drugs and alcoholic drinks. But as there was evidence to the contrary, the matter, so far as we are concerned, was solely one for the jury.

The defendant assigns as error the action of the court in rejecting the admission of competent testimony offered on its part, and the giving of a certain instruction at the instance of plaintiff. But as the attention of the trial court was not called to these matters in defendant's motion for a new trial, they cannot be considered.

Also objection is made to certain unbecoming remarks of plaintiff's counsel in the presence and hearing of the jury. The words used had reference to certain testimony introduced on the trial. When objection was made to the language of the counsel, the court said: "I wish you gentlemen had moved to strike out that testimony when it was offered." Counsel for plaintiff then said: "If there is any question about that, I will withdraw everything." The court then struck out all the testimony upon which the remarks were based. Whereupon plaintiff's counsel withdrew what he had said about the matter. If there is blame to be attached to any one, it must rest with the defendant's counsel for failure to object to the testimony which instigated the plaintiff's counsel to use the objectionable language.

Finding no error in the trial, the cause is affirmed.

ABLES v. ACKLEY.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 16, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1194*)—CONSTRUCTION OF DECISION—EFFECT IN LOWER COURT.

A former decision on appeal that defendant, by cross-examining plaintiff as to the terms of a contract between herself and her deceased husband, rendered evidence thereof by plaintiff admissible after a ruling that she was incompetent to testify to the transaction, did not decide that plaintiff was a competent witness as to such evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1194.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1097*)—CONSTRUCTION OF DECISION—MATTERS DECIDED.

As a general rule, a question arising on a former appeal is res judicata only when it was fairly necessary to the decision and directly decided.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4358; Dec. Dig. § 1097.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 144*)—COMPETENCY—SURVIVING PARTY TO CONTRACT.

In an action against one claiming as beneficiary under an insurance policy, plaintiff was not competent to testify to a contract with her deceased husband, by which he agreed to transfer the policy to her in consideration of the marriage, or as to transactions between them pursuant to the contract after the marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 639; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 784*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT COMPANIES—CHANGE OF BENEFICIARIES—MODE.

The adoption, by the charter of a mutual benefit society, of a particular method of changing beneficiaries, excludes all other methods; but the society may waive compliance with its strict rules and validate attempts to change beneficiaries which would otherwise be ineffectual, in which case a substantial compliance is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1951, 1954; Dec. Dig. § 784.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 784*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES—CHANGE OF BENEFICIARIES—MODE.

The by-laws of a mutual benefit association provided that no change of beneficiaries should beneficiary "shall be effective" until the old certificate shall have been surrendered to the head clerk of the local camp and new certificate issued, until which time the old certificate shall remain in force. The finding and judgment of the court were for the defendant, from which plaintiff appealed.

We think it should be conceded that there was sufficient evidence to show that plaintiff was to have the benefit of the insurance as a consideration for her marriage to Ables, and that on her part she would make payment of all dues and other charges to keep the benefit certificate in force, and that she performed her part of the contract, but that Ables failed and neglected to have her name substituted in a new certificate as the beneficiary. It has been held that a member of a benevolent association has the power to designate his beneficiary by will, in the absence of any formalities for a change of beneficiary. Masonic Ben. Ass'n v. Bunch, 109 Mo. 560, 19 S. W. 25. The defendant draws the inference from the language of the opinion that, when such formalities are required by the laws of the association, a change of beneficiary could not be made by will, but the change must be made in the form prescribed, and it is held that: "The adoption of a particular method of changing a benefit certificate under the powers and within the limits of the charter of a benevolent benefit society is the exclusion of all other methods." Coleman v. Knights of Honor, 18 Mo. App. 190. And so it is held in Head v. Council of Catholic Knights, 64 Mo. App. 212, and Grand Lodge v. Ross, 89 Mo. App. 621. While such is the general rule, it is held that there are exceptions. For instance, anterior to the death of a member, the society, for whose benefit only the rules governing changes of beneficiaries are made, may waive compliance with such rules on the part of its members, and thus validate attempts to change beneficiaries which would be ineffectual under the strict rules of the society. St. Louis Police Relief Ass'n v. Strode, 103 Mo. App. 694, 77 S. W. 1091. In a recent decision of the Supreme Court, which was certified to that court by the St. Louis Court of Appeals, the opinion of the Court of Appeals was sustained, wherein it is held that, where an association's rules and regulations provide a specific method for changing beneficiaries, "they must be substantially complied with"; but "strict compliance with regulations for a change of beneficiaries, intended solely to protect the association, may be waived by it when a beneficiary has no vested right in the certificate." Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. McFadden, 111 S. W. 1172. In Hall v. Allen, 75 Miss. 175, 22 South. 4, 65 Am. St. Rep. 601, it is held that a payment into court of the indemnity fund by the society was a waiver by the order, so far as its rights were concerned, of conformity of the change in the benefit certificate, and it is so held in Manning v. O. of U. W., 86 Ky. 133, 5 S. W. 385, 9 Am. St. Rep. 270. In Fuos v. Dietrich (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 291, it is held that a strict compliance with the rules of the order is not necessary to validate a change of beneficiaries. In that instance a change was made, but not in the exact mode prescribed; the court holding that "the instrument was, in effect, as against the old beneficiary, a substitution of a new beneficiary; the provision for a particular manner of evidencing any change in beneficiary being for the benefit of the company, which alone could claim it." It becomes us to follow the rule as announced in Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. McFadden, supra, as the latest expression of the Supreme Court, which, in effect, requires that for a change of beneficiaries the rules of the order must be substantially complied with. Tested by this rule, it cannot be said that Ables, in delivering the certificate to plaintiff and afterwards going to the clerk of the order and asking that plaintiff be substituted as the beneficiary without surrendering the certificate, in any sense complied with the regulations of the society. We can conceive of no mode for a change of beneficiary that would be effectual other than by some act at least in compliance with the rules of the order.

The plaintiff relies greatly upon the case as made out that by the terms of the marriage contract, with which she has fully complied, she was to be the beneficiary and to pay the dues and keep the certificate in force. Ordinarily, under such a state of facts, equity would be on her side and afford her redress, but it must be remembered that beneficiary certificates are not properties in the usual sense of the term. It is conceded on all sides that beneficiaries have no vested interest in such certificates until the death of the member, and, further, that the members themselves have no property rights whatever in the indemnity, but only the naked power to designate the beneficiary. Bacon, Benefit Societies and Insurance, vol. 1, p. 526, § 237.

The cause is affirmed. All concur.

ENGELMAN v. METROPOLITAN ST. RY. CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 16, 1908.)

1. STREET RAILROADS (§ 98*)—OPERATION—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE—DUTY TO LOOK FOR CAR.

While a traveler on a street car track is not a trespasser, he must exercise care commensurate with the danger of his position, and if, by looking, he could see the approach of a car, and he fails to look, and is struck, his negligence precludes recovery.

Helms Electric Park; and that the car was going at the rate of from 10 to 12 miles an hour. Plaintiff's evidence tends farther to show: That Montgall avenue was the principal thoroughfare for people engaged in market gardening in going to and returning from market; that the street was unpaved and in a bad condition for travel, and in consequence thereof there was much travel along on defendant's track, which was in better condition; that this condition had existed for a long time prior to plaintiff's injury; that defendant's agents knew that persons were liable to be on the track and in danger of being struck; and that the place where the injury occurred was in a block thickly populated. A witness stated that the night was very dark, that it was snowing, raining and sleeting very fast, and that: "It was an awful bad night. You could hardly stay out in it." The cause was submitted to a jury on the theory that if the defendant was negligent in failing to give proper warning to persons of the approach of its car, or in the speed with which it was operated, the defendant was liable, unless the jury should find that plaintiff was herself guilty of contributory negligence. The finding and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence and at the close of all the evidence, the defendant asked the court to instruct in its favor, which the court refused. In McGauley v. St. Louis Transit Co., 179 Mo. 583, 79 S. W. 461, it is held that a motorman "is not required to sound a gong as a warning to a wagon on the track which the operators do not see, in the suburbs of a city where there are no street crossings." It does not appear that there were any unusual conditions existing in that case, such as the habitual use of the defendant's tracks by the public on account of the bad condition of the street, and that the wagon was struck in a thickly settled part of the city where there were street crossings, or that the car was operated at a dangerous rate of speed under the circumstances. It is conceded law that a traveler is not a trespasser while on a street car track, but that he must exercise care commensurate with the danger of his position, or he will be chargeable with contributory negligence. If he can by looking see the approach of a car, and fails to look, and is struck, he is not entitled to recover for any injury he may sustain thereby. McGauley v. Transit Co., supra; Buren v. St. Louis Transit Co., 104 Mo. App., loc. cit. 231, 78 S. W. 680.

According to all the evidence, the motorman could not have seen plaintiff's wagon on the track a greater distance than 25 feet, and it is also equally apparent, if plaintiff had been looking at the time for an approaching car, she could have seen it a greater distance on account of the headlight; but it is evident that she could not have seen it for so great a distance as might have been seen on an ordinarily dark night, by reason of the storm of rain and snow prevailing at the time. It was, in our opinion, a question for the jury to say, considering the conditions and the rate of speed at which the car was going, whether plaintiff exercised that degree of care required of her in looking for its approach, and what was a dangerous rate of speed also depends upon the circumstances. Storage & Moving Co. v. Transit Co., 120 Mo. App. 410, 97 S. W. 184. The defendant's operators having knowledge of the condition of the street, and that people traveled on its track, and knowing that a person could not be seen on the track in time, owing to the rate of speed in which the car was going, to prevent striking him, we think tended to show negligence. There is no authority that we have seen that holds it is not the duty of the motorman, under certain conditions, to sound his gong to warn persons that may be on the company's tracks. It is a well-known fact that sometimes in cities, even during daylight, the fog is so intense that the headlights of a car can be seen but a short distance away, and that warning signals of danger are constantly given in order to prevent injury to persons who may be on the streets. The condition of rain and snow sometimes produce a similar result. In such cases it becomes the duty of every one on a public thoroughfare not only to look out for his own safety, but to proceed, not in the usual manner, but in a cautious manner, to insure the safety of others. What would be care on one occasion might be the grossest negligence on another, when the conditions were materially different. Higgins v. St. L. Suburban Ry. Co., 197 Mo. 300, 95 S. W. 863.

The objection to plaintiff's instruction numbered 1 is that it does not apply to the allegation of the petition, as the jury was told that a failure upon the part of defendant's agents and servants to use ordinary skill and caution in running and operating said car, "either in the matter of giving persons that might be on the track proper warning of the approach of such car, or in the matter of the speed at which the car was operated at the time," would entitle plaintiff to recover, unless she was guilty of contributory negligence. It is true the petition charges that defendant's agents saw, or by the exercise of reasonable care and caution could or might have seen, that plaintiff was on defendant's track, in time by the use of the appliances at hand to have averted her injury, but that they were negligent in failing to use ordinary care in maintaining a proper lookout for people, teams etc., on the track, and negligently failed to ring the bell or sound the gong. It seems to us that the instruction is predicated on that part of the allegations of the petition that defendant's agents failed to use care in two respects: First, a failure to ex-

Plaintiff, knowing that defendant did not keep cars of this class at Exeter, and would have to send the car he needed from a division point, appeared at the station at Exeter on June 8, 1904, at about 7 o'clock in the morning, and requested the agent to order the car. On direct examination, he testified that the agent accepted the order and told him the car would be down on a local freight train due to arrive that morning from Monett, a division station 19 miles distant. The car did not come on that train, nor until the day following. In the meantime plaintiff brought the berries to the station and placed them on the shipping platform, where they remained for more than 24 hours. When finally loaded in the car, they were so badly damaged that they sold in Omaha for barely enough to pay freight charges. Plaintiff's statement on direct examination of the conversation he had with the agent when he gave the order was so vague and unsatisfactory that on cross-examination the court took him in hand and elicited the following testimony: "The Court: * * * Now, without any further questions, I will give you a chance once more to state just what was said by you to the agent there that morning, and just what he said to you, without any interruption, giving the conversation as near as you remember it. A. I stated what I thought it was. I asked him to order a car that morning, and he said he would, and it would probably be down on the local. Whether he said probably, or would be down, I don't just know. It had been coming down each morning on the local, and I took it for granted. The Court: What did you say? A. I said: 'Mr. Bash, I want a car this morning.' Counsel for Defendant: And he said, 'All right, I will order it,' did he? A. I suppose that is about what he said. He might have said it a little rougher, but he gave me to understand he would order it. The Court: Tell what he said. If he swore about it, tell what he said. A. If he didn't swear about it, it was an accident. He always did before. I can't remember whether he swore about it on this occasion or not. Anyway, he gave me to understand, as usual, the car would be down." The agent introduced as a witness by defendant denied he promised that the car would arrive by any particular train, and stated he told plaintiff that he would transmit the order to his superior at once, and that the car would probably come in, not on the local freight train, but on a later train due to reach Exeter at about 7 o'clock that evening. The agent and plaintiff both expected the car would be sent from Monett, but it turned out that the company could not furnish it from that point and sent it from another division station. Other facts appear

It is elemental that, to constitute a binding contract, there must be a meeting of the minds of the parties. They must assent to the same thing in the same sense. "Any words manifesting an aggregatio mentium are sufficient to constitute a contract, but the mutual consent—the aggregatio mentium—cannot be attained without the assent of both parties." Egger v. Nesbitt, 122 Mo. 687, 27 S. W. 385, 43 Am. St. Rep. 596. Plaintiff's own statement of the contract shows very clearly there was no consent of defendant's agent to bind it to send the car by a particular train at a particular time. The agent did agree to order the car at once, and performed that agreement. He did say, "It would probably be down on the local"; but this cannot be interpreted otherwise than as an expression of opinion, and was not a promise that the car would arrive on that train. Plaintiff does not know whether the agent said "probably," or that the car "would be down." If he does not know this, how could the jury say that the agent made an unconditional promise? Plaintiff understood that "the car would be down as usual." So did the agent, for that matter; but it is a long cry between the entertainment of this mutual belief and the existence of an unconditional promise that the car would arrive by a particular train. The burden was on plaintiff to prove that such promise was made and broken to his detriment, and this he has failed to do.

The case is analogous in essential features to that we considered in Gann v. Railway, 65 Mo. App. 670, and we refer to the opinion in that case for a further elucidation of the views herein expressed.

The judgment is reversed. All concur.

Rev. St. 1899, § 7979 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3794), providing that no insurer shall accept a risk on any property at a ratio greater than three-fourths of the value of the property insured, and, when taken, its value shall not be questioned in any proceedings, is a direction not to insure for more than three-fourths value, and that, when a value is fixed, it cannot be denied that the sum fixed is three-fourths of the value of the property.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nodaway County; Wm. C. Ellison, Judge.

Action by George W. Crossan against the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals reversed and remanded.

Fyke & Snider and B. R. Martin, for appellant. J. C. Growney, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This is an action on a fire insurance policy, in which plaintiff recovered judgment in the trial court for $500, the full amount of the policy. The policy insured the plaintiff against loss on personal property, for a gross premium, in the gross sum of $500. That sum was the total made up by the separate insurance of three classes of property in the same building, with the amount of insurance stated on each class. Two hundred dollars was on stock of general merchandise, $225 was on furniture and fixtures in the store, and $75 was on household and kitchen furniture. The insurance was taken on the 3d day of July, 1907, and the fire occurred three days thereafter. The loss was not total on either of the three classes of property. Plaintiff placed the aggregate value of the property saved at $100.

An instruction for plaintiff put the case to the jury as an insurance in solido for the gross sum of $500, and, though there was a saving from the fire of $100 in value, yet the theory of the instruction was that the provision of section 7979, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3794), in the following words: "No company shall take a risk on any property in this state at a ratio greater than three-fourths of the value of the property insured, and when taken, its value shall not be questioned in any proceeding"—had the effect, so far as defendant was concerned in this action, of fixing the value of the property at a sum of which $500 was three-fourths; that is to say, $666%. Therefore, when he saved $100 in value from the fire, he yet lost more than $500, and consequently was entitled to recover the full sum of the insurance. We have heretofore construed the foregoing statute as being a direction to insurance companies not to insure for more than three-fourths of the value of property, and that, when they did fix a value and issue insurance for the sum fixed upon, they should not be allowed to dispute that such sum was three-fourths of the value. Gibson v. Insurance Co., 82 Mo. App. 515. In support of that case are the following cases: Siegle v. Insurance Co., 107 Mo. App. 456, 81 S. W. 687; Hanna v. Insurance Co., 109

Mo. App. 152, 82 S. W. 1115; Stevens v. Insurance Co., 120 Mo. App. 88, 96 S. W. 684. See, also, on the general subject, Daggs v. Insurance Co., 136 Mo. 382, 394, 38 S. W. 85, 35 L. R. A. 227, 58 Am. St. Rep. 638. The instruction in question embodied this view of the statute; but, when it is applied to the special provisions of the policy in suit, it cannot be approved.

As already stated, the policy, though insuring the plaintiff, for a gross premium, in the aggregate sum of $500, that amount was divided into separate sums as insurance on the separate classes of property, and should be considered, in ascertaining the rights of the parties, as though each class of property was valued at such sum and insured in separate policies, and the recovery should be allowed on each class according to its separate valuation and loss, as though there was but one class and one valuation. In short, the contract is severable into as many contracts as there are separate classes of property insured on separate valuations. The reasons for so regarding such policies are so well and so fully stated by the Supreme Court, after a thorough examination, in Trabue v. Insurance Co., 121 Mo. 75, 25 S. W. 848, 23 L. R. A. 719, 42 Am. St. Rep. 523, that we need only refer to that case. It is true that that case, and many of the cases therein discussed, were where the contract was severable into complete and distinct parts, so as to prevent the fraud or untrue representation as to one part from affecting other parts not so contaminated or affected; but we see no reason why the principle should not apply where fraud or misrepresentation is not involved. It is sustained by the best reason, as is, we think, evidenced by the following extract from a leading case in New York (Merrill v. Insurance Co., 78 N. Y. 452, 29 Am. Rep. 184), cited in the Trabue Case: "It is plain, from the fact of a separate valuation having been put by the parties upon the different subjects of the insurance, that they looked upon them as distinct matters of contract. The effect of the separate valuation was to make them so. No matter how much value there might have been in any one of those subjects, even to the whole amount of the policy, had it been totally destroyed, the defendants could not have been made liable to an amount greater than that named in the policy as the valuation of it. Thus it was, at the inception of the contract, distinguished from the other subjects of insurance, and the contract so made as to be capable of application to it alone. So, too, if but one of the subjects of insurance had been burned, the defendants (certeris paribus) could not have avoided liability to pay for that, up to the value put upon it, and if not wholly destroyed, but so far damaged as to reach in deterioration the value put upon it in the policy, and hence not a part of the continuing contract. Thus there would of necessity be a severance of the contract, worked out by the operation of its own terms."

The result is that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 95*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CARE AS TO MINORS.

Rev. St. 1890, § 6434 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3217), forbidding the employment of minors in cleaning or working between machines while in motion, does not make it unlawful to employ such persons in manufacturing establishments if the work is wholly disconnected with the machinery.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 95*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CARE AS TO MINORS.

A master is liable for an injury to a minor servant required to operate a machine contrary to Rev. St. 1890, § 6434 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3217), though it had ceased its motion for a short time before the injury, and the motion causing the injury was erratic.

3. PLEADING (§ 433*)—DEFECTS AND OBJECTIONS—AIDED BY JUDGMENT.

A petition not objected to before trial, which states that plaintiff was a minor in defendant's employ, describes the machine operated by him, the manner in which he was injured, and that the injury was the result of his employment to operate the machine in violation of Rev. St. 1890, § 6434 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 3217), and states facts from which it can be inferred that defendant operated a manufacturing establishment containing machinery operated by mechanical means, is sufficient to support the judgment, though there is no express allegation as to the kind of establishment operated or as to the kind of motive power for the machinery.

Action by Leo P. Peters against H. S. Gille and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

evidence on the first and second counts, and the cause was tried on the third count, on which plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendants appealed.

The plaintiff was a minor 17 years of age. The defendants were engaged as a manufacturing company in the sheet-metal and tinware business in Kansas City. The plaintiff while engaged in working about a certain machine in February, 1907, was injured in his hand. A description of the machine given by the defendants is admitted to be correct, which is as follows:

"The machine in question was known as a stamp-press machine. It consisted of a heavy framework of iron. The upper part of the machine could be moved on supports which rested on the floor, and thus the machine could be used either in upright position or in an inclined position. * * * There was a fly wheel at one side of the machine which when connected with a belt and thrown in gear, caused it to operate. There was a face plate or bed about 2½ feet from the floor on which the counterpart of the die was fastened. The die was fastened to a plunger which operated by a connection on the shaft to which the fly wheel was attached. Near the floor between the legs or supports of the machine was a pedal, and attached to the end of the pedal was a rod which connected with a clutch in the inside hub of the fly wheel. By pressing the pedal, the clutch was released and the machine thrown in action, the plunger and the die descending upon the counter die regularly with every revolution of the fly wheel. This operation continued as long as the pedal was held down. When it was released, the plunger ceased to act, and, if the pedal was pressed down and immediately released, the die descended but once. There were dies of various shapes and sizes that could be used on the machine."

The following statement, made by the defendants, is also admitted to be practically correct: "For 10 days, the plaintiff had been cutting small roofing caps out of pieces of scrap tin. He was perfectly familiar with the work of operating the machine, and considered himself to be an expert operator. At the time of the accident he had cut all the caps possible out of the piece of tin, and the remaining tin which he held in his hand, and which he intended to cast aside, had become entangled in the gauge attached near the lower or counter part of the die. He attempted to remove this, but, being unsuccessful, left his position in front of the machine and went to one side. The machine was at rest. In trying to remove the tin he placed his hands directly under the upper die, and for some unexplained reason, the upper die descended and cut off one of his fin-be operated by hand, and that it must have been operated by some mechanical means. We believe the petition is sufficient to support the judgment. Such objections as are here urged should have been made before trial.

Instruction 1, given for plaintiff, is criticised by defendants for several reasons, among which is that it assumes that the machine was in motion by the action of steam, water, or other mechanical power. The objection is well founded. But it seems that the defendants fell into the same error when they got an instruction in the following language: "The court instructs the jury that, if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff was not required to work between the fixed or traversing parts of the machine in question while the same was in motion by the action of steam, water, or other mechanical power, then plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and your verdict will be for defendants." There was in fact no room for dispute that the machine was of the kind and character that was in the contemplation of the statute, and there was no kind of dispute but what plaintiff was injured as he stated. The defendants rested their case, not upon a denial of the truth of plaintiff's evidence, but upon nonliability under the facts established.

The question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was submitted to the jury by instructions, and the finding on that issue is amply supported by the evidence.

Most of the points relied on by defendants are purely technical, but we believe that the verdict was for the right party. Accordingly, the cause is affirmed. All concur.

Plaintiff, a shipper, was riding on a stock pass on a freight car which was being hauled through the yards in a belt line train, and in approaching defendant's track the car on which plaintiff was riding almost collided with one of defendant's engines which had negligently approached the intersection without keeping a proper lookout, and plaintiff, believing a collision imminent, became frightened and jumped from the car and was injured, but no collision in fact occurred. It was not customary for the belt line to carry passengers. Held, that defendant's engineer was not bound to anticipate that the belt line on this occasion carried passengers, and owed plaintiff no greater duty than to a trainman in the same situation, even if he should have seen him on the car, and, since a trainman in the same circumstances would not have jumped from the car, plaintiff's own inexperience was the cause of his injury, and not defendant's negligence in approaching the crossing.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Thos. J. Seehorn, Judge.

Action by Moscow K. Richmond against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed. Reversed.

Eljah Robinson, for appellant. Walsh & Morrison, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff brought suit against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company and the Kansas City Belt Railway Company for damages on account of personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. He dismissed the Belt Railway Company from the action during the trial, and recovered judgment against the appealing defendant in the sum of $2,000.

The main contention of defendant is that the court should have directed a verdict in its favor. Under the terms of a written contract, plaintiff delivered two cars of cattle to the Choctaw, Oklahoma & Gulf Railroad Company at Hartshorn, Ind. T., for shipment to the market at Kansas City. The contract was not introduced in evidence, and we are not advised of its terms; but it appears from the evidence that a through shipment was contemplated by a route which required the initial carrier to deliver the cars to the Kansas City Southern Railway Company at Howe, Ind. T., for transportation to the Kansas City Terminal Yards of that company located at Sheffield, a town on the eastern border of Kansas City, and required that company to deliver them at Sheffield to the Belt Railway. A stock pass was issued to plaintiff by the Choctaw Company which entitled him to free transportation to Kansas City on the trains that carried his cattle, and he used the pass to Sheffield. The caboose in which he arrived at that point was stopped close to the tracks of the street railway company, and plaintiff could have gone to the stockyards on a street car, but he elected to ride on the Belt Line train which picked up his cars of cattle. That train carried no caboose or other passenger car, and consisted of an engine and 45 freight cars. The engine was at the east end of the train and plaintiff's two cars were at the opposite end. Plaintiff placed himself on the top of the second car from the end with the knowledge and consent of the trainmen. The foreman of the crew was on the top of the same car, or on that of the end car, and brakemen were stationed on different parts of the train. The stock cars were to be taken to the quarantine yards of the Kansas City Stockyards Company, some five or six miles westward. They had arrived at Sheffield in the middle of the afternoon of July 1, 1908, too late to reach the stockyards for that day's market. It does not appear that plaintiff could have performed any service to the cattle by riding on the top of the Belt Line train. He could have reached the stockyards as quickly or, perhaps, more quickly on the street car, and it was not necessary for him to be there at the moment of their arrival. On that subject he testified on cross-examination:

"Q. Was it necessary for some one to go with the cattle to look after them? A. Not altogether. I ship sometimes without sending any one. Q. You could have come up just as well on a passenger train? A. Yes, but it just cost me a little piece of money. * * * Q. You had shipped sufficiently to know that the cattle would be handled by the railroad company and the stockyards company and assigned to the pen for the commission man to whom they were consigned, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that you could not help or hinder that in any way even if you were there? A. Yes, sir. I like to be there. Q. And you knew that those cattle would not be offered for sale until the next morning, didn't you, if they got in here at 4 or 5 o'clock in the evening? A. Yes, sir. Q. You knew that; so there was nothing you could do at the quarantine yards that afternoon, was there? A. I could have went over and seen them unloaded, and see what kind of condition they were in and ordered them fed."

Shortly after the Belt Line train we have described started on its westward journey, it approached the track of defendant which runs north and south, stopped when the end car was, perhaps, 150 feet from the crossing, waited a few minutes for a clear track, and, after the engine gave the usual signal, started forward. Just before this, a switch engine of defendant which had been working in that vicinity crossed from the south to a point from 150 to 200 feet north of the crossing, stopped for some cars to be coupled, and then started back towards the crossing, pulling three cars. The engine was headed south, the engineer was seated in the west side of the cab, and the fireman was shoveling coal into the fire. The Belt Line train began moving toward the crossing after the switch engine had crossed from the south, and before it started to return, and had the right of way. It is admitted that neither the engineer nor fireman saw the Belt Line train nor knew of its presence. The engineer had his view toward the east obstructed by the boiler, and the fireman was not looking in that direction, and his attention was absorbed by the work he was doing. Neither heard the signal given by the Belt Line engine, and the switch engine did not whistle for the crossing. When the foreman of the Belt Line train first observed this situation, each train was running toward the crossing at approximately 4 or 5 miles per hour. Plaintiff fixes the rate of speed at from 10 to 12 miles per hour, but his estimate is so obviously in conflict with the plain physical facts of the situation that it possesses no evidentiary value. Fearing a collision, the foreman, who then was on the end car, began shouting and frantically making the stop signal. At the same instant, he ran to the ladder on the north side of the car and descended rapidly to the ground. At that time, he was from 50 to 75 feet from the crossing. He ran west as fast as he could to defendant's track to a point where defendant's engineer could see him, and, by vehement gestures and language, conveyed his warning. He testified that the switch engine was stopped in 20 or 25 feet after the reception of this warning, and that it was from 5 to 10 feet from the crossing when it came to a full stop. Plaintiff states that the engine was closer than that to the car on which he had been riding. No collision occurred, and no damage was done except the injuries plaintiff received in his attempt to escape from what appeared to him imminent peril. When he observed the actions of the foreman and what occasioned them, he became greatly alarmed for his own safety, and ran to the ladder at the northwest corner of his car. He descended halfway to the bottom of the ladder, when complete panic overtook him and he jumped to the ground. A severe injury was the consequence. It appears from uncontradicted evidence adduced by defendant that, in switching over crossings of tracks used at freight terminals (the tracks under consideration were of this class), it is customary, in order to save time, for the engine not entitled to the right of way to approach so near to the crossing before stopping that only sufficient space is left for the free passage of the other train.

We do not hesitate in saying that, under the conceded facts in evidence, defendant's engineer was guilty of gross negligence in the manner in which he approached the crossing. It will not do to excuse his conduct on the ground that he had his engine under control and, in fact, stopped where he would have stopped had he known of the presence of the other train. His ignorance of the fact that another train had become possessed of the right of way, and was using it, stamps his action in failing to signal, and in proceeding to the crossing without any intention of stopping, with inexcusable negligence. Knowing, as he did, that his fireman was not on the lookout, and that he himself could not see toward the east, for all practical purposes, he just as well might have attempted to run the crossing blindfolded, as far as knowing of the approach of a train from the east was concerned. Nor is it any excuse for him to say that, as the other train was backing, it was the duty of a brakeman from that train to come on foot to the crossing to warn him of its approach. Plaintiff's witnesses deny the existence of such rule, but whatever the rule may have been, reasonable care would have prompted an ordinarily prudent person in the situation of the engineer to use every reasonable precaution to inform himself of the condition of the crossing before attempting to run over it. There was no obstruction to the fireman's line of vision. He had but to look to see the train, and the engineer was remiss in not using the fireman's eyes.

We give our approval to the following extract from the opinion of Judge Shiras in Railroad v. Stoner, 51 Fed. 649, 2 C. C. A. 437: "Aside from the provisions of any specific rule upon the subject, the law requires of parties charged with the control and management of trains moving upon intersecting lines of railway that as they approach a crossing they must exercise due care to secure the safe passage of the train over the same, and in that respect they owe this duty not only to those whose persons or property may be upon the train controlled by them, but also to those who may be upon the train of the other intersecting line. In the performance of this duty, it is incumbent upon the parties in control of the train that they shall exercise a proper lookout for the approach of another train, and they must also have their own train under proper control, so that if need arises it can be promptly stopped. The trainmen know, and are bound to know, that all points where railway lines cross at grade are places of danger, and they must, in the handling of trains intrusted to them, exercise the care which the presence of this known danger demands of them. Certainly it would be negligence of the grossest kind to attempt to make a crossing without taking pains to see whether there was another train at or near the crossing, and without reducing the speed sufficiently to place the train under the control of the engineer, for, unless these precautions were taken, a collision would be inevitable if another train happened to be upon the crossing, even rightfully, when the other reached it."

The next question to engage our attention is whether the negligence of defendant we have just discussed constituted a breach of any duty defendant owed to plaintiff. The component parts of negligence are (1) a legal duty to use due care, (2) a breach of that duty, (3) the absence of distinct intention to produce the precise damage, if any, which actually follows. Bindbeutel v. Railway Co., 43 Mo. App. 463, where Judge Smith quotes this definition from Shearman & Redfield on Negligence. In every negligence case, to support the cause of action, it is essential that plaintiff show that the wrongful act of the defendant was in violation of some duty owed to him by the defendant. If an ordinarily careful and prudent person in the position of defendant's engineer would have had no reason to anticipate the presence of a passenger on the top of a freight train which was not designed nor equipped for carrying passengers, it is difficult to recognize any logical ground on which to found any higher duty from the engineer to plaintiff than that of not injuring him wantonly or willfully. On the other hand, if the engineer had any reason to anticipate that a stockman might be riding on that train as a passenger, then it became his duty so to handle his engine that no negligence of his either would cause the train to collide, or would throw an ordinarily prudent person in the position of the passenger into a condition of panic from fear of injury from a threatened collision.

In Whitehead v. Railway, 99 Mo., loc. cit. 269, 11 S. W. 753 (6 L. R. A. 409), the Supreme Court said: "The proposition that the defendant owes no duty to one riding on a freight train, unless he is a passenger in the full sense of the term, does not meet with our approval. If one is riding on a freight train, with the consent of the agents in charge thereof, the company owes him a duty, though he is there against the rules of the company. * * * Even to a trespasser, the defendant is liable for injuries inflicted for want of ordinary care after the perilous position of the party is discovered." Carr v. Railway, 195 Mo. 214, 92 S. W. 874. It is not necessary for us to discuss the na-band and wife, borrowed $100 of plaintiff on September 23, 1901, and gave her their negotiable promissory note for that amount due on the 12th day of March, 1903, with interest from date at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. To secure the payment of the note, defendants, on the same day, executed, acknowledged, and delivered to plaintiff a chattel mortgage on a stock of groceries, store fixtures, horse and wagon, owned by them in Kansas City, and, two days later, plaintiff filed the mortgage in the office of the recorder of deeds of Jackson county. It was released of record March 26, 1903, by Anna Koffler, who had possession of the note and mortgage at that time. In March or April, 1902, plaintiff turned her valuable papers, including this note and mortgage, over to her mother for safe-keeping. She gave her mother no authority to collect either principal or interest, and at different times, when interest matured, asked her brother for payment, but was put off by him with promises that he would pay when his pecuniary situation improved. In March, 1903, plaintiff, who was a widow, intermarried with Roy Brown in opposition to the wishes of her mother, who shortly after this event released the mortgage of record and then delivered the note and mortgage to defendant John. Some time after their marriage, plaintiff and her husband went to New Mexico, where they remained until the spring of 1904, when they returned to Kansas City. Plaintiff first received information of what her mother had done with her note and mortgage after her return to Kansas City. The note, when produced at the trial, bore the endorsement, "Pay to the order of Anna Koffler," with the name of plaintiff written underneath, but plaintiff denounces this endorsement as a forgery. She has not received payment of any part of the note, either principal or interest, and did not authorize her mother to release the mortgage, to surrender the papers to defendants, or to do anything with them except to keep them safely.

Defendant John testified that his mother gave him the note and mortgage in payment of groceries and money he had given her during the preceding five years. In this statement he was corroborated by his mother, who explains her action in giving her daughter's note in payment of her own debt by saying that plaintiff owed her more than the amount of the note for a boarding house she sold plaintiff and for caring for plaintiff during sickness. Mother and son both declare that plaintiff indorsed the note at the time she delivered it to the mother. The testimony of both relative to the alleged payment of the note is so vague, indefinite, and improbable that we would have sustained the trial judge had he rejected it entirely as being too weak to raise an issue of fact. The

She had it before she gave it to me, didn't she? Q. When was that? A. I don't remember the time, sir. Q. You don't remember when that was? A. No, sir. Q. Now, after you got it, what did you do with it? A. I kept it a long time. * * * Q. How much did she owe you for selling out? A. $125. Q. She owed you $125 for selling out what? A. Boarding house to her. Q. Where? A. In Argentine. Q. And then she owed you four or five hundred dollars for sickness? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, which was it, four or five hundred? A. I didn't pay any attention; I paid all the bills for her. Q. Paid all the bills for her? A. Yes, sir; when she laid sick three or four months with her young one with her; I took care of it, too; I was poor and had to work for my living. Q. Didn't she send the boy up to Bill's for groceries? A. That was later on; that was after she was cured up some; this was when she ran away from home and married a man that was no man. Q. That you didn't want her to marry? A. No, I didn't; then when he had her in a pickle he left her on my hands."

The court overruled the demurrer to the evidence presented by defendants, and at their request gave the following instructions: "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, before maturity, indorsed the note in question and delivered the same to a third person, and that thereafter and at maturity the defendants, in good faith and for value received, obtained a transfer of said note from such third person, then your verdict must be for the defendants;

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 301*)—RAILROADS—COLLISIONS AT CROSSINGS—ACTS OR OMISSION OF EMPLOYEES OR OTHERS.

Since, under the "Enabling Act," Kansas City had exclusive control over its streets, etc., and exclusive power to vacate any street, etc., any law to the contrary notwithstanding, a street railway company operating in the city was not obliged to comply with Rev. St. 1899, § 1180 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 995), requiring such companies to bring their cars to a stop at a certain distance before reaching a steam railroad crossing, and to send employees forward to ascertain whether a train was approaching.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1028*)—HARMLESS ERROR—THEORY OF CASE.

The trial of an action by a street railroad passenger for injuries in a collision with a railroad train, on the erroneous theory that defendant's duties were regulated by a statute prescribing its duties on approaching a railroad crossing, was not prejudicial, where the statute was not necessary to plaintiff's case, and defendant failed to show that it exercised the high degree of care imposed on it by law for the protection of its passengers.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; John G. Park, Judge.

Action by William Wills against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company and the Metropolitan Street Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, both defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded as to the former and affirmed as to the latter defendant.

Lathrop, Morrow, Fox & Moore and John H. Lucas, for appellants. Boyle, Guthrie & Smith, for respondent.

BROADDUS, P. J. The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for an injury he received while a passenger on the Metropolitan Street Railway, which he alleges was the result of the negligence of the defendants. The Metropolitan Street Railway Company is a corporation operating a street railway in Kansas City, Mo., and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company operates a steam railroad between different points, and passes through said city. For the purpose of convenience we will call the former the Metropolitan Company and the latter the Santa Fé Company.

On August 6, 1904, the plaintiff was a passenger on one of the cars of the Metropolitan Company. At a crossing of Fifteenth street, at what was known as the "Belt Line Crossing," the car collided with a train of the Santa Fé Company which was being operated over what was known as the Belt Line Railroad tracks. The plaintiff recovered judgment from both defendants, from which each appealed.

For a proper understanding it is necessary to state the issue presented by the pleadings.

could be seen on those tracks 1,000 feet away. Of course the crew on the steam train had the same opportunity to see the street car that the crew on the street car had to see the steam train."

The plaintiff proved that he was a passenger of the street railway company, and that he was injured by the collision, and to further maintain his case against the Metropolitan Company introduced a certain ordinance, which he claims required that company to maintain a watchman at the crossing in controversy. It was approved July 28, 1902, and accepted by the company on the same day. It appears to have been in the nature of a contract. Section 11 of said ordinance reads as follows: "At all points where said street railway tracks across the tracks of any steam railway company, watchmen shall be constantly stationed and kept to perform such duties as may be prescribed by ordinance; but the city shall pass necessary ordinances requiring the steam railway companies to join in the performance of this duty, and in the payment for the service; but if said railway companies fail to comply with the terms of such ordinances, then the street railway company shall station such watchmen as aforesaid. Watchmen shall be placed by the street railway companies at all points where their lines of track intersect, cross or form a junction and at dangerous curves between the Missouri river and Thirteenth street and between McGee street and Wyandotte street, and at such other points within the city as may be required by a reasonable ordinance. It is understood by this that the company recedes from its position that the conductors or gripmen can act as flagmen or watchmen. The street railway company shall stop its cars for the purpose of taking on and letting off passengers before it shall cross a street or intersecting line. The city reserves the right to regulate and control by reasonable ordinance all the matters mentioned in this section." The Metropolitan Company objected to the introduction of said ordinance, on the ground that it was incomplete, and that, in order to make it operative, the city was required by other ordinances, of which there was no proof, to prescribe the duties of the watchmen provided for. It is not denied but what the Metropolitan Company was obligated to keep a watchman, but the purpose for which he is to be kept is not prescribed—his duties are not defined. A watchman without any prescribed duties would be of no utility whatever. In the absence of the provision requiring that the city should by ordinance prescribe his duties, the court might, as a matter of law, assume that they were such as are usually rendered in such cases by watchmen. But, as they were to be prescribed by the city, the court was not authorized to make such an assumption. It follows that the admission of said evidence was error, and the Metropolitan Company claims that it was harmful. But we cannot see in what manner it was harmful. It was not necessary to plaintiff's case. When he had proved that he was a passenger, and that he was injured by a collision, he had made his prima facie case. He had done all that the law required of him. This evidence did not in any way strengthen his position. It had already been assured. It was a futile attempt to improve that which was already complete.

The Metropolitan Company in order to avoid liability, introduced evidence tending to show that the collision was the result of the negligence of the Santa Fé Company, its codefendant. The evidence tended to show that the latter company was negligent in running its trains at a rate of speed in excess of six miles per hour; that the collision would not have occurred if the speed had been within the rate fixed by the ordinance, as it was shown that the street railway car had nearly passed over the Belt Line tracks when it was struck on the rear end by the locomotive, and the Santa Fé Company was negligent in not slackening the speed of its train, or stopping it altogether, when its engineer and fireman saw, or might have seen by looking, that the gates guarding the approach were not closed, as was the usual custom. The fact, however, that the Santa Fé Company's agents were negligent in the respects mentioned did not excuse the Metropolitan Company from liability, unless such negligence was the sole cause of the collision. In order to exonerate itself from the liability created by the prima facie case made by the plaintiff, the latter company was required to show that it exercised the highest degree of care to prevent such collision. The evidence in the case shows that, when its cars arrived within 30 feet of the Belt Line crossing, its motorman and conductor could have seen the Santa Fé Company's train rapidly approaching at a distance of at least several hundred feet away, but, notwithstanding, they moved the car onto the said tracks where it was struck by an approaching train. However, if it had been the duty of the Santa Fé Company to have kept a guard at the crossing, and to have had the gates lowered for its approaching train, it was still the duty of the Metropolitan Company's operators on approaching the crossing to have used the highest degree of care to secure the safety of its passengers. Ordinarily a person approaching said crossing, seeing that the gates were not closed, would be justified in assuming that it would be safe to cross, on the theory that he was only required to use ordinary care. But a higher duty was imposed upon the Metropolitan Company. The operators of its cars should, under similar conditions, have used their senses. They should have looked for approaching trains. There is no doctrine better settled than that a carrier of passengers must exercise the highest degree of care for their safety.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Jas. T. Neville, Judge.

Action by Mattie Dawson against the Ash Grove White Lime Association. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

W. H. Horine and Wear & Hayden, for appellant. Wright Bros. & Blair, for respondent.

NORTON, J. This is an action for damages on account of personal injuries. Plaintiff recovered, and defendant appeals. Upon a perusal of all of the evidence contained in the bill of exceptions, it appears that the plaintiff has a meritorious cause of action which was properly referred to the jury. While passing along a road communicating with her brother-in-law's farm, her arm was broken by falling rock from defendant's quarry. At the time of her injury, she was 208 yards from the quarry. The evidence tends to prove negligence on the part of the defendant in discharging heavy blasts of dynamite, hurling particles of shattered stone a great distance without warning to plaintiff, and her consequent injury. Appellant's counsel complains that the court erred in refusing numerous instructions, which, it is said, the appellant requested the trial court to give to the jury. The instructions mentioned as having been requested by defendant's counsel on the trial are set forth in its abstract. Upon investigation of the bill of exceptions, however, these instructions seem not to have been requested by it at all. It appears they were requested by the plaintiff, refused by the court, and no exceptions were preserved to the action of the court in so doing. Whether the exceptions were saved or not, of course, appellant's counsel could not predicate error here upon exceptions preserved to the action of the court in refusing instructions asked by the plaintiff.

The court of its own motion gave two instructions, one embracing the theory of the plaintiff's case, and one embracing the theory of the defendant's case. Counsel for appellant complain of the action of the court in this behalf, and incorporate as well in their printed abstract and brief what purports to be the two instructions mentioned. Upon a comparison of these instructions as incorporated in the abstract and brief with those given by the court and contained in the bill of exceptions, it appears no such instructions were given. In the first place, the instruction set out in the abstract and brief as given by the court on its own motion on the theory of the plaintiff contains the word "not," which does not appear in the instruction contained in the bill of exceptions. The insertion of the word "not" in the instruction entirely destroys its sense, and changes its meaning so that it is in no sense the instruction given by the court. The second instruction given by the court on its own motion and complained of by defendant, as appears from appellant's brief and abstract, is entirely dissimilar to the instruction given by the court, as appears in the bill of exceptions. In fact, there are several words different therein from those contained in the original, and 10 words in succession, constituting an entire line, are omitted therefrom, so that it appears no such instruction as the one set out in the brief appears in the bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions and appellant's abstract appear to be a perfect jumble, and, when considered together, wholly unintelligible. If the one is true, the other is false; and vice versa. If counsel desire their cases reviewed, they should exercise a degree of diligence in preparing and presenting them to the court to the end that a complete understanding may be had from the abstracts and briefs; otherwise the appeal should be dismissed.

The appeal in this case should be dismissed. It is so ordered.

and asked him if he had made any decision about this. He said: 'No; I am going to look up those taxes all right.' Nothing more was said about it until Tuesday morning. I called Mr. Braley up over the telephone at his residence, and asked him if he had decided about the Belt Line 10 acres. Mr. Braley said: 'I bought it yesterday.' It appears from Braley's testimony that, when he returned from inspecting the property with Hovey, he intended to buy it on the terms offered if he could not get a better offer. He went to the City Hall, obtained the desired information relative to the taxes, and then started for plaintiff's office to close the transaction. On his way there he remembered seeing the sign of C. D. Parker & Co. on the property, and it occurred to him that Parker & Co. might be able to offer him a better price than plaintiffs had given him. Braley testified: "I went to Mr. Parker, and asked him what his price was on that 10-acre tract out there. I won't be positive whether he told me $30,000 at first or not; but I know very soon he said, 'I can sell it for $29,000, and I told him that a firm of real estate agents had shown me the property and they were neighbors of mine and friends, and I disliked very much to trade through anybody else, but that they had said $30,000 was the least that would buy the property, but I said if that was so, and he could sell the property cheaper, I saw no reason why I shouldn't deal through him. And he said he could make it $29,000 and $6,000 cash. The question as to the second incumbrance and the interest on it was something that he couldn't decide—whether it would be 5 or 6 per cent.—that he would see the owner. At that time he didn't tell me who the owner was, but the question whether the owner would take 5 per cent. on the second incumbrance was talked of, and he said he would telephone him, and he telephoned me about 2 o'clock, and I think made an engagement for me to come down to the office at either 3 or half past 3 and close up the deal, and I came back. I don't think that I mentioned to him that day Hovey & Brown. I said: 'Real estate agents within half a block of here.' He said: 'In the first floor of the American Bank Building?' and I said, 'Yes; they are the parties.' Q. Hovey & Brown never told you the owner's name, did they? A. No; they didn't tell me the owner. They simply said he was a chicken man. Q. And you didn't know who it was from that description? A. No, sir. Q. And you never went to the owner, did you, before the deal was closed and the contract was entered into, and had never seen the owner, had you? A. No, sir." The sale was closed by Parker and defendant executed and delivered a deed to Braley. The consideration of $29,000 was paid by Braley, assuming the payment of the debt on the property of $17,500, paying $6,000 in cash and giving his note to plaintiff for $5,500 secured by a second lien on the property. Defendant paid Parker a commission of $600 for making the sale, refused to pay plaintiffs anything, and this suit followed.

The evidence introduced by defendant is to the effect that plaintiffs were not employed as his agents, nor did they assume to act in that capacity. It is conceded plaintiffs did not inform defendant of their negotiations with Braley, nor introduce Braley to him. Further, it appears beyond question that Parker had been employed by defendant to sell the property for $30,000, and that Braley came to him and began by telling him that he (Braley) had been negotiating with other agents. Parker states he "made a guess" that Hovey & Brown were the agents who had been dealing with Braley, and, thinking that he had the exclusive agency, "got busy" and reduced the price $1,000 to bring the deal to a quick conclusion.

The instructions given the jury at the request of plaintiffs are not criticised by defendant, and we find they correctly present the issues from the standpoint of plaintiffs. The first five instructions given at the request of defendant also are free from error. They tell the jury, in substance, that plaintiffs, to recover, must show to the satisfaction of the jury that they were employed by defendant and procured a purchaser "ready, able, and willing to purchase on the terms upon which the plaintiffs were authorized to sell." The instructions given at the instance of defendant, which the court, on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, concluded were erroneous, are as follows:

"(6) The court instructs the jury that any owner of real estate may employ several brokers and may authorize them to sell upon different terms, and if you find and believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiffs were limited in their authority to $30,000, and they were unable to procure a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase for said sum, and that another broker negotiated the sale of the property for $29,000, then in the absence of collusion or bad faith on the part of the defendant, even though the sale was made to the person whose attention was first called to the property by the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs cannot recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant.

"(7) The court instructs the jury that if you find and believe from the evidence that the defendant employed plaintiffs to find a purchaser of the property in question for the sum of $30,000, and if you further find from the evidence that the plaintiffs were not authorized to sell said property for a less sum than $30,000, and that their authority was limited in that respect, and if you further find from the evidence that the plaintiffs did not procure a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase said property for $30,000, then the plaintiffs cannot recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant.

"(8) The court instructs the jury that if

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Wm. E. Kinsey, Judge.

Action for divorce by Helen K. Morgan against Daniel Morgan. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. A. Paxson, for appellant.

BLAND, P. J. The action is for divorce. The petition alleges that plaintiff and defendant were married at the city of St. Louis on August 30, 1906, and continued to live together thereafter until January 8, 1908, when defendant left plaintiff, saying he could not support her. After alleging that plaintiff at all times treated defendant with kindness and affection and discharged all her marital duties, the petition alleges: "That defendant is possessed of a violent temper and jealous disposition, and very much prefers an easy, idle life to one of activity. That in consequence thereof the defendant has wholly failed to properly support plaintiff during their entire married life. That from September 17, 1906, until February 11, 1907, the defendant left plaintiff and lived apart from her because of his inability to support plaintiff, and that after he returned to plaintiff, on account of his idle and unbusinesslike habits, carelessness, and indifference, failed to support plaintiff properly, so that she was compelled to obtain means from her relatives. That in the month of June, 1907, the defendant sent for his child by a former marriage for the purpose of visiting for two weeks, and, when plaintiff requested of defendant some money with which to entertain his child and her attendant, defendant refused to comply with said request. That frequently during their married life, and more especially during the last year of same, defendant when angry would fly into a rage, and would throw himself on the floor, and cry out and beat it with his head, hands, and feet. That about December 15, 1907, on a Sunday, the defendant grasped the plaintiff's throat with both hands, and choked her, and said that he would get a gun and blow plaintiff's brains out, and would then blow his own out. That in October, 1907, when plaintiff informed defendant that she was going to an entertainment, the defendant conducted himself in the most violent manner by striking the table violently with his fist, throwing himself on the floor, and beating it with his head, hands and feet. That in the same month of October, 1907, the defendant took a butcher knife and flourished it about plaintiff's and defendant's heads, and said that he might as well end both their lives, as he could not support plaintiff, and would not let anybody else have her. That on December 26, 1907, the defendant assaulted plaintiff with his hands in a most violent manner. That on numerous occasions the defendant has, without cause, quarreled with plaintiff, and been guilty of loud and unseemly conduct, so as to attract the attention of others. That the defendant has never adequately supported plaintiff, nor made proper efforts to do so, although he was in good health and quite able to work if so inclined. Defendant was personally served with process of summons to appear at the February term, 1908, to answer the complaint of plaintiff. He made default, and a default judgment was rendered against him, and the cause continued to the ninth day of the succeeding month. On March 9th, defendant still being in default, plaintiff's evidence was heard by the court, at the conclusion of which the court dismissed the cause. A motion for new trial proving of no avail, plaintiff appealed.

Plaintiff's evidence shows that defendant was of a jealous disposition and possessed of a violent temper, and failed to support his wife, though he was a healthy and able-bodied man; that from September 17, 1906, to February 11, 1907, defendant absented himself from plaintiff, without cause or excuse, and failed to contribute anything to her support; and that she had to rely on her people for maintenance.

Plaintiff testified as follows: "On Sunday, December 15th, I was sitting and reading, and Mr. Morgan came in and asked if I wanted him to leave me, and, when I did not answer him, he grasped me around the throat and almost choked me, and, after I had freed myself, he said he was going to get a gun and blow my brains out and then blow his own out. The people downstairs heard him. He grabbed me around the throat with his hands, almost choked me, and I had to struggle to free myself from him. We had had no difficulty that day at all. He just came up and asked if I wanted him to leave me, and he owed considerable money and had received a number of letters from his creditors the day before, and I think that upset him considerably. In October, 1907, a Miss Green, whom I had known all my life invited me to go to the matinee with her. Defendant had no objections to her, but said he didn't want me to go, to break the engagement, and, when I said I couldn't, he beat his hands and face and kicked over a few chairs, and beat the floor with his head, hands, and feet. In that same month I asked defendant to let me have some money to get some groceries with, and he took a butcher knife and flashed it above our heads and said he might as well end both our lives, as he couldn't support me, and wouldn't let any one else have me. He did that in such a way that I feared him. I feared him very much since that Sunday he threatened to blow my brains out. In October he was very threatening about that. In December he threatened to blow my brains out. Judge Paxson: * * * On the 26th of December what occurred? A. Mr. Morgan wanted me to arrange for a New Year's dinner, and I told him we couldn't afford to do that, and then he grasped me very violently by the shoulders and insisted on my doing it, but we couldn't do it, as we hadn't the money, and so couldn't give the dinner. He wanted to entertain friends—my people and some friends. He was and is an able-bodied man, able to work if he were willing. His health has been exceptionally good while we were married. He never complained of anything as to his health. On January 8, 1908, Mr. Morgan came to me and said he couldn't support me, and he was going away; and he telephoned for an express wagon, and assisted the man to put his trunk on the wagon, and then came upstairs and said good bye, and that he wasn't man enough to take care of me, and I said good-bye. Q. Has he ever been back since? A. He came one Sunday evening. The Court: You say he came to see you? A. Yes, sir; one Sunday evening he came to the door and knocked on the door and rang the bell. Q. You knew he was there and wouldn't attend to it? A. No; I was afraid of him. I had been afraid of him ever since that Sunday he threatened to shoot me. The Court: You were not afraid of him, were you? A. I certainly was. So much so that I had to take medicine for my nerves ever since that Sunday. Dr. Guhman is my physician. My maiden name was Deters. All these offenses were committed by defendant in St. Louis, and I am now really afraid that defendant will carry out that threat. I certainly am very much afraid of it."

Mrs. Kate Deters, plaintiff's mother, testified as follows: "I visited my daughter on St. Louis avenue and frequently since she has been living in my flat. Plaintiff properly attended to her duties as a housewife; was a nice tidy housekeeper. She attended to her household the way she ought to do, and was very saving. I frequently saw plaintiff and defendant together. She treated him kindly and affectionately as a wife ought to do, and she treated his child the same way while it was with her. His disposition was very disagreeable. He showed very bad temper and a jealous disposition, and whenever anybody talked to her—my son or my niece or anybody in the house—he was so jealous he couldn't see. He showed ugly ways about it by cutting a person short. He would cut you short when you talked to him. I frequently heard him when he threw himself on the floor and pounded the floor and furniture. Often has my daughter come downstairs to me just after I heard him making those noises, and she was nervous and crying. He would make an awful noise like somebody would throw something down on the floor, turn over the chairs and things like that, and you could hear his voice all the time. I could tell that it was his voice, and she was usually crying whenever he would make such a noise. She is still living there, and I have to support her. My husband is in the grocery business on Sutherland avenue. My daughter associates with proper people, and her character is good."

Harry Meaker, a witness for plaintiff, testified as follows: "I knew Mr. Morgan. I took care of the premises. My attention has frequently been attracted by these unusual noises in Mr. Morgan's house, like something falling upstairs, and I would go up and see if anything happened and I could generally hear Mr. Morgan's voice quarreling. The noise was made by throwing over chairs and pushing the table around, and all of a sudden heard a dead fall. I couldn't help hearing. On three or four occasions I paid particular attention to it, and could tell from the noise that it was Mr. Morgan's voice. I am in no way related to the parties."

Joseph Laudauer testified as follows: "I have known plaintiff from childhood. I do not know her husband. I know plaintiff's general reputation among those with whom she associates, and it is just as good as it can be."

That this evidence shows defendant was guilty of cruelty and intolerable indignities toward his wife admits of no doubt. It also shows that this conduct began a few months after their marriage, and grew worse until defendant abandoned his wife. It further shows defendant's frequent and unreasonable outbursts of passion were without provocation; that on account of his laziness he was unwilling to work to support his wife, and for this reason, and no other, he abandoned her. We think plaintiff's evidence shows she is entitled to the relief prayed for. Her right to a divorce did not rest in the discretion of the court, but is a statutory right which the court was bound to enforce. Grenzbach v. Grenzbach, 118 Mo. App. 280, 94 S. W. 567; Ulrey v. Ulrey, 80 Mo. App. 48.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to set aside its judgment dismissing plaintiff's cause of action, to enter a decree divorcing her from her husband, and to allow her such alimony as the court may deem just and proper. All concur.

CLARKSON v. LEE.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 5, 1908.)

PLEADING (§ 248*)—COMPLAINT—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

An amended petition to recover rent under a written lease, which merely corrected the date of the contract and the per acre rental as erroneously stated in the original petition, the refusal to pay a year's rent for the same lands being complained of in both petitions, was not a substitution of a new cause of action, but an amendment to conform the allegations of the petition to the dates, etc., of the contract sued on, and was properly allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mississippi County; Henry C. Riley, Judge.

Action by Lota Clarkson against Walter L. Lee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Russell & Deal, for appellant. H. C. O'Bryan, for respondent.

BLAND, P. J. The action is to recover $3.50 per acre as rent for 125 acres of agricultural lands (described in the petition) for one year, beginning August 1, 1905, and ending August 1, 1906. The petition states that the contract of lease was entered into on December 16, 1902, by Fannie Clarkson, the then guardian of plaintiff, and the defendant; that plaintiff attained her majority before the commencement of the suit, etc. On October 1, 1906, defendant appeared to the action by attorney, and filed a general denial. On the 3d day of April, 1907, plaintiff filed an amended petition, in which she alleged that the same lands described in the original petition were leased by Fannie Clarkson, plaintiff's then guardian, to defendant on November 10, 1900, at a rental of $3 per acre, and that this contract was in writing; that the written contract "is lost and the dates unknown to plaintiff till yesterday, but is the same contract declared upon in the original petition." On April 4, 1907, defendant moved to strike out the amended petition on the ground that it substituted a new cause of action. In said motion defendant set forth in hæc verba what he alleged to be copies of two written leases entered into between himself and Fannie Clarkson as guardian of plaintiff and other minors, one of which is dated December 16, 1902, and the other November 10, 1900. The lands described in the petition are not described in the lease of December 16, 1902, but are expressly excluded from the lands described therein. They are included in the lease of November 10, 1900, which, as to the lands described in the petition, was to expire August 1, 1906. The leases were not offered in evidence on the hearing of the motion to strike out, and no offer was made to prove the copies filed with and made a part of the motion. The court overruled the motion, whereupon defendant, after saving his exceptions, declined to plead further to the amended petition. The court heard plaintiff's evidence, and rendered judgment in her favor for $390. In due time defendant filed a motion in arrest of judgment, which the court overruled, whereupon defendant appealed, and brings the case here on the record proper.
